Finally they said, "Look, we have made a real breakthrough for you. We have cut the duty from approximately 30 percent to 15 percent." But they did it only for a certain part of the year.

Well, as I got to studying that I found that is the part of the year we are not picking any fruit. It was not applicable at all. In no way was it a help.

What really shook me was when the people who were doing the bargaining for our side did not seem to understand that. They themselves said, "Look, Senator, we won you a major concession." No way. That is when we have no fruit to sell, and when we have fruit to sell the European Community has raised the duty again.

Let me touch on some of the points of what has happened in the European Community. Through this CAP, common agricultural policy, they have become self-sufficient in most agricultural products, and now they are in the position of developing into a major exporter of agricultural products. In addition, the CAP has reduced world agricultural trade to the detriment of all trading nations, and it has blocked the export of many U.S. agricultural commodities to the European Community.

Last year, the European Community became a net grain exporter for the first time. The emergence of the European Community as a grain exporter is less significant than the fact that these exports succeed only by reason of subsidies. The 10 governments of the European Community and the European Community itself now encourage agricultural production at over 10 times the annual cost of all U.S. Federal agricultural price support programs in this country.

Few European agricultural products would have any export market at all without subsidies. While the subsidies are changed frequently to meet market conditions, and are different for different products, and conversions to U.S. dollars are always fluctuating, we can still observe that European Community price guarantees are almost always higher than the comparable market price.

For example, using recent conversion rates—which are the most favorable to the European Community in years because of the recent strength of the dollar—the soft wheat European Community price guarantee for the 1981-82 year was $4.59 per bushel, whereas the comparable recent market price was $3.69 per bushel. This difference in 1980 was almost $2 per bushel. The European Community price guarantee on beef and veal was $1.01 per pound, whereas comparable world prices—an average of slaughter prices converted to live weight basis for consistency with the European Community price guarantees—were about $0.55 per pound.

Pork price guarantees were almost 2.5 times world prices; corn prices were 1.4 times world prices. All of these European Community price guarantees have increased in the 1981-82 season by amounts that range from 6 to 11 percent over the 1980-81 season.

How does this work? If they are guaranteeing those kinds of prices to their farmers to increase their production substantially, then what happens when they sell it on the world market? What they do is say to the exporter, "Now, you go ahead and sell your commodity on the world market at whatever price the market will bear, and we will make up the difference between that price and whatever we have guaranteed the farmer within the EC." Each week, EC exporters submit their tender offers and requested subsidy amounts, and the Community decides what to pay to get rid of commodities. If EC wheat exporters need a subsidy of $1.50 to beat the competition—say, the United States—they can just ask for it from the Community. You can see what happens to our market price.

The EC attack on agricultural export markets is concentrated in a few products—sugar, grains, milk products, beef and veal, and processed foods. The first four items account for 51 percent of all EC production and nearly 75 percent of the 1980 CAP budget.

As a result of heavily subsidized EC exports, there has been a dramatic shift in world export commodity market shares. These changes have been detrimental to other agricultural exporting countries, particularly the United States. One of the most disturbing aspects of these developments is that the EC export drive is targeted on areas where the United States has traditionally been a major exporter. Some of our major world markets are now jeopardized by EC subsidies.

According to EC figures, their exports of CAP products to developing countries increased 271 percent from 1973 to 1980. Between 1970 and 1980, the EC percentage of the world export market in wheat increased with the benefit of subsidies from 6.2 percent of world exports to 15.6 percent. It is true that U.S. exports of wheat also increased in that period, but I submit that they would have increased much more without the unfair competition of subsidized European wheat.

In many areas, the European subsidies have resulted in an absolute reduction of U.S. market shares. For example, since the institution of the CAP in 1962, market shares in commercial wheat flour have changed dramatically. In the period 1959 to 1962, before the policy was instituted, the EC share of world commercial wheat flour market averaged 28 percent. U.S. market share was also roughly 28 percent. In the period 1977 to 1980, with the benefit of almost 20 years of subsidization, the EC share of the world commercial wheat flour market was 71 percent, whereas the U.S. share had dropped to 11 percent.

The U.S. share had dropped to 11 percent. Remember that they were even. But then it changed, because of the EC subsidy. The EC's share moved up to 71 percent and ours dropped to only 11 percent.

Similarly, in the area of poultry meat, the increase in the EC's export market share came at the expense of U.S. exporters who had 37.5 percent of world exports in 1974, but only 25.1 percent in 1979. In that same period the EC percentage of world exports climbed from 0.4 percent to 28.7 percent. In the Middle East alone, the U.S. market share for whole chickens dropped from 97 percent in 1966—the year before EC subsidies for whole chickens were introduced—to 18 percent in 1980, while the EC share increased from 3 percent to 82 percent over the same period.

EC exports of dairy products have increased from 472,000 metric tons in 1976 to 1,419,000 metric tons in 1980. EC sugar exports have soared from 2,114,000 metric tons in 1976-77 to 4,500,000 metric tons in 1980-81. The EEC shipped 601,000 metric tons of meat abroad in 1976; in 1979 such shipments amounted to 816,000 metric tons.

I know there are a lot of people who must say, "Well, what does that have to do with me? So what if we have not sold as many chickens abroad as we have sold in the past? So what if they are taking over our market share on flour?"

It has a lot to do with you because one of the greatest mainstays of our exports and of the soundness of our dollar is our export of agricultural products. If they did not have that as one of the bulwarks for the defense of the dollar we would be in a lot more trouble than we are today.

Information that is only now becoming available suggests that the EC subsidies have materially undercut the prices U.S. exporters can charge for their products. In places as remote as Yemen and Sri Lanka, the Europeans—leaning on their subsidies—have underbid U.S. prices for wheat flour by more than $100 per metric ton in some cases.

Now that is a dramatic example of why the fellow in Yemen says, "All right, why should I buy the U.S. product?" And he buys it from the European Common Market.

The EC has refused to join the international sugar organization—which protects consumers from wide fluctuations in the price of sugar—and prefers instead to flood world markets with heavily subsidized white sugar. Partly as a result of this EC policy there is a shortage of sugar to supply all the needs of the world's consumers, and yet the price remains artificially low, thereby inhibiting additional producers.

Tomorrow, I will discuss some of the international agricultural agreements to which the United States is a party and review their relevance to this problem.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very relevant and timely article out of the Economist, talking about the CAP in Europe and what is being done on farm prices and what it means insofar as other exporting measures are concerned.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Economist, Jan. 23, 1982]

FARM PRICES—STILL FAR TOO HIGH

Close though a settlement of Britain's budget grievance may be, reform of Europe's farm policy seems as distant as ever. This week, the EEC commission decided to keep its farm-price proposals for the coming year under wraps until after next week's foreign minister's meeting. A peep under the wrapper shows that the commission has forgotten all its promises of farm reform.

When its proposals for rejigging the EEC's policies were published last June, the commission made three vows: to propose "prudent" prices, to bring cereal prices closer to world prices, and to restrain surplus production. Yet in the package now on the desk of the farm commissioner, Mr Poul Dalsager, which has already been accepted by his colleagues, there is scarcely a glimpse of these good intentions, Mr. Dalsager's men are proposing:

An average increase in common farm prices of 9 percent. This is the highest proposed increase since 1977. Although the EEC's average inflation rate is 12.8 percent, farmers' real incomes kept pace last year, thanks to high price rises. After the boom years of the mid-1970s, farmers' real profits fell by 3 percent in 1979 and then 7 percent in 1980, but then stabilised in 1981, to the envy of other small businesses.

Smaller price rises for cereals of 6-7 percent. This will do nothing to bring EEC prices closer to world levels. After reaching a peak of $3.50 a bushel in early 1981, American wheat prices have fallen by 30 percent under pressure from a record world cereal harvest in 1981, and are expected to stay low in 1982. EEC cereal prices rose by 7.7 percent in 1981.

A production target for cereals of 119.5m tonnes (excluding hard wheat) in 1982; if this target is exceeded, the guaranteed price will fall. In principle, this should be an effective restraint on overproduction. But the target has been set at the level of the record EEC harvest of 1980.

Price rises for dairy products, the sector with the largest surplus, of 9 percent. Last year the cost of supporting EEC dairy farmers fell dramatically thanks to high world prices (and correspondingly low export subsidies) and to a slowdown in the growth of EEC milk output to just 0.5 percent. Both these gains are fragile. World prices are high because the two biggest exporters, the EEC and New Zealand, have fixed the market; but prices will stay high only if America keeps out of the world market and if the EEC restrains its output. Despite last year's sale of 100,000 tonnes of stockpiled butter to the New Zealanders, American surpluses are growing again; by the end of 1982, there will be 243,000 tonnes of butter, 460,000 tonnes of cheese and 765,000 tonnes of milk powder in American stores.

Milk pundits reckon that the small growth in EEC production last year was exceptional; poor weather was to blame, they say, and this year output will rise by 1.5-2.0 percent, while consumption will rise by less than 0.5 percent, so that the EEC will still be churning out 20 percent more milk, cheese and butter than European consumers want to buy.

Mr. Dalsager's proposals, if accepted by the Ten's farm ministers, would cost the EEC budget an extra 1.2 billion ecus (£672m) in a full year. He has been deliberately generous in the hope that his proposals for high price rises will help ministers to reach an early agreement and subsequently allow him to introduce small reforms by stealth. Experience shows that the ministers invariably raise the proposals by 2-3 percent, put off reforms, and add expensive extras (this year, Greece is likely to demand a special package of aid measures for its farmers). The biggest danger is that, if Britain gets a deal to limit its budget contributions, it will give up fighting against high farm prices and excessive spending. That would be bad news for inflation, for the European taxpayer, and for the EEC's trade relations with other food exporters.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I yield the remainder of my time to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE).

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank my good friend from Texas.

COP OUT TIME: CONGRESS AND THE ADMINISTRATION BLAME HIGH INTEREST RATES ON THE FEDERAL RESERVE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the No. 1 economic problem facing the country right now is a recession that includes 8.9 percent unemployment, increasing business failures, a homebuilding industry that is flat on its back, and an automobile industry staggering along at less than 50 percent of capacity. And what causes all of this economic distress? Answer: One simple primary and stubborn fact.

We suffer outrageously high interest rates that crucify the interest sensitive industries like housing and automobiles. Mortgage rates have risen to the incredible rate of 17 percent—on the average—in this country. At that level over 80 percent of potential home buyers simply cannot make the monthly payments necessary for buying the average new home. Last year less than 750,000 Americans bought new homes. That compares to almost 1½ million in 1978. Today we have a pent-up demand for housing that would permit homebuilders to build and sell at least an additional million houses if we could bring mortgage interest rates down to 11 or 12 percent. Since each housing start requires 2 man-years of work, that means we lose 2 million jobs in housing alone because of high interest rates.

The auto industry, too, depends heavily on buyers financing their purchases on time. Three out of four persons who buy a new car, borrow to do so. Leaders in the automobile industry unanimously agree that the punishing level of interest rates shove monthly payments on cars beyond the reach of hundreds of thousands of potential buyers. In the auto industry we lose hundreds of thousands of jobs because of high interest rates.

Farmers as we know must borrow heavily and finance virtually all of their implement purchases on credit. But with interest rates so high, they simply cannot afford to buy the machinery and equipment they need to do a more efficient job. Result: The farm implement business is in trouble.

Small business typically provides the greatest increase in employment in this country and also depends heavily on credit to finance their working capital. But small business in many parts of the country has been paralyzed by high interest rates.

Now what I have stated so far will encounter little dispute in this body or anywhere else in this country. The question is who is responsible for these high interest rates, and what can we do about it? Unfortunately that has become a red hot, partisan issue in the past few weeks, featured by some of the most transparent buck passing in years. President Reagan has blamed high interest rates on the Federal Reserve and many Republican Members of the Congress have taken him up on it and sing the same song.

VOLCKER ROUGHED UP

Just last week Chairman Paul Volcker appeared before the Joint Economic Committee. He suffered a rough reception with members, particularly on the Republican side blaming him and the policies of the Federal Reserve Board for high interest rates. Treasury Secretary Regan followed him, and although Secretary Regan is the chief economic official of this administration, Republican members concentrated almost all their fire—not on the budget deficits and immense Treasury borrowing—that obviously drive up interest rates, but on the Federal Reserve Board. And Secretary Regan happily swallowed the alibi and pitched in, joining in the general condemnation of the Fed as the interest rate villain.

FEEBLE ARGUMENT

Now Mr. President, their argument has to be one of the feeblest economic arguments I have heard in years. They contend that interest rates are high because the Fed has not followed a sufficiently consistent policy of holding down the rate of increase in the supply of money. What are the facts? The facts are that since October of 1979 when the Fed announced that henceforth it would fight inflation by steadily and gradually reducing the rate of increase in the supply of money, the Fed has lived up to its word.

Each year since that announcement it has reduced the rate of increase in the money supply. For the full year 1981 the Fed increased the money supply by 2.1 percent. But that 2.1-percent increase included a very big 8.1-percent increase in the money supply in the fourth quarter. Republican criticism concentrates on the big increase in the final quarter and argues that that unsettled the financial markets so much, because it represented such a radical departure that interest rates began to rise again. Where does this Fed-is-to-blame argument come from?

Now, Mr. President, how does monetary policy affect interest rates? First, the greater the supply of money and credit, the lower will be the price of credit or interest rates. So will an increase—a big sudden increase like the big jump in the 1981 fourth quarter increase or reduce interest rates? Answer: It will work in both directions. The additional credit will tend to push down the price of that credit or interest. But the additional credit will also send a signal to the credit markets that the Fed is likely to curtail that temporary big jump in credit in subsequent quarters and reduce the rate of increase in the money supply to make up for it.

WHY EASIER CREDIT TEMPORARILY RAISES INTEREST

What happens when the financial community expects interest rates to increase in the future? Several things: First, those who are planning to borrow accelerate their borrowing in order to beat the expected increase in interest rates; this increases the demand for credit. Second, those who hold financial assets have a greater desire to sell them to avoid a future capital loss; this exerts additional pressure on the available supply of credit. Third, those who have funds to invest hold back in anticipation of a higher future return; this decreases the available supply of credit.

The combination of these factors—an increase in the demand for credit and a decrease in the supply of credit—cause interest rates to rise. In other words, the expectation of higher rates becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy. When the market sees a temporary increase in the supply of money, rates go up in anticipation of a future tightening by the Fed.

So, yes, the big increase in the money supply in the fourth quarter probably has some effect in pushing interest rates a little higher—temporarily—until the next report on the money supply comes in and the Fed returns to its long-term policy of restraint. But we must not confuse this temporary fluctuation with the clear and now well-established Federal Reserve policy that the rate of increase in the money supply must continue to be low.

STRAINING AT GNATS

Indeed, the money market fully recognizes this determination. In fact, the reason they know the policy will be tighter in the next quarter is precisely because the Fed for 3 years now has established that restraint policy as their hallmark. Republican critics are truly straining at gnats when they condemn the quarterly fluctuations. The simple fact is that the Fed does indeed constitute the only game in town in fighting inflation.

EXTREME MONETARIST VIEW—THE LONG-LOST BROTHER

Well, Mr. President, there is an extreme monetarist view within the Treasury and academia which attempts to blame the Fed for high interest rates because it permits this excessive variation in the shortrun growth of the money supply. Republicans in the administration and Congress are hugging it like a long-lost brother. These extremists—now administration—views apparently believe the Fed should stick to a fixed growth rate for the money supply over a quarter, a month, or even a week. According to this view, variations in the weekly money supply figures upset the financial community and cause rates to be higher than necessary.

Mr. President, if there is anything that upsets the financial community it is the week-to-week variation in the estimated budget deficit for fiscal year 1983 and future years. The financial community has been tracking the money supply figures for many years and by now it surely realizes that weekly or monthly variations in money growth do not add up a trend.

What would really happen if the Fed took the advice of these self-appointed critics in the Treasury? First of all, short-term interest rates would vary tremendously as the Fed attempted to counter every jiggle in the demand for money with offsetting open market operations. Second, the increased interest rate volatility would put many financial institutions under extreme pressure, especially the beleagured thrift industry which lost $5 billion last year. Third, the rest of the business community would become increasingly apprehensive of investing as they saw short-term rates fluctuate widely from week to week. As one Governor of the Fed put it, they would think the Fed had gone bananas.

ADMINISTRATION'S NO INFLATION POLICY

The Congress and the administration continues to pursue a blatantly inflationary fiscal policy with mammoth deficits crowding $100 billion. The administration has virtually written off any use of antitrust policy to fight inflation. We have the weakest antitrust, procompetition Federal policy today that we have had since 1980. The administration continues to waltz away from a free trade policy with trigger prices and various levels of import restraint. And this is the first administration in more than 20 years to have no incomes policy—that is no policy of wage and price restraint. So the whole burden comes down on the Fed to fight inflation. The administration agrees that we need to hold down the rate of increase in the supply of money to fight inflation.

The numbers—the sheer arithmetic—tells the story. The Fed is doing its job. Inflation has abated owing not to anything the administration or the Congress has done, owing almost entirely to the singlehanded efforts of the Fed, and now the Fed takes it on the chin from the President and Republicans in the House and Senate for pushing up interest rates. How ridiculous.

CONGRESS CANNOT PASS BUCK FOR FED

Mr. President, for 24 years I have served on the Senate Banking Committee. For 6 years I have been chairman of that committee. I have listened to the testimony of some distinguished chairmen of the Fed, to William McChesney Martin, to Arthur Burns, to William Miller, and now to Paul Volcker.

Without exception they recognized that the Fed cannot bring down interest rates in the face of an expansive congressional fiscal policy. Repeatedly they have inveighed against Federal deficit financing and excessive Federal spending. Again and again they have presented the committee with the simple alternative that confronts any Fed Chairman. In the face of high Federal deficits they can either monetize that debt by increasing the money supply at a more rapid rate and making more credit available, or they can refuse to monetize the debt and require the Federal Government to elbow private borrowers aside and borrow its hundreds of billions in the private market. Now, Mr. President, get this: whichever policy they follow they will drive up interest rates if we are running large Federal deficits.

NO ALTERNATIVE

They have no alternative. Consider: if they hold down the rate of increase in the money supply and continue to fight inflation, Federal borrowing will compete for the scarce credit and interest rates will rise. And if they increase the rate of money supply creation, they will pump more money into the inflationary economy, drive prices up, and drive interest rates up further. Why? Because lenders will insist on the inflationary premium, a return higher than the anticipated inflation rate.

I asked Paul Volcker a couple of months ago when he appeared before the Senate Banking Committee whether he could follow any policy that would bring interest rates down now. His answer, "No." He could not. I pointed out that this was an extraordinary admission from our principal banker, the head of the agency to which the Congress had entrusted the money power. Volcker said he could not bring interest rates down. And, Mr. President, I agree with him.

Now, of course, I may be wrong. Volcker may be wrong. The President and the congressional Republicans may be right. Maybe the Fed is responsible for the high interest rates. But, Mr. President, who is responsible for the Fed? The answer: Look at the Constitution. article I, section 1, subparagraph 8 gives the Congress the money power; not the Executive, but the Congress. We and we alone have the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof. We created the Fed.

OUR CREATURE

It is our creature. A few years ago Senator Paul Douglas, the only truly outstanding economist ever to serve in this body, a former president of the American Economic Association, told Chairman William McChesney Martin to write on his bathroom mirror so he would see it every morning when he shaved: "I am a creature of the Congress." Let us not forget that. We as Members of the Congress have the full responsibility for the Federal Reserve. We can abolish it. We can recreate it. We can pass a resolution mandating whatever policies that we wish. We are the master. When we blame the Federal Reserve, we blame ourselves. If we say they are responsible for high interest rates, the next question must be, Well then, why do you not do something about it? We can.

CHALLENGE

And I challenge the majority leadership of this body. I challenge the President of the United States who is their leader. If the Federal Reserve Board causes the high interest rates, then tell us how you would change it; and be done with it. The Fed is not some untouchable, distant power beyond our reach. It has no holy function. It is not a group of private, distant bankers. It is our creature, our instrument, our responsibility. Oh sure, some say, the Fed is an independent agency. That independence only exists in the deliberate, calculated restraint of the Congress. We can end that independence by simply passing a law. And if the Fed is following policies that drive millions of Americans out of work and bankrupt the homebuilding and auto industries why do we not step in and change those policies?

Why does not the President of the United States propose legislation to direct the Fed to follow a different policy? The President is, as a matter of cold fact, the legislative leader of our country. What legislation has he proposed to change the Federal Reserve? Answer: None; that is right, none. If the President wants to change the makeup of the Federal Reserve Board, he can propose to do so. I would strongly oppose such an action. But many would support it, and frankly, if the President made any kind of case that the Fed was, in fact, responsible for the present high interest rates the Congress would quickly support legislation to change the Board.

END THE COPOUT

So, Mr. President, let us not engage in this futile copout. If we really believe the Fed causes these high interest rates, bring on the legislation or the resolutions to change the Fed. If any Member should argue that the problem is Volcker, or the present board, not the fundamental law, then introduce a resolution to change Fed policy. Pass it, and the Fed would have no alternative except to comply. We could, for example, mandate the Fed to limit the increase in the money supply during any quarter or any month or week to a certain percentage or within a certain range, but has anyone proposed to do that? Of course; and why not? Because that kind of congressional interference with that complex professional job would make the situation even worse. Once the Congress brings its political clout into the day-to-day management of the Fed, you can kiss off any rational, steady, long-term policy.

So instead we trot out our favorite whipping boy, our prime scapegoat. How beautiful. We do not have to blame ourselves for our spending folly. No, no, no, no. As the distinguished senior Senator from Louisiana, Senator RUSSELL LONG, says: "Don't blame you, don't blame me, blame the man behind the tree." And the man behind the tree is the Fed.

Let us manfully face up to the fact that the Fed has not pushed interest rates up. I am positive they would love to get interest rates down. We—the Congress—have pushed interest rates up by creating a series of huge deficits that have given us $1 trillion national debt and still growing.

And no matter how we squirm and twist and turn we cannot get away from our own responsibility. To get interest rates down we have to follow a painful, difficult course. We have to cut spending even more deeply than we have; or we have to do both.

But how much more delightful to blame the Fed than to face the tough facts of life and do something about it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, let me congratulate the Senator on his statement. I did not get to hear all of it, and I may not agree with everything the Senator said, but I know I agree with a great deal of it.

I take it that the Senator feels that if you are not going to do anything about the Federal Reserve, you ought to be acting in other areas. As the Senator says, he does not think anything should be done about the Federal Reserve activities, I feel the administration is not doing anything about that. If that is the case, you ought to be acting in other areas.

You are either reducing spending, raising revenues, or a combination of the two.

I would like to ask the Senator if he would agree with me that very definitely we ought to be doing one of the three. Logically, the answer would seem to be, and I would ask if the Senator agrees with this, that you ought to reduce spending to the extent that you can.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I agree wholeheartedly with that.

Mr. LONG. Having done that, you then ought to raise revenue to fill in the slack.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Exactly.

Mr. LONG. That in no event should we go forward with the kind of deficit, both short term and long term, which means that people will not make the investments in equity and they will not make the investments in long-term bonds that are so essential to the recovery of the economy and to the future prosperity of America.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Louisiana is 100-percent right. The result is that you are going to continue to have these tremendously high interest rates that destroy the homebuilding industry—17 percent mortgages. There is no way they can operate with those kinds of mortgages. The automobile industry also suffers terribly.

Mr. LONG. Does it not boil down to this: In terms of the economy, the easy tricks have already been taken. You can not hope to cut spending anything like as much as the $38 billion that was cut last year, which started from a budget that the President said was greatly excessive. You would be very fortunate if you cut it even a quarter of that much. If you are not going to do anything about changing the Federal Reserve's activity, that means the only alternative would be to raise additional revenue by one recommendation or another, by some means that would seem most fair and most equitable, most appropriate to the situation.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I could not agree more with the distinguished Senator, who is, incidentally, the long-term chairman of the Finance Committee and our outstanding expert on revenues.

Mr. LONG. I might ask the Senator this: Is he not aware of the fact that according to all the published reports, the Secretary of the Treasury agrees with that position, practically all of the President's economic advisers seem to agree with that position, and from what we learn from talking with other Senators they agree. That is, concerning the President's long-term inclination not to do that type of thing, not to ask for a tax increase, which seems to be standing in the way of the type of program that the Senator seems to think is necessary.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think the Senator is correct. I think I would put somewhat more emphasis on cutting spending than the President would, even though he did very well last year. I think there are areas that are sacred cows that we have not touched that we have to touch. But the Senator is right, that we can not cut the budget enough to reduce unemployment to below 7 percent. If we can not get the deficit down to that level, we will have to increase revenues.

Mr. LONG. Just to get it clear so everyone can understand it, if the Senator had the decision to make himself, having set up recommendations for the economy and having achieved part of them, and perhaps not all by any means, would the Senator not then feel he ought to make a recommendation to raise revenues by whatever seems to be the most appropriate way to fill up the slack that he could not achieve by spending cuts?

Mr. PROXMIRE. On those assumptions, I think we should. There is no other way to do it. There is no way that we can say the deficit will be less than $100 billion if everything works out all right, as the President said in his state of the Union message, $100 billion from this President, one of the finest men we have had as President. But he is a man who has based his whole campaign on eliminating deficits, on balancing the budget. That was the heart of it, the crux of it. That is what people believed in and that is why people supported him.

Mr. LONG. The President suggested that if we do something to reduce the deficit in terms of revenue measures, nothing would be achieved because the Congress would just spend more money.

Let me ask the Senator, does that make any real sense, when we are facing a deficit of $100 billion, to say if we do something to raise more revenues the Congress will spend more money? Will that make sense under the circumstances?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Not under the circumstances. There are certainly circumstances where it does make sense. I feel our problem is that this is an enormous Federal Government that has grown way out of bounds, that has to be drastically reduced. But certainly when you come up with a program that falls as short as this one does in making the reduction, there is no alternative than to come up with more revenues or face the fact that you will have deficits that will be driven through the roof.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I applaud the Senator's statement in that regard. I hope that all of us, including those in this body who are very dear friends of the President, will continue to make the point to him that the leadership in this time, the leadership of the present, really demands that we economize every place we can economize, and having done that, that we reduce deficits, both present and future deficits, to at least a much more responsible level, which is the hope of the American people. Otherwise, it seems we will have very high interest rates for a long time to come and that is going to frustrate most of what we thought we achieved when we passed the Tax Recovery Act.

I think we would certainly hope that that measure, which was the biggest tax cut in history, would achieve that which we claimed for it, and even the President of the United States claimed for it. I know the Senator hopes that would be the case. We all share the objective that the program will succeed. We all voted for it. I voted for it. Did the Senator?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I sure did. I voted for the tax cut and the spending cuts.

Mr. LONG. No one has voted for more economy than the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE). Having done that type of thing, having voted for both the spending cuts and the tax cuts, we hope the programs will succeed.

May I say to the Senator that I am one of those Senators who went up to the White House at the President's invitation. He also invited other so-called conservative Democrats. I thought we ought to go along with the President on the 3-year tax cut, to cut in three stages.

I made the point at the time that if this thing did not work out the way we hoped it would work, that the President would be the first to come in and recommend that something be done about it. I hope very much that I will not be disappointed in that. Some took me at my word, thinking it made good sense. I hope that if it does not work, the President will make a recommendation.

89-059 O-85-47 (Pt. 1)

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator very much.

A STARTLING CONCLUSION FROM AN ANALYSIS OF GENOCIDE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Jews of Hungary during World War II serve as an example of victims of genocide. Approximately 750,000 Jews lived in Hungary in 1941. By war's end, only about one-third of that number remained.

Professor Randolph Braham, in his book "The Politics of Genocide: The Holocaust in Hungary," examines this horrible occurrence by first studying Hungarian history predating the tragedy and then the daily progress of the extermination campaign itself.

Mr. Braham describes some surprising facts, and he reaches a startling conclusion. It seems the aristocratic leaders of the Jewish population who comprised the Jewish Council understood the consequences of deportation, but did not forward the information to lower level officials or any other segment of the population. They were attempting to avoid panic among the Jewish population, and as a result, preserve the relatively humane treatment being given to those who had not yet been deported.

Mr. Braham considers this approach to have been a serious tactical error by the Jewish Council. He suggests that if the entire Council had "resigned or committed suicide (emphasis added)" after publicly stating that all the deported Jews were being killed in concentration camps, "they would have created a situation of anarchy which would have awakened the Jews to the reality of the situation. That would have saved the most lives."

Now, I do not endorse the concept that the leadership of any religious, national, ethnic, or racial group need kill itself in order to protect the group itself. We enact laws, declarations, and conventions to protect the rights of human beings. The Genocide Conventional would serve that function, if we would only let it.

The Genocide Convention was, in fact, drafted as a response to the Holocaust. The United States, the most concerned of all nations for the rights of mankind, has for 30 years been remiss in its consideration of the treaty. The Senate should hesitate no longer in ratifying this important convention.

DEREGULATION: THE DISPARITY BETWEEN RHETORIC AND REALITY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, during the confirmation of the major agency and department heads of the Reagan administration last year, I asked each a series of questions about their precise plans for deregulation as opposed to the general rhetoric that had been displayed during the election campaign.

Uniformly the answers came back without specific goals or precise documentation. At that time I asked the question: How substantial and how effective is this commitment to deregulation by the new administration? Is it only rhetoric deep?

The answer seems to come in two quite distinct parts. For those of us here in Washington, there is a perception that the effort at deregulation has been a huge success. Murray L. Weidenbaum, the President's chief economic adviser, has asserted that regulatory relief saved over $6 billion last year alone. The Vice President's team heading up the deregulatory effort makes similar claims and cites the reduction in the number of pages of announcements in the Federal Register.

So if we are to believe what we hear and are told in Washington, deregulation has been a tremendous success.

But what of the conditions outside Washington? There we find a much different story.

Two articles in the Washington Post document this feeling in many local communities that the deregulation effort has not yet touched the lives of the average citizen. T. R. Reid looked at Appleton, Wis., and found that the people are still waiting for the Federal Government to get off their backs and out of their pockets. Time after time he cites conversations with local business and government officials who cannot give any examples of beneficial results of the reduction in regulations claimed in Washington. He calls this the disparity between rhetoric in Washington and the real life in a fairly typical American city. In some cases the deregulation of a Federal program has led to more paperwork from State agencies and the difficulty in having to cope with different standards from the 50 States. In some cases one type of regulation has been displaced by another. But in the vast majority of cases there simply is no evidence of the deregulation effort at all—none.

What of the majestic claims here in Washington? Have they not yet filtered down to the local level? Where is the $6 billion in savings? How long will it be before citizens throughout the country feel the results of this huge campaign?

I hope it is not long in coming, Mr. President, and that when it does arrive, it is not simply rhetoric but reality. Mr. President I ask unanimous consent that edited versions of the two articles from the Washington Post by T. R. Reid and an editorial printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DISPARITY BETWEEN RHETORIC AND REALITY

(By T. R. Reid)

APPLETON, WIS.—Moved in large part by Ronald Reagan's promise to "get the government off your backs," the people of this neat, pleasant city on the north shore of Lake Winnebago gave him their strong support in the last presidential election and then sat back to await the results of his war against federal regulation.

They're still waiting.

There have been instances where the anti-regulation push in Washington has borne fruit here in Wisconsin; officials at Kimberly-Clark Corp., the big paper firm that has headquarters here, are still pinching themselves about an Occupational Safety and Health Administration inspection that lasted less than an hour. It used to take two days. But there have also been instances where the regulatory burden has increased; the student aid office at Lawrence University had to hire new clerical staff to cope with the increased work resulting from one of Reagan's "deregulatory" initiatives.

For the most part, though, a visitor to this city who asks how things have changed under Reagan and deregulation gets the same answer:

"None. None. We just bid a little sewer job, government funded, and the regs hadn't changed a bit," said Don Utschig, president of a construction firm.

"Nothing that Reagan's done has touched us yet, not even in personnel," said Judy Griffin, air pollution sampler.

"They're still sending me all the same paperwork with all the same questions to answer. This [Census Bureau] form they sent last week, it was two feet long," said Viona Klemp, municipal payroll clerk.

"Hasn't been any change in any rules that I can think of. From what I hear, not a damn thing's going to change," said Ty Stefl, dairy manager.

The disparity between rhetoric in Washington and real life in a fairly typical American city like this one (Appleton has a population of 60,000) probably reflects the sheer enormity of the government's regulatory apparatus. "The federal government is everywhere," says Bill Brehm, the city's energetic young planning director. "Reagan can maybe stop the growth of all this busy work, maybe cut it by 10 percent if he's really lucky, but you're still going to have 90 percent of it in place. See, that's still huge if you're the guy who has to plow through it all."

That perception, that government regulation has become an immutable part of life, may also contribute to the sense here that nothing much has happened. Some businesses here are so used to complying with regulations that they are even more resistant to change than the government.

In some cases, the "Reagan revolution" has led, paradoxically, to an increase in government red tape. Although Preston Wilbourne, president of Air Wisconsin, the successful regional airline that is based here, supported the president's firing of the air traffic controllers, he finds the result ironic. "In effect, they've re-regulated; the department [of Transportation] is controlling our traffic like the CAB [Civil Aeronautics Board] did before the deregulation."

After the Department of Education announced, with considerable fanfare, that it was "deregulating" the terms of guaranteed student loans, the business office at Appleton's Lawrence University had to increase its clerical staff from two persons to three to handle the paperwork. "The feds turned this over to the states," explains Marvin Wrolstad, Lawrence's vice president for business affairs. "So for anybody involved in administering these loans, you basically have to deal with 50 sets of rules instead of one.

"I'm sure in Washington they're talking about reducing paperwork and getting the government off your back and stuff like this," Wrolstad says. "But the fact of it is, out here, it hasn't changed much. There's some difference, yes, but it's not so much tangible as it is a change of mood."

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 2, 1982]

THE "NEW MOOD" UNWINDS SOME RED TAPE

(By T. R. Reid)

APPLETON, WIS.—With considerable trepidation and an underlying conviction that the effort would fail, Marwin Wrolstad picked up the phone a few weeks ago and asked for help from his local federal regulator.

Wrolstad, vice president for business affairs at Lawrence University here, had reviewed the plans for an experimental heating process, funded by an Energy Department grant, and decided that it wouldn't work.

But like any institution in frigid north-central Wisconsin, Lawrence had a lot of other energy-efficiency plans; Wrolstad wanted to spend $8,000 of the unused grant to insulate some steam lines. To do that, though, the school would have to submit a whole new set of affidavits and application forms—a tedious process that could not be finished before the time period for the grant ran out.

"I figured before I went through all that I'd just try them out," Wrolstad recalled recently. "So I called the [Energy Department's] regional office down in Argon [Ill.], and lo and behold, they were very helpful. They helped us redirect the money. They found a way that didn't take as much red tape. They even granted a 60-day extension right on the phone!"

Most people here say that, despite the deregulatory hoopla in Washington, there has been almost no tangible change in the government's regulation of their jobs and their lives. But some business people have noticed an intangible change in the attitudes of the regulators they deal with.

"The attitude of the regulators, some of them, is basically different in the past year," says Paul Lenahan, a staff vice president at Kimberly-Clark Corp., the big paper products firm that is based here. "I guess a key word is trust. It used to be they clearly didn't trust you. Now it seems to be different.

According to senior administration officials, this change is quite deliberate. In his year-end assessments of the Reagan deregulatory effort, Vice President Bush tells audiences that "one of the biggest changes" in the field is a "new mood" on the part of the regulators—an attitude of cooperation rather than confrontation.

The value of a changed attitude is extremely hard to quantify, of course, and that is a key reason that no one in Appleton, not even the people who have noticed the change, will even begin to guess how much money might have been saved in the process.

Back in Washington, the president's chief economic adviser, Murray L. Weidenbaum, has estimated that regulatory "relief" measures saved the nation $6 billion last year. This guess may or may not be right, but there is zero substantiation for it here. Neither the giant firms like Kimberly-Clark nor small operations like WVMS-AM, a 12-person radio station here, can pinpoint even one cent of savings so far.

Meanwhile, people in the Appleton branch of the "regulation industry"—the lawyers, accountants and engineers who help people comply with federal regulations and measure their compliance—say they have felt no impact from the big antiregulatory push in Washington.

Last year, The Washington Post reported on Judy Griffin, a mother of three who was earning $25 per week as a sub-subcontractor to the Environmental Protection Agency. Her job was to operate an air pollution sampling machine on the roof of a firehouse here. Early in 1981, Griffin was worried that Reagan cutbacks would cost her job.

"Well guess what," Griffin says now. "Under Reagan, I've expanded. We added two more test sites because people called in and complained about particulate emissions out of these [paper] plants. I'm making more than I ever was.

"I've got this friend in Washington," Griffin says. "He . . . keeps calling me and saying 'Don't you know what's happening to regulation? . . .' And I say, 'Out here, nothing's happening.' "

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 3, 1982]

APPLETON REVISITED

The Post's reporter, T. R. Reid, returned to Appleton, Wis., recently to see what has changed since he took stock of that city's complaints about over-regulation almost a year ago. Mr. Reid's findings are worth thinking about in relation to the administration's regulatory rollback.

Some improvements have been noted. The Occupational Safety and Health Administration, already rated as "the most improved agency" a year ago, has now reduced its safety inspections of the local paper mill to little more than a smile and a wave. That pleases the plant manager, at least, and other local people also note a new attitude of cooperation that makes their dealings with the federal government more efficient as well as pleasant.

On the other hand, no one sees any big dollar savings from the changes, and some things—such as administering government-aided student loans at the local university—are more complicated than ever. This inconsistency in federal policy shows up in other areas as well.

Business interests with ready access to the Office of Management and Budget, where regulatory policy is now centered, have usually received prompt, continuing relief from the nagging ache of federal regulation. A few industries, of course, such as the big trucking firms, don't want to be deregulated, and they have gotten their wish to be left alone. In the case of less favored constituencies, however, the prescription has been still more red tape. Welfare agencies, for example, are burdened with a host of new requirements to do such things as tally recipient's possessions and reduce errors to a level not achieved by even the most careful fiduciaries of public or private trust.

The administration's regulatory review is far from complete, and there is time to correct the imbalances and open the process up to wider inspection. Savings from improved efficiency should increase over time, and no one should undervalue the importance of administering federal rules with more common sense and understanding. But untangling red tape isn't as easy as it looks from the outside. The Appleton findings are clear about that.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to exceed 20 minutes, with statements therein limited to 3 minutes.

THE LEGISLATIVE VETO

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues an editorial authored by the distinguished Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH) which appeared in the Springfield, Mo., News on December 3, 1981. The editorial addresses the subject of the legislative veto in the context of the Federal Trade Commission's used car rule, as well as the merits of that particular trade regulation. Since Congress adjourned last session without completing action on the proposed legislative veto of the used car rule, the FTC has resubmitted the rule to Congress for another 90 day review period. A new disapproval resolution, Senate Concurrent Resolution 60, has been introduced by the distinguished Senator from South Dakota (Mr. PRESSLER). I believe the subject of Senator DANFORTH's editorial should have the attention of every Senator. Besides Senate Concurrent Resolution 60, it relates to S. 1080, the regulatory reform bill, and the proposed legislative veto provision in that context.

The recent decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals (D.C. Circuit) which declared the legislative veto unconstitutional in a natural gas pricing case is also an interesting development which is relevant to these bills. Although that case involves the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978, the court's opinion contains expansive language questioning the validity of the legislative veto in a broad sense.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial from the December 3, 1981, Springfield News be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Springfield News, Dec. 3, 1981]

"USED CAR RULE" FIGHT TO BEGIN AGAIN

(By Jack Danforth)

This year the Senate adjourned without taking action on a proposal to veto the Federal Trade Commission's "used car rule." Under the rule, used car dealers would be required to disclose known defects in the cars they sell. The disclosure would be made on a window sticker posted in the window of each car. Since Congress did not act, the FTC will have to resubmit the rule in 1982, and the veto fight will begin anew.

I have never supported the legislative veto as a tool to curb regulatory excesses. In my view, the legislative veto only encourages sloppy legislating (on the theory Congress will always have a second bite at the apple), and then invites Congress to spend valuable time debating the worst sort of minutiae, all the while playing into the hands of special interest groups.

The resolution to veto the Federal Trade Commission's used car rule is a textbook example of what's wrong with the legislative veto.

Over the last weeks of the congressional session, while the recession went on apace, the members and staff of the Commerce Committee debated the wisdom of auto window stickers. Opponents of the FTC's used car rule say they are not opposed to FTC regulation of used car sales, but only to the FTC's rule. But they propose no alternatives.

Either the FTC should be in the business of regulating the sale of used cars or it should not. If the FTC should regulate the sale of used cars—and most commentators, opponents as well as supporters of this rule, seem to think such regulation is appropriate—then I think Congress should be prepared to support the FTC in its work. If Congress cannot support the work of the agency, we should be prepared—through legislation—to provide appropriate guidance to the FTC as to how it should proceed. The veto resolution gives the FTC no guidance whatsoever.

Some who oppose the rule say it would have been better if the FTC had ordered dealers to inspect the cars they sell (the rule does not do that now, despite rumors to the contrary). Others say the matter should be left to the states. Still others simply tell the FTC to try again. In my opinion, if this rule is vetoed the FTC would be well-advised not to try again. Until Congress decides what it wants to do about used cars. It will find all sorts of trumped-up reasons to oppose the FTC's work—reasons which are nothing more than excuses to justify a response to a well-organized lobby.

Certainly, it is possible for reasonable people to differ on the wisdom of the FTC's rule. However, with all due respect to my colleagues, I simply do not believe that the support for this veto resolution reflects sober study of the merits and demerits of the FTC's rule. It reflects, instead, the influence of a well-organized lobby. Nowhere is a valid case made that the FTC has acted in excess of its jurisdiction or in contravention of clearly articulated congressional policy. Today, we placate used car dealers. Tomorrow, it will be another group. And then another. This, in my view, is not the way the Congress of the United States should make public policy. I believe the FTC has acted well within its statutory mandate. Further, I support the rule on the merits.

The rule requires dealers to disclose known defects to the purchasers of used cars. I see nothing wrong with that. If a used car is defective and the dealer knows the car is defective, it seems to me the dealer should tell the customer that the car is defective. That is what the rule tells used car dealers to do. Nothing more. Nothing less. I cannot find anything wrong with that.

In fact, I find much that is right with the FTC rule. The marketplace works best when neither buyer nor seller is at an overwhelming disadvantage in raw bargaining power or in information. The marketplace works best when buyer and seller have access to basic information from which to strike a sound bargain.

This debate comes at a suspicious time. When the Senate reconvenes this month it will debate a mammoth piece of legislation known as the Regulatory Reform Act. At that time, efforts will be made to attach a legislative veto provision to the bill, giving Congress power to veto administrative rules across the board. In that debate, Congress would do well to consider our recent experience with the used car rule—and reject the veto proposal.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

TELEVISION AND RADIO COVERAGE OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of the motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 20, which the clerk will state by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 20) providing for television and radio coverage of proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. I may say, Mr. President, for any Senators who are in the Chamber or who may be listening in their offices, that there is a high likelihood that this quorum call will go live, so I would encourage Members to come to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

[Quorum No. 3 Leg.]

Baker	Gorton	Stennis
Ford	Long	Warner
Garn	Packwood

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is not present. The clerk will call the names of the absent Senators.

The assistant legislative clerk resumed the call of the roll and the following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

Abdnor	East	Mitchell
Andrews	Exon	Moynihan
Armstrong	Glenn	Murkowski
Baucus	Grassley	Nickles
Bentsen	Hart	Nunn
Boren	Hatch	Pell

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS), the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ), the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS), and the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN) are absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Chair state the business now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 20.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I understand that the distinguished Senator from Mississippi has a statement to make at this time. There may be other statements in the course of the afternoon.

I remind Senators that there is presently an order to vote on this motion on tomorrow. I would not expect the Senate to be in very late today.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, do I have the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President and Members of the body, you have just heard the announcement here that the motion to take up this measure will be voted on tomorrow sometime, and that being settled, I am not trying to take up any time here or anything like that, to kill time or try to bring about some parliamentary advantage or anything of that kind.

Before I get to the merits of this matter, though, I want to say with the greatest emphasis that any points that I make—Mr. President, if I may have permission to just wait here until the Chair can give me the floor——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The distinguished Senator from Mississippi has the floor and has asked that the courtesy of this Chamber be extended to him.

Mr. STENNIS. I asked for order, Mr. President, here on the floor where there is very slight attendance, but whoever is here, if a Member is here, just one, who wants to hear what I say, I want it to be possible for him to hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I ask the Senators to please clear the well so the Senator from Mississippi, who has the floor, can proceed in what I think would be an orderly fashion.

Can I please ask Senators to clear the floor, clear the well, so that the Senator from Mississippi can proceed? Extend to him the courtesy he deserves.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, what I wanted to make very clear in the beginning is that the author of this resolution is the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), and in him we could not have a Member whom I respect more, whose ability I respect more, and whose purposes are higher than I believe his to be, and that is based on years of close observation and association, no affinities or obligations between us particularly. But I remember distinctly the day he came here and the way he has moved into discharging his responsibilities not only for Tennessee but for the institution of the Senate and the country, which is something to be admired, and I do admire it and I appreciate very much his fine services.

I remember I said something in December, too, about the leadership with which we are blessed here in the Senate, the four men, and I referred to them, the two respected leaders and their principal assistants.

We went through a year last year that had the greatest volume, I think, of legislation of any year since I have been around, at least ever since the time of the 100 days in the so-called New Deal's beginning.

These gentlemen worked together with effectiveness, high purposes, and kept the body informed and kept us moving in discharging these duties in the very finest tradition and the very finest fashion. It is something that might not be noticed by many of the public, and even we do not notice it, maybe in appreciation as we are harried here at times by various problems.

But I made that statement with reference to the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), and I have already called him by name; the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD), the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), and also our assistant leader here, the Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS).

So we are all indebted to Senator BAKER, and we appreciate very much those services.

I am thinking and speaking today with all of my feeling and judgment that I do have about the institution of the U.S. Senate.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. STENNIS. Yes. I believe the Senator from Louisiana has spoken first and then I will yield to the majority leader.

Mr. LONG. Let me just say that I want to associate myself with the compliments the Senator paid the majority leader, the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER).

One of the many great things about the Senator from Tennessee is that he is one of those men who has the breadth of personality and judgment to see, to realize when he made a mistake, and to even tell his friends that he made a mistake on occasion. You cannnot say that for all people. I regret to say you cannot say that for all Senators. Some Senators think that they cannot make a mistake. They are like the Irishman who said, "I will admit when I am wrong but I am never wrong."

The Senator from Tennessee is one of those great Americans who, if he has made a mistake, when he becomes convinced himself that he has made a mistake, has the strength of character to admit it. He would say, "Well, yes, I made a mistake on that; if I had known then what I know now it would have been different."

I think that is a very fortunate thing for this body, because none of us is perfect. I know I have made mistakes in life, and most people have. The Senator from Tennessee is one of those great Americans who has the strength of character and enough confidence that he will be right about most things, that when he has made a mistake, he is fair enough to admit it, looking at it at least from hindsight. There are a great number of people who cannot measure up to that test.

(Mr. MATTINGLY assumed the chair.)

Mr. STENNIS. Well, I appreciate the Senator's remarks very much.

I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. I am grateful to my friend from Mississippi and my friend from Louisiana. I have to say I am overwhelmed; I am gratified beyond words to have these remarks, to the extent that they apply to me, made by one of the patriarchs of the Senate, one of the leading lights of this body, a man whose career I have patterned my own after in many respects, and in the remarks as well of the Senator from Louisiana, whom I admire inordinately. He and I have been on the same side of issues many times, and I believe we have some scars and bruises to prove it.

But I have to confess with some levity in hearing these comments that I keep waiting for the semicolon and "however." I think I will sit down, Mr. President, because I fear I will not be disappointed. [Laughter.]

Mr. STENNIS. Very well, Mr. President. The Senator from Tennessee's remarks are in keeping with his performance here, too.

Now, Mr. President, getting to this institution, I am talking about the debate here, this forum of debate here, in this Senate Chamber, upon the broad, big policies—the small policies, too—but the tremendous importance of there being a virtually unlimited forum for that exchange of views wherever it is desired, and in an atmosphere that will permit an appeal to the very best there is in the minds and judgments of our fellow Senators here.

So there are 200 years of precedents here and feeling on behalf of the public that the Senate is to a degree a court of appeals. That does not mean they are superior to the House of Representatives. The very opposite, but that their approach is different, and there is a reason for that. So we cannot just brush that off here by saying, "Well, that is old fashioned; it never did apply properly." That is something that the people of the country have been bred on, you might say, in their public thought, their ideals of their affairs being settled here in a forum of debate and exchange of views.

This resolution does not add one iota to the ability or the need or whatever extent it is to get these views out to the people.

Freedom of the press is not involved. There is no one trying to do anything against the TV industry or the profession or any kind of activity of theirs. As a matter of fact, it may not be known, but we have to my right here one story above this story in the Capitol inself—the TV facilities there for all the networks, as I understand it. The door is open there to any Member of this body. He can walk in more or less on his own invitation, but he comes there by invitation primarily of the TV systems that can invite him.

Then on the lower floor, the so-called basement floor, there are adequate cameras of the highest type adequately manned by professional people, owned by the public, paid for with taxpayers' money and available to us for a small charge to our accounts, our allowances, and it goes out under the judgment of the Senator himself as a public document for the benefit of any TV service or network that might see fit to use it. That is adequate.

I hear no complaint about it. I have not heard one iota of suggestion from the people, and I am a Senator who goes out among the people a great deal, calling for or asking for or saying that they think it is needed to open up this Chamber now beyond the free forum that it already is, and put a TV camera, you might say, at the desk of every Senator and open it up to the possibility—you cannot restrain a Senator now once he gets in a position to obtain the floor, and obtains the floor—open up the possibility of the birth of a new type of demagoguery; call it what you will; call it by a more polite name—I am talking about the possibilities—open it up to a systematic grouping of one Senator or more Senators to a series of demagogic assaults on any sitting Senator, on any sitting President, upon any idea or any other policy of our great Government.

As I have said, there is no physical necessity for these cameras. I do not believe there is any kind of a public demand nor need. I believe we are unnecessarily opening up an avenue that we will be unable to control once it is put in use, and abuse, and will prove to be a vexing and disturbing element of our public thought.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I just say to the Senator, in support of his statement, that this Senator was reelected at the last election. He went all over his State and was interviewed on television wherever any TV station had enough interest or enough kindness to present him on their own. He bought time on their stations, as well. This Senator appeared on many radio stations for interviews. Not one person in the whole State said, "Well, Senator, why can't we bring our TV cameras inside that Senate Chamber," or "Why can't we bring our radio microphone in there?" Not a single one anywhere in the State.

Now if the merit is there for the argument that we are denying public access, then certainly you would have thought that somebody would have made the point that they felt that television should be in the Senate. And I think the Senator would have found, in his tours around the State of Mississippi, the same type thing on behalf of his citizens.

Mr. STENNIS. I think the Senator is entirely correct. And the complete absence of this sentiment among our people is proof of the situation.

I have not heard any TV operation, any studio ownership, or anything mention the subject of television cameras here. I had one exchange ownership right near where I live just a few months ago. And I called up the purchaser, a very esteemed lady in Texas—I do not think she would object at all to my calling her name—Mrs. Hobby, who was once here in the Cabinet since I have been a Senator. I just called her up in a word of welcome. I was very much impressed with her response that she owned one or two others.

She had a clear-cut understanding, and she was active in the careers, and members of her family were not going to let any of the TV stations fall into the hands of unworthy or reckless or careless ownership that did not have the full and highest regard for their responsibility to the public, exercising this special privilege of controlling the airwaves to the extent that one would have.

It was just one of those things. I have been impressed with her here as a member of the Cabinet. But I was just pleased with her response there about the way she felt about her obligations.

So there is what I would call the very highest order of this profession—and it is a great profession—that have that view.

Now, why open this up and abandon, to a degree, the concept of being a court of appeals? Whether we have debates as much as we did in the old days is not controlling. We have to make judgments as to how we are going to use our time. But the forum is here, and if it is not settled in the committee rooms that I favor so much also, then it is settled here in what is a rather high type and well-informed debate.

I do not know if I am going to sit here and hear a fellow Senator speak over the camera that is going right directly to his home State; I do not know how good I am going to be at distinguishing whether he is talking to the people in his State or whether he is talking to me, a challenge to my judgment to see that matter like he does. And it is a privilege now, and has been for me over the years, to hear these presentations on this floor, when it was so evident that the man or woman was moved by a sense of conscientiousness, of an obligation to the country, to this body, to the constitutional principles, and there we picked up a guidance. I do not want to see that mission of the Senate invaded.

Now I think I can refer to last year's debate in 1981, in my opinion, as more legislation passed through this Chamber certainly since any time since I have been here, and I think it compares with the days of the so-called depression in volume, but at the same time here with all of that rush and everything else we rather maintained the high standards that have been carried out. Now if we have all these cameras—it will be the equivalent of 100, not 100 physically, but each Senator is going to have a camera, you might say, and he is going to control it under the very liberal rules of the Senate where he can get any more than 5 minutes or 3 minutes or 10 minutes, as it is in the House, and the House has to have a rule of that kind because of their large membership. But even though there may be just one or two, they are going to control that camera and dominate it and make it serve in these purposes. I think it ought not to be allowed here with the other accesses that we have.

Once we get into this and adopt this pattern and make that the order of the day, there will be small chance then to stop it or to change or to go back to our pattern for real discussion and the weighing of matters on the merits.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. STENNIS. Yes.

Mr. LONG. It seems to me that we ought to recognize, minus some change in the rules that has not even been discussed or suggested to us, that a single Senator would be in a position to insist that he have the floor on television at such times and for the length of time that he might feel would serve his purposes. And that might be a great deal of time.

I can recall how the Senator from Oregon, as I mentioned, used to take this floor and speak at about 5 o'clock and speak for hours on end. I do not criticize that. He had a right to do it and I think it served a purpose. But in that Senator's case, when any leadership, be it Democratic or Republican, did not see fit to go along with the Senator on what he felt were his rights to be heard at length at such time as he wanted to be heard, that Senator would just sit here and object to every unanimous-consent request. And the leadership would find it such a burden trying to do business with a single Senator in an uncooperative mood that they would have to go along.

He would pretty well have the Senate to himself, and with as much time as he wanted, to speak at great length. I do not see how, unless someone can show us changes that have not been proposed up to this point, one could prevent a person who wanted to use this Chamber to present himself in a campaign for President of the United States from using the Senate for just such a purpose.

Some may say, "What is wrong with that? Why should people not be able to do it?"

I am sure they would like to use that to run for President of the United States, but that is the second question we ought to ask ourselves. Do we really want to spend $5 million to install cameras and then close to $1 million a year to provide someone a nationwide TV access, particularly when it reaches the point where one speaks directly to the American people from the Senate floor? Do we want to spend millions over a 6-year period providing a single Senator that type of a multimillion dollar platform from which to advance his race for President of the United States? He has a lot of access now, but he can do it because people put up private contributions. He does not have it available at the taxpayers' expense.

Mr. STENNIS. That is certainly a good point. I was never happy about the situation of running for the President of the United States for 3 or 4 years. I say that with all deference to anyone who has run. I say 3 or 4 years. But if you put those cameras in here and a person wants to run or is thinking about it, he will find he will have to go to using that camera in self-defense, if for no other reason. He cannot sit back and wait to within a few respectful months of the campaign starting before he goes to using the camera right here in this Chamber to promote his own campaign. Other candidates would be promoting their campaigns. It would be a matter of self-defense. I believe we would get into a jam and it would be embarrassing here to all of us, to a degree.

We would rather live with each other, of course, giving each man as much as he might wish, but I think this would be highly detrimental to the Senate and its functions and its business.

The other day some Senators referred to the increased volume of the RECORD, of the things that went into the RECORD, on the use of television in the House of Representatives. I have also heard reports from others as to their State legislatures. I think that is only natural. It is something that we can expect. but the point I really make is that we just do not have any time here to spare.

A lot of the time, it may look as if we are wasting time or that we have nothing to do. But when you get into the volume of matters that these 100 Members have to pass on in the course of a 12-month period, it is almost appalling. First there are the committees. The committees have to go through the material, the authorization committees, and then the Appropriations Committee. There are many overlaps. Then it all has to come here to the floor to be reviewed and considered. It is just overwhelming.

In recent years, I had a count done as to how many line items there are in the appropriations bills. A line item means it is the appropriations bill itself and has a figure on which we must make a judgment. In the defense bill for that year there were 3,300 line items that had to have that consideration. That bill went to conference and came back in a different form. There had been over 1,200 differences between the House bill and the Senate bill. Those items had to be gone into and considered on another basis and agreed to by the House and the Senate before it would become a bill which was in the stage where it could be brought back here and also taken to the House for final passage.

In the first calendar year I was here, there were 73 rollcall votes in that entire year, 73 recorded rollcall votes in this body.

In 1980, the last year for which I have the figure, there were 703 rollcall votes. I understand that last year we had something over 600 recorded rollcall votes, although I do not have the figure.

(Mr. HATCH assumed the Chair.)

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. Yes, I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, does that not point up an additional problem? Every Senator generally would like to be considered as a candidate for reelection at some point. There may be some who plan to retire, but generally speaking most Senators who come here would hope that their services would be such that they would merit being continued in office. You cannot blame any Senator for doing things which by no means are corrupt, by no means against the law, but just things that put them into the public eye, things that attract attention to their services. The polls show that while the Senate as a whole may not merit this degree of approval, practically every Senator has the overwhelming majority of approval of the people of his State. The legislation that he is offering tends to be that which has the support of his people.

If the Senator had an amendment pending, be it an amendment which would be accepted by the committee, where ordinarily we might just accept it and get on with the business of the Senate, would it not be to the Senator's advantage to insist on a rollcall vote notwithstanding that fact. While that rollcall is going on people will see it on television. All of that period of time they are voting on the Jones amendment, and that impresses people. Here are all those Senators voting on Senator Jones' amendment. They will watch with interest to see who will vote for their Senator's amendment. Does that not tend to create interest in that Senator to a favorable extent?

Mr. STENNIS. The Senator has described a practical situation. You cannot just cut a Senator off. People will ask, "Why do you not make him shut up?" Well, it is not done that way. You have to give him his day. We owe it to him. But things will develop along these lines.

The Senator from Louisiana has handled a world of legislation where he has done such a fine job. He knows the work in getting a bill passed here very well.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I ask the Senator, who has served as chairman of the Armed Services Committee and who has served as chairman of many important subcommittees on the Appropriations Committee as well a question. Has he had this experience while managing a measure here on the floor: To have someone offer an amendment, then the manager offer to take the amendment without there being an objection. But, someone wants a rollcall vote, there then would be a rollcall vote, which delays the Senate. Senators are told to come and vote on something where the committee would accept it, where there would be no opposition.

Mr. STENNIS. We have to have self-discipline in that field. We have been too good to each other, too lenient. I have known the days here when you could not get a rollcall vote unless at least one of the floor leaders backed you up. They just would not do it unless they thought it deserved a rollcall vote. If it was a policy question, it need not have a rollcall vote. That is why we only had 73 in 1948.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator tell us how much time the average rollcall vote will consume?

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, the minimum is 15 minutes for the actual calling of the roll. It takes about 25 minutes to wrap it up, I would think.

Mr. LONG. I just want to say to the Senator, to make it clear from the point of view of this Senator that it has been my experience that to have someone offer an amendment to a Finance Committee bill—not one time, it happened several times. We would have someone offer an amendment to a Finance Committee bill. As the manager of the bill, the Senator from Louisiana would offer to accept the amendment, then we would have that Senator insist on a rollcall. Then the Senate had to go through a rollcall. That consumes a lot of time.

The point I am making is that if the Senate were on live TV, with as many as a million people out there looking at this—that is only one-half of 1 percent of our population—then it tends to implant in the public's mind the name of the Senator—who he is, what he is interested in—to see the Senate voting, all the Senators coming in and voting on Senator Jones' amendment. So we would have a great deal more of this thing of people insisting on a rollcall vote when it is not necessary.

In fact, a Senator told me, and I guess this has occurred to the Senator from Mississippi, a Senator told me if this comes along, he will never offer his amendments to the committee. He will wait and offer his amendments on the floor, because when he does that, he is before his constituents. His constituents will see him offering an amendment and even if it is voted down, it would be approved by a majority of his constituents. They see their Senator moving and he is the Senator getting attention during the time it is being voted. I ask the Senator how much additional time that would require of the Senate.

Mr. STENNIS. That would require a bit and we have to go to closing down on those matters rather than opening them up.

As I said, when the Senator from Louisiana and I came here, someone had worked out rules even before then that made it possible for the Senate to move along better to dispatch its business. Now it has been greatly increased and we shall open things up here to a Pandora's box.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. Yes, I yield.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I wanted to ask if it would be better, because I am an advocate of TV in the galleries. I have such great respect for my colleagues. From some of the arguments I have heard, I wonder if it would not be better if we operated in secret.

Are not arguments being advanced against television here that I have heard of, in the old days, when there were some debates when the Senate considered operating in secret. All the arguments that I have heard in support of operating on the Senate floor without any galleries, in the debate to open the galleries, the same arguments were used, and on letting the press cover even our proceedings here. I ask this question very seriously, and I meant to follow through with my colleague from Louisiana, for whom I have such high regard, and I am asking these questions in a very friendly fashion. It seems to me the argument that I have heard is if a Senator is going to be giving a speech for the folks back home, he might do that in the press gallery or try to say something the press will quote. Almost the same arguments are being repeated here as during the debate on whether the Senate should operate without a gallery or without press coverage.

Maybe this does not fit in here. I do not mean to ask this question here, especially. Perhaps my colleague from Louisiana could comment later. But would not these arguments support operating in secret on the Senate floor?

Mr. STENNIS. There is a special provision in the resolution itself that does not give the Rules Committee control over that part of the proceedings.

The Senator brought up a section that I was just about ready to point out in particular, that the provision in Senate Resolution 20 as written now says that the Rules Committee shall control the operation and the extent and so forth of the application of this privilege of telecasting.

It seems to me that that language is a very brazen statement to the effect that the Senate is going to surrender all its powers in that field once the resolution is passed, and turn it over to a committee, the Rules Committee, composed of a majority very carefully worked out. One party will have a majority along with the other committees. Then maybe, when the membership changes, it will shift back and forth.

The point is that no single committee on a matter as far-reaching as this should be given control of the operation of matters on the floor. It just will not work at all. I do not know what prompted that. No evil prompted it, of course, but it just shows that we get into problems to start with that absolutely would not work. Then we would be having a majority vote down in the Rules Committee, however fine they are, and they have to pass on this and that. To ask them to favor one Senator over another for political reasons—we cannot submit to a rule of that kind, I say to the Senators. If we are going to have this thing, we shall have to have a modus operandi that will give both sides an equal say in some fashion as to how matters are going to operate.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I say it is fortunate the Senate brought up this matter about secrecy because I think it should be discussed somewhat. May I just revert to the point the Senator made in the beginning?

Nothing could be more irrelevant to this argument than the question of secrecy. I do not know what arguments were made when the Senate first built the gallery in the early days of the Senate. I have not researched it. I could not care less, because secrecy has nothing to do with this debate. We have a Press Gallery that, when the debate started, was fully manned. At the moment, it is partially manned. But if someone makes a harsh mistake out here, or someone says something that could mean his political demise, that gallery would be filled in a hurry, because there are a few behind that door standing by. They would get the word to their colleagues that something exciting is happening at the moment.

This body is covered at all times by the major wire services and by the networks. While it is true that those people from time to time do not have their full membership in the Press Gallery, they have somebody around representing them at all times. If anyone says something on the floor that is important from a news point of view, they have arrangements with all their friends to call them immediately and tell them something exciting is happening here. And that Press Gallery would fill up in a hurry.

The press and also the TV and radio networks are very much tuned in. They know everything that happens in the Senate. I must admit that, on occasion, somebody has placed something in the RECORD that they have paid scant attention to in spite of our best efforts on that occasion, but if it is newsworthy, they will correct their error in a hurry.

Also, may I say that every word we speak is taken down and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following morning.

It is totally irrelevant, Mr. President, the issue of secrecy. If people want to know what is going on, they can find out.

Mr. PRESSLER. If my colleague will yield further, the argument was made yesterday that if we have TV in the Senate Gallery, there will be Senators making speeches for the folks back home. Perhaps now we are making speeches for the folks in the press gallery.

What is the difference? I think if we had TV and radio in here, we would not have to depend on the news media to filter out certain things. Judgments could be made by the American people who wish to watch.

In a lot of our State legislatures, including my own, actually the quality of debate has gone up. There is no closed rule in our State legislature; but as to the people who have abused it, it is quite apparent that our people out there are very perceptive. If they see us abusing the speechmaking privilege here, they are going to reward or punish that Member.

I think there is nothing like the American voters being able to see their representatives.

If we adopt the arguments of the Senator from Louisiana, we would certainly want to have this Chamber be secret, because we certainly would not want a situation where somebody might be giving a speech to the Press Gallery, and somebody else might be making a speech because some people from his home State are in the gallery.

There are a lot of motives that might be construed, other than legislative, under the guidelines laid down yesterday by the Senator from Louisiana.

It seems to me that if we are to follow through on the logic of the Senator from Louisiana, we would go back to the debates in the early days, when we were trying to decide whether to make this a secret chamber in which only deliberations would occur that only the Members would know about and speeches would not be given for any reason other than legislative, presumably.

Surely, the logic the Senator from Louisiana is putting forth is an argument for secrecy on the Senate floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. STENNIS. Yes, I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, We have the press, the TV and the radio represented here. We have all these seats in the gallery, including a special section for diplomats from foreign countries, and all those seats are not filled. If anyone, in addition, wants to come and fill one of those seats, he can. Everything is being taken down and put in the RECORD.

To talk about secrecy, I think, is irrelevant.

I did make the point that it will take a great deal more time, just as the fact that one would find it necessary perhaps to address himself one way with less technical language when he is addressing himself to the people back home.

But the point I was stressing was that it would take much more time and without getting the public's work done the way it is now.

I know that my colleague, who has served in the State legislature, will address this matter later in this debate. His impression is the same as every member of our State legislature with whom I have discussed the matter. Even when they put the radio in the Louisiana Legislature there, it enormously extended and increased the amount of debate.

When the cameras were in there or when the radios were in there, when people felt they were being heard by the broad audience out there, it just stimulated a great deal more discussion than it did when that was not the case. In fact, the experience we had in our State legislature is that it takes a great deal more time. In fact, they say it usually takes about twice that time.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at this point?

Mr. STENNIS. Yes, I yield.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I planned to make remarks after the Senator from Mississippi had completed his presentation, and I apologize to him for the interruption. On that particular point—that is, the possibility that television will extend the time spent in session and greatly burden our physical resources—that is not what happened in the House of Representatives.

I have before me a list of the days in session of the House of Representatives in the 96th Congress, the 1st and 2d sessions, and in the 97th Congress.

They began televising House proceedings in the 96th Congress, and the hours in session went down every year, from 975 to 653 this past year, after television.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield to me at this point?

Mr. STENNIS. Yes, I will yield briefly.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as I explained yesterday, experience in the House is not comparable to that in the Senate. The House operates under a closed rule. The House of Representatives has a rule under which they can limit their time to half that much, even though a great number of Representatives would like to speak twice as much as they are doing now.

We do not operate under House rules, and that is one of the strongest arguments I know against adopting this measure—that we would be compelled to go to a rule similar to that in the House. That would mean an end to free debate in the U.S. Senate.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am not going to ask the Senator to yield on that point. I will cover that point when I have an opportunity to gain the floor in my own right. But I note, if the Senator will permit me to say so, that I completely disagree with that. I do not think it would push us toward a closed rule. I think it would open up the Senate in terms of observations that the country can make and in terms of the way we conduct our business.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I do not expect to keep the floor much longer. I will have something more to say later about this matter.

I think we should understand fully now that we are no doubt making the most far-reaching change here that has been made in a long, long time, with reference to the possibility of the practices on this floor by perhaps just a few Members. Nevertheless, those few can be very effective in bringing about certain conditions in an election year, in a Presidential election year, and so forth, in which a small number could nevertheless dominate the entire atmosphere of this floor, using almost unlimited time.

There is no way to control or restrict—of course, you cannot do so under the American system—what a person is going to say on any points, so long as he is decent about it. I think we are just opening up a Pandora's box, and we can very easily carry on all the traditions and needs of the situation without this.

Another point, Mr. President. If we are going to open this up to what is said here, we certainly have to be honest about it and not lead the people of America to believe that what they can see just on the camera, the person making the speech, is the whole story of what is going on around here.

If we are going to be honest about it, we will have to show them day after day all these vacant seats. Somebody will have to make explanations of some kind as to where the Senators are, that they are in the committees, and so forth, carrying on there as best they can.

That opens up the question whether or not a Senator is satisfied with the explanation that was made as to where he was. He may want to come in and explain that.

I think we would be dishonest if we were just to give a nice looking picture of the Senator delivering a speech and say, period, that is what is going on in the Senate today.

That does not tell the story of what is going on here in the Senate today.

Another thing: I make no reference to the present situation. This is kind of an easy going debate here. But in my concept of the U.S. Senate, it is out of order if the Presiding Officer is not in order, and he cannot be in order and talk on the telephone and preside over the Senate.

I am not alluding to our present situation here. This is kind of a free running debate. But it takes a lot of the wind out of me, when I am making a speech, to look up there and see all of a sudden that the Presiding Officer is talking to somebody—I do not know where. I might have said something that caused him to think, and he might be transmitting it, but probably not.

I say this in good fun to our present Presiding Officer who graces the chair. He is very effective.

I think we will have to put that on the cameras, too, and let people see just how things are going here.

There is one other thing I wish to refer to, and this is not something started by our leaders. I do not know how it started. I refer to the congregation down here in the well, when everybody comes in, first 2, or 3, or 4 down there, and you look around and there are 10, or 12, and then 15, or 20, then 35, or 40, or 50. I have seen it when it looked like 60 people were standing around down there.

And I kind of halfway overheard a lady say in the gallery "What in the world are they doing?" And someone said, "They don't know what they are doing."

I do not know. That might have been a pretty good observation.

We come in here under the pressure of these conditions now and one of the ways that remains to find out is when you meet and talk down there with someone in the well who is knowledgeable in the field that this vote is on. We are trimmed down to that thin source, after all.

So, there has to be some explanation of that. I think we have to put these rollcall votes on television. Let the public see that also. Otherwise, we would just be misleading the viewers.

So, that illustrates the serious problems that it brings up, and this is the trouble we can stay out of, if we just clean up our house. Let us put it this way, that at the very most let us clean up our house and straighten up the furniture and get into better habits and make a better appearance before we go on TV.

We should not just turn it loose now as it is. I have already spoken of the great respect I have for our leadership. We are to blame. I blame the membership, not them. But if we have to have television, just have to have it, let us go to work and work hard for a year to improve our own behavior here and our own responses and then when we get in better shape it might increase the chance of this resolution passing, but it might not.

My counsel is let us at least clean house, get it in order, reform ourselves and then come back and consider these matters quite seriously which I am sure we will.

Mr. President, I do wish to make some other points later in this debate.

For the time being I yield the floor.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it would be difficult for me to overstate the respect and affection I have for the distinguished Senator from Mississippi. As I indicated earlier, I have respected him almost to the point of veneration on the floor of the Senate for his personal bravery and courage and for the example he has set for those of us who have had the privilege of serving with him over the years.

I respect his remarks and evaluation of the present situation, and he understands that when I disagree with him on major elements of this debate I do so without personal rancor and with no diminution of my respect for him as a Senator or as an individual.

Mr. President, I said on yesterday and I will repeat now in response to the suggestion that we should get our house in order before we go on television a story I like to tell that probably is not true, but illustrates a point, and that is, the experience Will Rogers had years ago after he had been in Washington for a while. Will Rogers was a great philosopher and a great humorist, but he was also an active observer of the political scene.

The story goes that Rogers went home after a few months in Washington and was walking down the streets of his home town and someone said, "Will, is it true, that Congress is made up of thieves and rascals?" He said. "Yes, but it is a good cross section of its constituency."

Mr. President, Congress is not made up of thieves and rascals but we are a good cross section of our constituency. We are indeed a microcosm of America. Sometimes, our arguments are better than they are at other times. But there is no point in us cleaning up our act. We are what we are. And we are a good cross section of America and because of that, America is entitled to watch and to know what we are doing in the gallery of the Senate and on television, in my judgment.

I have listened to the arguments for the last couple of days and I respect them and I understand the concern that Senators express about broadcasting to the Nation. But, Mr. President, there is an old saying on television, used by one of the Saturday night shows on one network, which will remain unidentified. "It Is Not Yet Ready For Prime Time Players." No one is going to contend that the Senate has to be prime time fare and on all four networks. We are going to be lucky or unlucky depending on your point of view if we have a few watchers on the cable, and every now and then we get a little time on the 6:30 news, or I think it is 7 o'clock here in Washington. We are usually late. We are going to be lucky if anyone watches for a while.

But, Mr. President, we should do nothing to change the nature of the Senate. The Senate is a great institution. It is the balance wheel which keeps democracy on track. It is the framework on which the Republic is constructed. It is the essence of compromise. It is the only place where there is unfettered expression of individual views. It is the last fortress that can be used to defend against the tyranny of a temporary majority.

I would not change a thing about that. I have no hesitation about the people of this country seeing this Chamber in action.

I would not want to dress up our act. I would not want to clean up the house.

Some say, Mr. President, with great sincerity and concern, and I understand, that television may provide a forum, no matter how large or small, for a Senator to advance his or her political career and to run for President from the floor of the Senate. I may say parenthetically that running for President from the floor of the Senate is a remarkably unrewarding experience, and I speak from firsthand knowledge as some of my friends here in this Chamber can too. While it is also true that the Senate is the cradle of Presidential candidates and Presidents, I do not think that is any significant problem. I can think of only a few Members of this body who can go up to the gallery or out on the steps or wherever they go and almost automatically get on the network news. Maybe televising the Senate will give everyone a chance. It might be nice. At least you would not be cut and end up on the editor's floor if it was live and gavel-to-gavel on the cable.

Maybe millions will not watch, but someone will watch and in any event the country will see, through the extension of the electronic media as if they were in the gallery, the workings of the Senate as it is, without embellishment, without apology, in the essence of the genius which is this body.

So, Mr. President, I do not think that we are likely to provide a forum for Presidential candidates. I think on the contrary we are more likely to introduce to the American people an array of 100 Senators, every one of whom, without exception, has special qualifications that the country should be acquainted with and special talents that will commend them to this Nation and not just to the constituency of their State. We are Senators of the United States and in a very real way all of us represent every person in this country as well as our own States. Television in the Senate will give every Senator a chance to be seen at least by those who wish to see firsthand the operations of this, the greatest deliberative body on Earth.

Mr. President, the point was made that it is a great expense. There has been a lot of controversy about the cost. I am no expert on that.

But the testimony, as I recall it, in the Rules Committee was that the initial cost of installing television together with all the attendant paraphernalia would be something slightly in excess of $3 million, and by the way I am told by staff of the Rules Committee that those figures were based on retail list prices for equipment and I expect that that is probably not what we should pay. If it is, we should get after whoever it is that is buying the equipment.

But it is an initial cost of about $3 million. I personally do not think it will run that high. After the system is in place, the costs per year, according to the Rules Committee testimony and report, will be approximately $300,000 a year, which is about 600 pages in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It costs us more than most people realize to publish the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I can assure you.

Mr. President, it is not an extraordinary expense in terms of the return on that investment, the return that will come from the penetrating gaze of the sovereign citizen who can see firsthand the innermost workings of this body as it goes about the business of formulating the public policy of the Republic.

I apologized earlier for interrupting the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Louisiana in the midst of their colloquy as it related to the concern expressed that television in the Senate would unduly extend and prolong the nature of debate. At that time I made a point that I will repeat: According to the official records of the Congress since the House of Representatives began televising its sessions gavel to gavel, the number of hours in session for the House of Representatives has dropped from 1,116 in the last session of the 95th Congress to 653 hours in the first session of the 97th Congress.

The result has been dramatic. There is no shortage of business transacted by the House of Representatives. Indeed, the size of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, considering their business transactions and legislation and their extension of remarks, is approximately the same now as it was then.

The volume of business is not very different. But the hours in session are dramatically different, almost 50 percent less, and that suggests to me, Mr. President, that with the constant inexorable attention that television provides it is an incentive for people to tighten up their debate, to say what they have on their minds without repetition, and to present it in a more attractive and legible way.

I believe, Mr. President, that the House of Representatives is greatly improved in terms of the general conduct of their debate, perhaps even in the total operations of that body since the advent of gavel-to-gavel coverage by live television.

We are not speaking, Mr. President, of a sponsored program. We are not competing with the daytime or nighttime soap operas. We are not competing with some great social event or sports event or even some great political event. We are proposing two things: First, that there be coverage of this body for those who wish to see it, regardless of the size of the audience; and second, that the proceedings of this body should be recorded permanently on magnetic tape and stored in the Library of Congress for future scholars and historians to examine and to understand.

Every day that goes by recording our proceedings only on the printed page robs a future generation and some future historian of the opportunity to hear and understand the energy, the humanity, the feelings, the pathos, and the humor that go into the debate—all of which humanize the consideration of the great issues before this Republic.

It is like Mathew Brady deciding to burn all his negatives after the Civil War, or the Continental Congress destroying video tapes of their proceedings. Incidentally, the first Constitutional Convention was closed, which created a huge furor, and Congress also was closed. The Senate was, at least for the first, I believe, 7 years of the Republic, without even a public gallery, until it succumbed to pressure to open it up to public scrutiny. I repeat what I said, that if we had had television then, we would have had it televised then. But we did not.

In any event, Mr. President, I think the time has come—it may not be convenient to televise the Senate, we may not like it, we may not like the remarks that come from some of our constituents about some of our speeches and positions, we may not like the effect it has on our chances and prospects for reelection, we may not like it when the people do not like what we do on a particular issue—but we are what we are, and the business of the Senate is not to conceal what we are. The business of the Senate is to do the public's work in a public place, and television, Mr. President, is the next and best step that we can take for that purpose.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT—VOTING PROCEDURE ON THURSDAY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, earlier today and on yesterday the distinguished minority leader and I notified the Senate of the possibility of altering the existing unanimous-consent request in respect to a vote on a motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 20, as well as the vote on the Helms-Johnston amendment No. 69 to S. 951, the Department of Justice authorization bill.

I am happy to report that on this side of the aisle I am able to clear the unanimous-consent request that covers both of those points. I have discussed this with the minority leader. If he is prepared to proceed, I am prepared now to state the request for his consideration and that of the Senate.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I am prepared to proceed.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday, February 4, at 11 a.m., S. 951 be laid before the Senate and that amendment No. 69, as amended by the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS), be made pending, with a time limitation of 90 minutes, to be equally divided between the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON), and the Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Reserving the right to object.

Mr. BAKER. Just one moment, Mr. President.

Mr. President, to restate that, I ask unanimous consent that on February 4, at 11 a.m., S. 951 be laid before the Senate and that amendment No. 69, as amended by the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS), be made pending with a time limitation of 90 minutes, to be divided into three equal portions of 30 minutes each as follow: 30 minutes to the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER), 30 minutes to the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON), and 30 minutes under the control of the Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN).

Further, I ask unanimous consent that at 1:30 p.m. on Thursday, February 4, the Senate proceed to a rollcall on amendment No. 69 to S. 951; that following the disposition of amendment No. 69, as amended, pursuant to the unanimous-consent agreement of December 14, 1981, S. 951 be laid aside, notwithstanding any cloture motion which may be filed in connection therewith, and that S. 951 may be called up at any subsequent time by the majority leader, after consultation with the minority leader, with a vote on any such cloture motion to occur 1 hour after the Senate returns to the consideration of the bill.

Finally, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the rollcall vote on amendment No. 69, as amended, the Senate proceed to vote on the Baker motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 20.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, is it the understanding of the Senate, Mr. President, that following the rollcall vote on amendment No. 69, as amended, the Senate would proceed, without further debate and immediately, to a vote on the Baker motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 20, without any intervening motion or quorum call?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, Mr. President, that is my intention.

I would inquire of the Chair if that is the effect of the request as it is presently stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As has been modified by the minority leader, that will be the effect.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I adopt the language of the minority leader in respect to the modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, before the Chair rules, may I put a question in respect to my own request? During the time for debate, as provided for in this request on amendment No. 69, would it be in order for any Senator to submit a petition for cloture under rule XXII prior to the disposition of the vote on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be in order.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator is not asking for any change in the order, as I understand it. He is asking if it would be in order.

Mr. BAKER. That is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, may I ask the distinguished majority leader a further question? With respect to the vote on amendment No. 69, as amended, which would precede the vote on the Baker motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 20, a motion to reconsider and a motion to table a motion to reconsider are not ruled out?

Mr. BAKER. They are not ruled out under the form of this request, Mr. President, as I understand it. I inquire of the Chair if that is the Chair's interpretation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As further modified, they would be allowed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, is it not also a fact that under the agreement there would be no time for debate on such motion to reconsider?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, may I ask one further question of the distinguished majority leader? Is it the understanding that following the votes on an amendment by Mr. HELMS and on the motion to proceed by Mr. BAKER there would be no further rollcall votes tomorrow?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, Mr. President, I wish to announce at this time that after those two rollcall votes, or the disposal of these two matters, there would be no further rollcall votes on Thursday. After examining the calendar of items that might be available for action, I can find nothing that would usefully engage the attention of the Senate on Friday. Therefore, it would be my intention to ask the Senate to recess over until Monday.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. President, it is conceivable that there could be a series of rollcall votes. Would the distinguished majority leader also include in his request that after the first rollcall vote on the amendment by Mr. HELMS, any subsequent rollcall votes would be back to back, limited to 10 minutes, with the exception of the vote on the motion to proceed?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have no problem with that. To restate the suggestion of the minority leader, the vote on the amendment would be 15 minutes in length. If there are other votes, such as a motion to reconsider, on which there would be no time for debate, or a motion to table, on which there would be no time for debate, then those votes, if either of those votes occurred, would be 10 minutes each, if they were back to back.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. The rollcall vote on the motion to proceed, which also would be back to back under this configuration, would be 15 minutes in length.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. President, I include that in my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator would be so kind, I would like to inquire of him how this works out assuming that the Senate agreed to a motion to invoke cloture by Mr. JOHNSTON——

Mr. BAKER. It is not a cloture vote. It is a vote on the amendment.

Mr. LONG. A vote on the amendment. Assuming the Senate agrees to the motion to proceed, which I anticipate is likely to happen, what will we be discussing by the time we get through with all these votes? What will we be talking about tomorrow afternoon?

Mr. BAKER. I say to my friend from Louisiana, if nobody derails the train, we will have two votes tomorrow afternoon and go out until Monday, at which time we will begin consideration of Senate Resolution 20 on its merits.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I would like to express my appreciation to the majority leader at this time for his courtesy in rearranging the time for the vote to occur on tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader. I am most pleased to do that. I thank him for supplying suggestions and information on how best these matters can be handled.

THE EXECUTIVE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have two other small matters. One deals with the Executive Calendar of today.

I will advise the minority leader that I have certain nominations which have been cleared on my side and I wonder if there are any names on that calendar today which he is in a position to consider by unanimous consent at this moment.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I regret to advise the distinguished majority leader that the minority is not ready to proceed with those at this time.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. ON TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until the hour of 10 a.m. on Thursday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BENTSEN ON TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) be recognized under a special order for not to exceed 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. It is my intention, Mr. President, to provide a brief time for the transaction of routine morning business after the special orders, but I will not do that at this moment so that we can assess the situation at that time.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am prepared at this time to ask the Senate to go into time for the transaction of routine morning business if there is no other business on the pending motion to be disposed of.

I see no Senator seeking recognition for that purpose.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now have a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past the hour of 3:15 p.m., during which Senators may speak for not more than 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. I yield the floor.

TWO-YEAR BUDGET CYCLE—S. 1683

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, early last week, our colleague, the junior Senator from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE), introduced a bill to establish a 2-year budget cycle. I welcome the Senator to the evergrowing number of Members of Congress who feel that the time for such a change has come.

On the day marking the end of the last fiscal year, Senators BUMPERS, DANFORTH, PELL, and I introduced S. 1683, which among other changes in our budget process, would provide for 24-month budgeting and appropriating. Since then, as Members have come to realize more and more that our present 12-month cycle is simply inadequate, there have been frequent statements in support of the biennial budget concept.

In a few days, the President will be submitting to Congress his budget proposals for fiscal 1983. I need not remind my colleagues that we are far from completing our work on the 1982 budget.

The third continuing resolution for fiscal 1982 expires on March 31.

Three major appropriation bills have yet to be finalized.

We still must adopt a third fiscal 1982 budget resolution; and very shortly the first fiscal 1983 budget resolution, and possibly a reconciliation resolution shortly thereafter.

The time is simply too short to accomplish these tasks with any assurance of doing it right, if, indeed, at all.

I have asked the Budget and Governmental Affairs Committee chairmen for early hearings on S. 1683. I hope Senator QUAYLE will join us in this request so that adoption of the 2-year budget procedures can occur soon.

May I take this occasion also to urge all of my colleagues to join in the request for early hearings. The need for this change becomes more apparent with each passing day. We must now give it the attention and consideration it deserves.

THE U.S. EMPLOYMENT SERVICE IS VITAL

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, since my Senate responsibilities require that I stay close to this Chamber today, I ask that you allow me to take this opportunity to lend my support to hundreds of New Yorkers who are now assembled to protest the actions recently taken by this administration to dismantle the U.S. Employment Service. It is with some measure of relief, I am sure, that they gather today with the knowledge that the administration has already reversed its position. On Monday, President Reagan asked Congress to approve $210 million in supplemental appropriations to restore funding for the staff of State employment security agencies. Although a crisis has been avoided, our concern must not wane.

Let me briefly explain the background to this averted crisis so that my colleagues may fully appreciate the serious nature of the administration's actions. During the consideration of the third continuing resolution, many of our colleagues in the House of Representatives and many in this body, myself among them, were concerned that the size of the reductions being made in the grants to States for unemployment insurance and employment services threatened to undermine the fiscal soundness of the unemployment insurance system. In order to avoid this outcome, we included a provision in the bill to the effect that appropriated funds could not be used to close down unemployment insurance offices.

Let me be very clear, and the record of these debates will verify my point. We carefully explained in both the Senate and House reports that we would provide a supplemental for additional administrative costs should unemployment rise and the cost of an increased UI workload exceed appropriated levels. Despite our carefully written record of congressional intent, however, this administration decided to cut the funding for local Employment Service offices far below even the President's September budget request, in order to divert resources for unemployment insurance service operations.

The numbers tell the rest of the story. Under the administration's plan, thousands of Employment Service staff across the country would have been laid off, and at a time when they are needed the most. In my own State of New York, 57 percent of our statewide employment service staff would have needlessly lost their jobs.

What is unsettling now that this crisis has been averted and the administration has asked for supplemental funds is the alarming fact that the administration would ever have conceived of so severely dismantling the U.S. Employment Service. We can expect by the end of this week that the unemployment rate will be the highest level experienced by our Nation since the Depression. In the face of record levels of unemployment, however, the Reagan administration has cut back funding for CETA by 61 percent, for trade adjustment assistance by 83 percent, for WIN by 33 percent, and the list goes on. And now, without congressional approval—and it seems to me in violation of congressional intent—the administration unsuccessfully attempted a stab at the Employment Service, a service which has been the principal and most effective provider of publicly supported job search assistance since the beginning of the 1930's.

The Employment Service's record of success is important here. Not only unemployed workers but employers as well agree that the service ES provides in facilitating the match between unemployed workers and unfilled jobs is hardly a wasteful or unnecessary expenditure of Government funds. Indeed, in fiscal year 1981 alone, the Employment Service placed about 5½ million unemployed workers in jobs.

There is a troublesome insensitivity to the plight of the unemployed underlying the administration's recent actions regarding the Employment Service. The administration acted on its own discretion to the detriment of not only employers and unemployed workers, but to the very integrity of the Employment Service as well. I am concerned that we watch more carefully for this sort of insensitivity—guised as fiscal accountability—as we consider administration proposals for further budget cuts in training programs and the like. As economic conditions worsen in the near future, I look to this body to hold strong for this Nation's longstanding commitment to helping unemployed workers get back to work. The U.S. Employment Service is a vital part of that commitment, and I trust this body will continue to give the Service its steadfast support.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

At 2:36 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its clerks, announced that the House has passed the following bill, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 5397. An act to amend Public Law 97-76 to extend the period during which authorities provided under the Department of Justice Appropriation Authorization Act, Fiscal Year 1980, are continued in effect.

EXECUTIVE AND OTHER COMMUNICATIONS

The following communications were laid before the Senate, together with accompanying papers, reports, and documents, which were referred as indicated:

EC-2571. A communication from the Secretary of Transportation transmitting, pursuant to law, notice of a violation of law by the Urban Mass Transportation Administration involving spending in excess of appropriations; to the Committee on Appropriations.

EC-2572. A communication from the Secretary of Energy transmitting, pursuant to law, a preliminary report on the prospects for foreign applications of wind energy systems; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

EC-2573. A communication from the Inspector General of the Department of Health and Human Services transmitting, pursuant to law, notice of a proposed computer match of certain social security records of Black Lung beneficiaries; to the Committee on Finance.

EC-2574. A communication from the Inspector General of the Department of Labor transmitting, pursuant to law, notice of a proposed computer match of certain Federal Employees' Compensation records with those of Black Lung beneficiaries; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-2575. A communication from the Acting Assistant Secretary of the Interior for Indian Affairs transmitting, pursuant to law, an assessment of bilingual education needs of Indian children in Department of the Interior schools and those receiving aid under the Johnson-O'Malley Act; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

EC-2576. A communication from the Acting Secretary of Agriculture transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on efforts to operate the tobacco program at no net cost to taxpayers; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

EC-2577. A communication from the Executive Associate Director of the Office of Management and Budget transmitting, pursuant to law, notice of apportionment of an appropriation to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms on a basis necessitating a supplemental appropriation; to the Committee on Appropriations.

EC-2578. A communication from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting, pursuant to law, notice of two violations of law involving expenditure of funds in excess of appropriations by the United States Customs Service; to the Committee on Appropriations.

EC-2579. A communication from the Deputy Secretary of Defense transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on certain officers and employees of Federal Contract Research Centers whose pay exceeds that for Level II of the Executive Schedule; to the Committee on Appropriations.

EC-2580. A communication from the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency transmitting, pursuant to law, a report that the Agency acquired no real or personal property during the quarter ended December 31, 1981; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-2581. A communication from the Assistant Secretary of the Air Force for Research, Development, and Logistics transmitting, pursuant to law, notice of the conversion of the Closed Circuit Television Maintenance function at Andrews Air Force Base, Maryland to performance under contract; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-2582. A communication from the Assistant Secretary of the Air Force for Research, Development, and Logistics transmitting, pursuant to law, notice of the conversion of the commissary shelf-stocking and custodial services function at Hanscom Air Force Base, Massachusetts to performance under contract; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-2583. A communication from the Assistant Secretary of the Air Force for Research, Development, and Logistics transmitting, pursuant to law, notice of the conversion of the transient alert services function at Hill Air Force Base, Utah to performance under contract; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following executive reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. PERCY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Walter J. Stoessel, Jr., of the District of Columbia, a Career Member of the Senior Foreign Service with the personal rank of Career Ambassador, to be Deputy Secretary of State;

Powell Allen Moore, of Georgia, to be an Assistant Secretary of State;

John R. Bolton, of Virginia, to be an Assistant Administrator of the Agency for International Development.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I also report favorably a nomination list in the Senior Foreign Service which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 15, 1981, and, to save the expense of reprinting them on the Executive Calendar, I ask that they may lie on the Secretary's desk for the information of Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. JEPSEN:

S. 2054. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that the 1982 individual income tax rate reductions made by the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 be given a full year effect for purposes of withholding, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. HAYAKAWA:

S. 2055. A bill for the relief of Vottoria Givone; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TSONGAS (for himself, Mr. CHILES, and Mr. LEVIN):

S. 2056. A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to provide that blind persons may not be employed at less than the applicable minimum wage under that Act; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

By Mr. KASTEN:

SUBMISSION OF CONCURRENT AND SENATE RESOLUTIONS

The following concurrent resolutions and Senate resolutions were read, and referred (or acted upon), as indicated:

By Mr. MATTINGLY:

S. Con. Res. 61. Concurrent resolution to direct the Commissioner of Social Security and the Secretary of Health and Human Resources to conduct a study on steps which might be taken to correct the social security benefit disparity known as the notch problems; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. HATCH (for himself and Mr. KENNEDY):

S. Con. Res. 62. Concurrent resolution to congratulate Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America on the celebration of its 70th anniversary; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. JEPSEN:

S. 2054. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that the 1982 individual income tax rate reductions made by the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 be given a full year effect for purposes of withholding, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

REDUCTION IN TAX WITHHOLDING

Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation, and asking that it be referred to the appropriate committee. The legislation will give the Treasury Secretary authority to immediately reduce tax withholding for individuals to reflect the 10-percent tax cut scheduled for July. The idea is not to increase the size of the tax cut in any way, merely to amortize or spread it out over the entire calendar year. For this reason, the cost to the Treasury should be nil.

When we enacted the Economic Recovery Tax Act last year, it was not yet apparent that the Nation was moving so swiftly into a recession. Consequently, this factor was not taken into consideration when the timing of the tax cut was agreed upon. Now we are in a sharp recession, with unemployment rising daily. It is too late to enact any new programs to deal specifically with the recession, since it will likely be over by late spring, and it is doubtful that Congress or President Reagan would approve any such program anyway in this time of fiscal austerity. But we have already enacted a tax cut to take effect in July. I am simply urging that we put some of that $16 billion cut into people's pockets now, when they need it most.

By putting money into people's pockets now, we will help stimulate lagging retail sales, help offset the social security tax increase which took place January 1, help hard-pressed Americans coping with declining real incomes, and, hopefully, put some people back to work. All of this will be done without increasing Government spending or enlarging the tax cut one penny in a manner totally consistent with the President's economic program.

I also believe that this proposal will help reduce any possible inflationary pressure which might arise from enactment of the tax cut as currently scheduled. Since we will likely be in recovery by July, some of the fiscal stimulus may put pressure on prices. Putting dollars into the economy now, when there is a high degree of slack, however, would make it far less likely that there will be any impact on prices.

The only conceivable criticism I can imagine is that reducing tax withholding now will cause the Treasury to borrow somewhat more money in the first half of this year. However, it will borrow less in the second half of the year. Moreover, since the recession is the main factor fueling the budget deficit, insofar as we are able to mitigate the effects of the recession, it will favorably impact on the budget. By the same token, we will be shifting about $4 billion of the tax cut from fiscal 1983, which begins on October 1, back into fiscal 1982. Thus, although this may increase the fiscal 1982 deficit somewhat—that is the year we are in now—the fiscal 1983 deficit will be reduced. Consequently, there is no reason why financial markets should react unfavorably to this legislation.

I am leaving open the question of precisely how the withholding schedules should be adjusted, since it obviously depends on when this legislation becomes law. We could simply mail a check to each taxpayer for the excess withholding from the first of the year, or we could prorate the withholding from whatever date is feasible. I personally see no reason why, if we act quickly, workers could not begin to see the results in their paycheck by April 1. This legislation simply gives the Treasury Secretary authority to make whatever adjustment seems reasonable.

Whatever date we choose doesn't really matter in the end, Mr. President. Giving people a 10-percent tax cut for half the year is the same as giving a 5-percent tax cut for the whole year, since the Tax Code cannot differentiate between income earned in the first part of the year or the last part of the year. Either way, it works out to be about a $16 billion cut. I am only saying that we ought to let people see some of that money in their paychecks today, rather than waiting until July. The only thing being changed is the withholding in one's paycheck each week. No change would be made in the tax rates or any other part of the Economic Recovery Tax Act.

I know that some of my colleagues are supporting plans to move the tax rate reduction itself up to January. But this would have the effect of enlarging the tax cut, and therefore the deficit, whereas my plan accomplishes much the same result at essentially no cost.

Keep in mind that workers could accomplish this same result on their own by increasing the number of deductions on their W-2 forms now and then reducing them in July proportionately. And certainly any taxpayer who is self-employed and making estimated tax payments quarterly has already made such an adjustment. This only reinforces the need to reduce withholding now so that all workers can benefit.

In conclusion, it makes obvious economic sense to put some tax cut dollars into people's pockets now. The economy is sluggish, sales are slow, unemployment is high and production is at almost a standstill in some industries. Reducing withholding taxes now will increase purchasing power when the economy needs it. Increasing demand for homes, autos, and other goods may put some people back to work now and set the stage for recovery, which most economists expect shortly in any case. Under the circumstances, I can see no reason not to enact this legislation as soon as possible. I trust and ask that the committee chairman to which this is referred will give it his prompt attention.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) clause (i) of section 3402(a)(3)(B) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to changes made by section 101 of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981) is amended—

(1) by striking out "July 1" and inserting in lieu thereof "January 1"; and

(2) by striking out "10-percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "5-percent".

(b) In prescribing tables and procedures under section 3402(a)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to reflect the amendments made by subsection (a), the Secretary of the Treasury shall—

(1) make such tables and procedures effective as soon as practicable after the date of the enactment of this Act, and

(2) reflect in such tables and procedures the full calendar year effect for 1982 which would have occurred if such amendments had been in effect on January 1, 1982.

By Mr. TSONGAS (for himself, Mr. CHILES, and Mr. LEVIN):

S. 2056. A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to provide that blind persons may not be employed at less than the applicable minimum wage under that act; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

FAIR WAGES FOR BLIND WORKERS

● Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, today I am joining with Senators LEVIN and CHILES to introduce legislation that would bar substandard wages for blind workers. It would amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to provide that blind persons may not be employed at less than the applicable minimum wage.

Currently the law allows blind workers to be paid at a rate that can be as low as 25 percent of the Federal minimum wage. In sheltered workshops, which employ one out of every seven blind workers, a subminimum wage is the norm. Half of these workers are paid less than $1,500 a year.

A few sheltered workshops across the country have shown that fair pay is practical. There are 20 workshops, with more than 5,000 sightless employees, that pay the minimum wage. They produce a variety of products for healthy profits, and they do it without taking economic advantage of the workers.

By contrast, the others use the law to make enormous profits. They are practicing economic discrimination against their blind employees.

Some people are concerned that closing this loophole would adversely affect other benefits—supplemental security income and social security disability insurance. This is unfounded. A blind person can earn above the minimum wage before SSI benefits are reduced.

Although the SSDI rules are not as flexible, a blind worker can earn $5,500 before those benefits are affected. This is much higher than the average subminimum salary under the present law.

Current law is unjust and patronizing the blind workers. It is an affront to the thousands of sightless workers who overcome major barriers to gainful employment. Often they are placed in positions beneath their skills, with little if any hope for advancement.

Mr. President, our blind citizens have many skills to contribute to America's economic strength. They have every right to demand fair compensation for productive efforts . . . every right except the legal right. This legislation, which is strongly supported by the National Federation of the Blind, will finally give these workers the right to a decent wage. I urge my colleagues to join in ending this chronic injustice.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 14(c) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (29 U.S.C. 214(c)) is amended (1) by striking out "(2) and (3)" in paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof "(2), (3), and (4) and (2) by adding after paragraph (3) the following:

"(4) No order, regulation, or certificate may be issued by the Secretary under paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of this subsection with respect to the employment of individuals who are blind or whose sight is impaired.".

S. 2057. A bill to amend title 49, United States Code; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

TRUCKING RECIPROCITY LEGISLATION

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which would address a grave injustice to American trucking firms. My bill would require the Interstate Commerce Commission to consider reciprocity before issuing new licenses to foreign motor carriers seeking new routes in the United States.

The issue is quite simple. Our neighbor to the south, Mexico, prohibits U.S. carriers from conducting business within its borders except on a very limited and arbitrary basis.

The Canadian provinces, as well, control access and operate under restrictive guidelines similar to those in effect in the United States prior to 1980. When the United States adopted more open entry policies 18 months ago in the Motor Carrier Act of 1980 (Public Law 96-296), an unintended competitive disadvantage was created for U.S. motor carriers.

Foreign firms can now gain new routes and new business by penetrating previously protected U.S. markets. But our trucking companies cannot gain the same kind of access to Canadian and Mexican markets because of difficult or discriminatory laws in those countries.

In the past 18 months, hundreds of foreign applications to transport freight across borders and into the States have been received by the ICC. And most have been approved.

Almost 94 percent of the 439 applications by Canadian firms which have been decided by the ICC during the past 18 months have been approved in full or in part. Before 1980, Canadian firms submitted on average only 30 applications a year. The Mexican situation is not nearly as serious, but the potential is there should Mexican firms start making applications.

No wonder American truckers, particularly from States bordering Mexico and Canada, are concerned.

On November 22, 1981, the Honorable Bill Brock, U.S. Special Trade Representative, wrote to the Honorable Reese H. Taylor, Jr., Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, expressing his concerns about this problem, stating:

I understand that the Motor Carrier Act of 1980 does not expressly require reciprocity as a condition to licensing foreign motor carriers.

However, I believe that it is appropriate for the commission to consider the effect that proposed certification will have on existing U.S. motor carriers.

If the pending applications are approved, Canadian motor carriers would be able to offer singleline service to destinations in Canada while U.S. operators could not offer competitive service since they are unable to obtain reciprocal authority to operate in Canada. The result will likely be loss of traffic and revenue by U.S. motor carriers.

Well, Bill Brock's suggestion has made no impact. The ICC simply goes forward granting licenses without regard to nationality.

I ask unanimous consent that a newspaper clipping entitled "Two Canadian Carriers Win U.S. Truck Rights" be inserted in the RECORD immediately following my remarks. This article clearly illustrates that American truckers have protested these decisions to no avail. The review board of the Commission stands by the statement that "it is the Commission's policy not to permit discrimination or favoritism on the basis of a carrier's nationality."

Mr. President, I find that policy unacceptable, especially at a time when unemployment is high in the United States. My bill does not seek to cut off competition. It seeks to encourage competition. But it recognizes that competition is a two-way street.

A constituent from Wisconisn, Mr. Ralph A. Pipp, president of Express Freight Lines, expressed it well in a recent letter. He wrote:

I feel strongly that legislation should be supported which would prevent foreign carriers from obtaining authority from the ICC under the relaxed rules of the Motor Carrier Act of 1980, unless the foreign country would allow American carriers to compete on the same level within their jurisdictions.

I feel the legislation is important to let the ICC know that the intent of Congress is not to promote unfair competition for the domestic companies.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of Mr. Pipp's letter be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

Just this week Bill Brock, in a speech before the European Management Forum in Switzerland, said:

I understand the concern expressed about the current discussion of reciprocity in the United States. I am confident that, under this President, reciprocity will not become a code word for protectionism, but it will be used to state clearly our insistence on equity.

Neither Congress nor the President can continue to tolerate unfair trading practices which adversely affect either our domestic market or our opportunity to trade elsewhere.

Mr. President, those words apply directly to this situation. We simply demand reciprocity for our companies when we permit foreign companies to come into our States.

The legislation I am introducing today will direct the ICC to stop issuing licenses to Mexican and Canadian firms until a process can be worked out so we have equal access. This is a case of equity, and it is clear that only Congress can restore equity to the ICC licensing process.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my bill be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill, article, and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 10922(b) of title 49, United States Code, is amended as follows:

(1) by redesignating paragraphs (4), (5), (6), (7), (8), and (9), and any references thereto, as paragraphs (5), (6), (7), (8), (9), and (10), respectively; and

(2) by inserting after paragraph (3) the following new paragraph:

"(4)(A) The Commission shall issue a certificate to a person authorizing that person to provide transportation in foreign commerce as a motor common carrier of property in single-line service between points in the United States and points in Canada or Mexico if the Commission finds—

"(i) that the person is fit, willing, and able to provide the transportation to be authorized by the certificate and to comply with this subtitle and regulations of the Commission; and

"(ii) the transportation to be authorized is or will be required by the present or future public convenience and necessity after considering (I) the adequacy of available service, (II) the degree of existing competition, (III) the ability and willingness of carriers to provide service to meet the reasonable needs of shippers, (IV) the effect upon existing carriers of granting a new certificate, and (V) the impact on the energy efficiency of existing carriers.

"(B) In any opposed case the Commission shall hold an oral hearing.

"(C) Notwithstanding the provisions of this section, including the provisions of paragraph (5), the Commission shall not issue any certificate authorizing transportation of freight in interstate or foreign commerce to any person domiciled in Canada or Mexico, or owned or controlled by a person or persons domiciled in those countries, whose appropriate governmental body does not permit carriers domiciled in the United States to transport freight within the territory of Canada or Mexico on substantially the same licensing standards as apply to the transportation of freight by its own nationals. Within 90 days after enactment of this paragraph, the Commission shall institute a rulemaking proceeding in order to determine which Canadian and Mexican governmental bodies do not permit United States carriers to transport freight within such territory of Canada or Mexico on substantially the same licensing standards as apply to the transportation of freight by their own nationals.".

SEC. 2. Section 10922(h)(2) of title 49, United States Code, is amended by inserting immediately before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: "and (C) apply the provisions of section 10922(b)(4), where the applicant is a person domiciled in Canada or Mexico or owned or controlled by a person or persons domiciled in those countries".

SEC. 3. Section 10923(b) of title 49, United States Code, is amended by inserting after paragraph (7) the following new paragraph:

"(8) Notwithstanding the provisions of this section, the Commission shall not issue any permit authorizing transportation of freight in interstate or foreign commerce to any person domiciled in Canada or Mexico, or owned or controlled by a person or persons domiciled in those countries, whose appropriate governmental body does not permit carriers domiciled in the United States to transport freight within the territory of Canada or Mexico on substantially the same licensing standards as apply to the transportation of freight by its own nationals. Within 90 days after enactment of this paragraph, the Commission shall institute a rulemaking proceeding in order to determine which Canadian and Mexican governmental bodies do not permit United States carriers to transport freight within such territory of Canada or Mexico or substantially the same licensing standards as apply to the transportation of freight by their own nationals.".

TWO CANADIAN CARRIERS WIN U.S. TRUCK RIGHTS

Review Board No. 2 of the Commission has granted applications by two trucking companies based in Canada for extensive U.S. operating authority.

In a decision served January 19, the board granted D.M.R. Transport (1975), Ltd., authority to haul general commodities, except classes A and B explosives, between border points in Washington, Idaho, Montana, North Dakota, and Minnesota, on the one hand, and points in 27 states on the other. D.M.R. is based in Grinrod, B.C.

The board, in a decision served January 22, granted Provost Cartage authority to transport commodities in bulk between all border points and all points in the U.S., except Alaska and Hawaii. Provost is domiciled in Ville d'Anjou, Que.

U.S. carriers protesting the applications, in addition to the standard complaint about possible traffic diversion, said the Canadian applicants should not be granted U.S. authority because U.S. carriers have difficulty in winning Canadian authority from provincial governments. But the board dismissed the argument, stating that it is the Commission's policy not to permit discrimination or favoritism on the basis of a carrier's nationality.

The board's decisions were issued in MC-143415, Sub. 4, D.M.R. Transport (1975), Ltd., Extension—General Commodities, and MC-123233, Sub. 96, Provost Cartage, Inc., Extension—Canadian Bulk Traffic.

EXPRESS FREIGHT LINES, INC.,
Milwaukee, Wis., January 21, 1982.

Hon. ROBERT W. KASTEN, Jr.,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR KASTEN: Express Freight Lines is a trucking company headquartered in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. At the present time we have approximately 175 employees in the State of Wisconsin. We are a regular route common carrier serving the upper middle west, but primarily a corridor between the southeastern Wisconsin area and Detroit, along with the Canadian gateway. Last year we did approximately $16,000,000 in business.

The Canadian market has been historically and is an extremely important segment of our business. A very serious issue has come up within the trucking industry concerning the issuance of authority by the Interstate Commerce Commission to foreign motor carriers. It is an extremely serious problem and one that concerns us. The prospect of the ICC licensing Canadian carriers to do business in the United States would seriously affect our business.

It would put us into a position of having our Canadian interlines compete directly with us domestically, and we would be restricted from competing with them in the Canadian marketplace. It would give these foreign motor carriers an unfair advantage.

At the present time, we have excellent relations with approximately ten to twelve Canadian carriers and cooperate with them in moving freight between the eastern Canadian markets and the upper middle west.

It's an arrangement that has benefited the shippers and consignees in both these market areas with excellent service and competitive rates. Over the years, the Canadians have extracted a few concessions from the United States already.

For instance, the Canadian carriers are able to deliver within the commercial zone of U.S. cities. This allows a Canadian carrier to make deliveries in the commercial zone of Buffalo or Detroit, amongst other cities. The U.S. carriers are restricted from making deliveries in Canadian commercial zones such as Windsor or Niagara Falls across from Buffalo.

This may seem extremely minor, but it, in fact, is a concession by the U.S. government to the Canadians whereby foreign motor carriers can derive revenue by performing a service within the United States, whereas we are not allowed to do the same with them.

I feel strongly that legislation should be supported which would prevent foreign carriers from obtaining authority from the ICC under the relaxed rules of the Motor Carrier Act of 1980, unless the foreign country would allow American carriers to compete on the same level within their jurisdictions.

I feel the legislation is important to let the ICC know that the intent of Congress is not to promote unfair competition for domestic companies.

Sincerely yours,

RALPH A. PIPP,
President.●

S. 2058. A bill to promote foreign trade in services, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

TRADE IN SERVICES ACT OF 1982

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, today I join my colleagues, Senator CHAFEE and Senator INOUYE, in introducing the Trade in Services Act of 1982. This bill is a bipartisan effort to improve the treatment accorded services in our international trading efforts and to move services issues to center stage in global trade discussions.

The services sector is a large and growing segment of the U.S. economy, and its positive contribution to our trade balance continues to increase. These so-called invisibles—engineering and construction, shipping, insurance, banking, transportation, accounting, communications, and tourist services, just to name a few—generate over half the Nation's gross domestic product and provide jobs for over 54 million Americans. The Commerce Department estimates that U.S. international service activities rose from $92 billion in 1977 to over $128 billion in 1980; and the export component alone in services earned the United States a surplus that year of $35 billion. These export earnings were more than enough to outweigh the $30 billion deficit we suffered in goods.

Services have enabled us to keep a foothold on the positive side of the international trade ledger.

Our recent strong performance in services trade is no cause for complacency, however. While exports continue to grow absolutely, the U.S. share of world invisibles trade has fallen from 25 percent in 1969 to 20 percent in 1976. Moreover, this general trend is repeated in specific sectors.

For example, while assets of foreign branches of U.S. banks doubled from $145 billion in 1975 to $290 billion in 1979, the global market share of U.S. banks declined. In construction and engineering, U.S. firms went from being top world suppliers in 1976 to holding seventh place only 3 years later.

This pattern is repeated in insurance, transportation and throughout the services sector because other countries, attempting to build or protect fledgling services industries, have begun to devise methods to stem foreign services supplies. These rising overseas trade barriers could send our now internationally strong services industries down the path already trodden by U.S. merchandise producers. Once the world's predominant merchandise supplier, we have seen our market share whittled away by foreign import barriers and unfair export practices.

We must avoid making the same mistake in services.

The rising barriers to services trade affect every sector. In the accounting area, for example, provisions regarding confidentiality in the European Community's eighth directive on auditors' qualifications could be used to bar U.S. firms from participation in EC markets. In the information transfer business, restrictions on the use of foreign data-processing facilities bar U.S. computer software firms from selling their services in countries like West Germany. Foreign countries' subsidization of construction operations has enabled overseas firms to capture third country markets from traditional U.S. suppliers. U.S. motor carriers cannot provide trucking services in Canada or Mexico because of restrictive regulations there. Moreover, our insurance firms encounter nearly impenetrable barriers in many developing countries that seek to retain control for domestic monopolies or national insurance companies.

At the same time, U.S. service markets remain relatively open to foreign suppliers. With the enactment of the Motor Carrier Act of 1980, for example, foreign truckers have easy access to the U.S. market. Canadian suppliers alone have received 260 licenses in the past year to provide interstate services. Foreign insurers, too, find fewer difficulties penetrating the lucrative U.S. market.

Despite their importance to our domestic and global trade accounts, despite the rising barriers to trade overseas, services have often been treated as an afterthought in U.S. and international trade law. The Trade Act of 1974 was the first attempt to raise the issue of services trade in international consciousness. Notwithstanding that act's charge that the President negotiate barriers to both goods and services, however, little was accomplished in the latter during the 1975-79 Tokyo Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations.

Distortions in services trade continue to increase unchecked by international agreement.

It is time to reverse that trend. It is clear we must begin to work now if we are to guarantee a continuing predominant role for U.S. service industries in the world economy. We must lay the groundwork now for international discipline in the treatment of services trade.

The Trade in Services Act of 1982 represents an important step in the direction of insuring open markets for services trade. The bill charges the President with placing a high priority on, and developing a work program for, negotiations to reduce services trade barriers. Section 3 of the Trade in Services Act builds upon the existing provisions of section 102 of the Trade Act of 1974 by providing a clear congressional directive to place services issues on the front burner.

In addition, the legislation would clarify and expand the coverage of U.S. trade law to deal more effectively with trade in services problems. In the past, agruments have been made that establishment-related issues involve investment, not trade and are therefore not covered by the 1974 Trade Act's negotiating and retaliatory authority. Sections 3 and 4 of this bill would resolve any potential problem or confusion by expressly including "barriers to the establishment and operation of U.S. businesses in foreign markets" within the Trade Act's meaning of "barriers to trade."

In addition, section 4 amends section 301 of the Trade Act, which deals with foreign unfair trade practices, to include Presidential authority to restrict the activities of foreign suppliers in the U.S. market. To date, there has been disagreement over whether the administration had the authority to impose "fees or other restrictions" on a services supplier, as well as on the service itself. Section 4 clearly extends this authority.

The bill would also improve the coordination in the services trade policymaking process and Federal/State communication in trade regulation. As chairman of the Governmental Affairs Committee, I strongly believe State and local governments should continue to exercise their traditional regulatory authority over a variety of services, such as banking, insurance and accounting. Therefore, section 3 of the Trade in Services Act provides that, before entering into any negotiations in a service sector over which the States have regulatory responsibility, the U.S. Trade Representative must consult with representatives of the States concerning negotiating objectives and methods of implementing any agreements reached. In addition, the legislation calls for coordination with private sector advisory groups specializing in services trade matters.

The Trade in Services Act would establish a service sector development program, providing for much-needed collection and analysis of domestic and international services information. The United States is head-and-shoulders above its trading partners in its appreciation of the role of services in the international economy, but more work remains to be done to understand, quantify and take into account services' full impact on trade and national accounts.

Last, the legislation insures that, in considering any rule, restriction or regulation on the treatment of a foreign service or services supplier, our regulatory agencies will weigh the treatment accorded U.S. services in the relevant foreign country.

I believe it is time we take a closer look at the experience of U.S. firms overseas before determining how best to treat foreign services suppliers. While free trade should be the order of the day, the United States cannot be expected to continue to carry that standard alone. Instead, it is time we look at whether we are receiving reciprocal treatment for U.S. services overseas.

Fairness by the United States in the treatment of foreign suppliers in our market should be mirrored by fair treatment of U.S. interests in foreign countries. Thus, section 6 encourages agencies that regulate service sector industries to pay greater attention to U.S. industry complaints that, while foreign suppliers are accorded relatively free access to the U.S. market, U.S. companies face serious barriers in overseas markets.

I believe this legislation is crucial in our efforts to expand our export performance in the services sector. It is time we stop treating services as an afterthought and begin to consider what international rules would best promote free trade in the ever-growing service sector.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2058

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Trade in Services Act of 1982."

SEC. 2. FINDINGS; PURPOSE.

(a) Findings.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the United States economy is predominantly a service economy as approximately 70 percent of the United States labor force is employed in producing services and approximately 67 percent of the gross national product is generated by services;

(2) many service industries require highly skilled and trained workers and employ advanced technology which enhances the international competitiveness of the United States economy;

(3) productivity in the service sector increased by 20 percent from 1967 to 1979 and as such increase is far more than the productivity gains registered in the goods producing sector, such increase helped restrain inflation;

(4) in 1980, according to official United States balance of payments statistics, the United States earned a surplus of more than $36,000,000,000 in the services account in contrast to the merchandise trade deficit of $25,000,000,000 (c.i.f.);

(5) the United States is the world's largest trader of international services, accounting for approximately 20 percent of such international trade in 1980, but this share represents a decline from recent years;

(6) barriers to, and other distortions of, international trade in services, including barriers to the establishment and operation of United States companies in foreign markets, have had a serious and negative impact on the growth of United States service sector exports;

(7) such barriers are likely to increase unless the United States and its trading partners take prompt action to negotiate their reduction or elimination and to develop effective international rules governing trade in services; and

(8) trade in services is an important issue for international negotiations and deserves priority in the attention of governments, international agencies, negotiators, and the private sector.

(b) PURPOSES.—The purposes of this Act are—

(1) to encourage the expansion of international trade in services through the negotiation of agreements, both bilateral and multilateral, that reduce or eliminate barriers to, and other distortions of, international trade in services (including barriers to the right of establishment and operation of service enterprises in foreign markets) and that strengthen the international rules governing trade in services;

(2) to fully integrate service sector trade issues into overall United States economic and trade policy;

(3) to provide for effective coordination of services sector trade policy within the Federal Government;

(4) to encourage consultation and cooperation among United States Government agencies, between the United States and State and local governments, and between the United States Government and the private sector;

(5) to provide for consideration of the access accorded to United States service sector industries in foreign markets in fashioning United States policies affecting access to the United States market of foreign funds and suppliers of services; and

(6) to clarify the application of provisions of United States trade laws to trade in services.

SEC. 3. NEGOTIATION OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS CONCERNING TRADE IN SERVICES.

(a) NEGOATIATING OBJECTIVES.—Chapter 1 of title 1 of the Trade Act of 1974 is amended by inserting immediately after section 104 the following new section:

"SEC. 104A. NEGOTIATING OBJECTIVES WITH RESPECT TO TRADE IN SERVICES.

"(a) Principal United States negotiating objectives under sections 101 and 102 shall be to—

"(1) reduce or eliminate barriers to United States service sector trade in foreign markets, including the right of establishment and operation in such markets;

"(2) modify or eliminate practices which distort international trade in services; and

"(3) develop internationally agreed rules, including dispute settlement procedures, which are consistent with the commercial policies of the United States and which will help ensure open international trade in services.

"(b) As a means of achieving the negotiating objectives set forth in subsection (a), the United States Trade Representative shall—

"(1) in any negotiation under section 101 or 102 concerning barriers to, or other distortions of, international trade in services, pay particular attention to the interests that the States may have in such a negotiation and consult regularly with representatives of State governments concerning negotiating developments;

"(2) not enter into any negotiation involving a service sector over which the States have regulatory responsibility unless he has developed negotiating objectives for such negotiation in consultation with representatives of State governments; and

"(3) with respect to the service sector advisory committees established under subsections (b) and (c) of section 135—

"(A) inform such committees of prospective trade negotiations under section 101 or 102,

"(B) consult with such committees and develop negotiating objectives prior to entering into such negotiations, and

"(C) during the course of any such negotiations, consult with the committees concerning negotiating developments.

"(c) In carrying out its duties under this dection, the United States Trade Representative shall consult with the Committee on Finance of the Senate, the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and other interested committees of the Congress concerning—

"(1) efforts to promote international negotiations on trade in services, and

"(2) the strategies and specific negotiating objectives of the United States in such negotiations, developments in the course of such negotiations, and the manner in which any agreements concluded are to be implemented.

"(d) For purposes of this section—

"(1) the term 'services' has the meaning given such term by section 301 (d)(3), and

"(2) the term 'barriers to, or other distortions of, international trade in services' includes, but is not limited to—

"(A) barriers to the right of establishment in foreign markets, and

"(B) restrictions on the operation of enterprises in foreign markets, including—

"(i) direct or indirect restrictions on the transfer of information into, or out of, the country or instrumentality concerned, and

"(ii) restrictions on the use of data processing facilities within or outside of such country or instrumentality.".

(b) REPORT TO CONGRESS.—Not later than 45 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, the United States Trade Representative shall present to the Committee on Finance of the Senate, the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and other interested committees of the Congress—

(1) a proposed work program concerning international negotiations on services for the following twelve-month period; and

(2) a detailed analysis of the negotiating interests of the United States in specific service sectors.

(c) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for chapter 1 of title 1 of the Trade Act of 1974 is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 104 the following new item:

"Sec. 104A. Negotiating objectives with respect to trade in services."

SEC. 4. REMOVAL OF UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES IN SERVICE SECTOR TRADE.

(a) DEFINITION OF SERVICES.—Section 301 (d) of the Trade Act of 1974 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) SERVICES DEFINED.—The term 'services' means economic outputs which are not tangible goods or structures, including, but not limited to—

"(A) transportation, communications, retail and wholesale trade, advertising, construction, design and engineering, utilities, finance, insurance, real estate, professional services, entertainment, and tourism, and

"(B) overseas investments which are necessary for the export and sale of the services described in subparagraph (A).".

(b) SUPPLIERS OF SERVICES TO BE INCLUDED.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Subsections (a) and (b) of section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2411) are each amended by inserting "(or suppliers thereof)" after "services".

(2) CONSULTATIONS WITH APPROPRIATE AGENCIES, ETC.—Subsection (d) of section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974, as amended by subsection (a), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(4) SPECIAL RULES FOR SUPPLIERS OF SERVICES.—

"(A) SUPPLIER OF SERVICE DEFINED.—For purposes of this section, the term 'supplier of services' includes any person who provides services and—

"(i) whose principal place of business is in a foreign country, or

"(ii) who is owned by a foreign person.

"(B) CONSULTATION WITH APPROPRIATE AGENCIES.—Before the President takes action under this section to impose fees or other restrictions on services (or suppliers thereof), the United States Trade Representative shall, if such services are subject to regulation by any other Federal agency or by any State, consult with the appropriate Federal or State official with respect to such action.".

SEC. 5. INTERAGENCY COORDINATION OF SERVICE SECTOR TRADE POLICY.

(a) COORDINATION OF UNITED STATES POLICIES.—The United States Trade Representative, through the Trade Policy Committee and its subcommittees, shall develop, and coordinate the implementation of, United States policies concerning trade in services.

(b) FEDERAL AGENCIES.—In order to encourage effective development and coordination of United States policy on trade in services, each Federal agency responsible for the regulation of any service sector industry shall advise the United States Trade Representative of pending matters with respect to which—

(1) the treatment afforded United States service sector interests in foreign markets, or

(2) allegations of unfair practices by foreign governments or companies in a service sector, have been raised, and shall consult with the United States Trade Representative prior to the disposition of such matters.

(c) SERVICES INDUSTRY DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM.—The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to establish in the Department of Commerce a service industries development program in order to—

(1) promote the competitiveness of United States service firms and American employees through appropriate economic policies;

(2) promote actively the use and sale of United States services abroad and develop trade opportunities for United States service firms;

(3) develop a data base for policymaking pertaining to services;

(4) collect and analyze information pertaining to the international operations and competitiveness of the United States service industries;

(5) analyze—

(A) United States regulation of service industries;

(B) tax treatment of services, with particular emphasis on the effect of United States taxation on the international competitiveness of United States firms and exports;

(C) antitrust policies as they affect the competitiveness of United States firms;

(D) treatment of services in commercial and noncommercial agreements of the United States; and

(E) adequacy of current United States financing and export promotion programs;

(6) provide staff support for negotiations on service-related issues by the United States Trade Representative and the domestic implementation of service-related agreements;

(7) collect such statistical information on the domestic service sector as may be necessary for the development of governmental policies toward the service sector;

(8) conduct sectoral studies of domestic service industries;

(9) collect comparative international information on service industries and policies of foreign governments toward services;

(10) develop policies to strengthen the competitiveness of domestic service industries relative to foreign firms;

(11) conduct a program of research and analysis of service-related issues and problems, including forecasts and industrial strategies; and

(12) provide statistical, analytical, and policy information to State and local governments and service industries.

(d) INFORMATION TO STATES.—Except as otherwise provided by law, the United States Trade Representative and the Secretary of Commerce shall provide to State governments such advice, assistance, and information concerning United States policies on international trade in services as such governments might request.

SEC. 6. CONSIDERATION BY UNITED STATES REGULATORY AUTHORITIES OF MARKET ACCESS ACCORDED BY FOREIGN COUNTRIES TO UNITED STATES SERVICE SECTOR INDUSTRIES.

(a) SENSE OF CONGRESS.—It is the sense of the Congress that regulatory authorities in the United States with responsibility for regulation of a service sector should, in developing their policies concerning the access of foreign suppliers to the United States market, take into account the extent to which United States suppliers are accorded access to foreign markets in such service sector.

(b) FEDERAL AGENCIES.—To the extent not otherwise required by law or regulation, whenever any agency of the Federal Government which has responsibility for regulation of a service sector is considering any rule, regulation, or decision which may affect the access of any foreign supplier or suppliers to the United States market, such agency shall—

(1) take into account information presented to it by any interested party concerning the market access in such service sector accorded to United States suppliers in the home market or markets of the foreign supplier or suppliers which may be so affected; and

(2) in taking any action with regard to such rule, regulation, or decision, indicate the extent to which the action taken promotes fairness in international trade within the particular service sector involved.

(c) ACTION BY FEDERAL AGENCIES.—Agencies of the Federal Government with responsibility for service sector regulation may, in consultation with the United States Trade Representative as provided in section 5 of this Act, impose such restrictions on the access of any foreign supplier to the United States market for such service sector as may be appropriate to promote fairness in international service sector trade.

SEC. 7. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the activities authorized by this Act.●

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, Senator ROTH, Senator INOUYE, and I are introducing today legislation entitled "The Trade in Services Act of 1982."

The legislation has four major purposes. The first is to emphasize the importance of our service industries to our economy. The service sector now employs more than 70 percent of all Americans and contributes two-thirds of our gross national products. The service sector is growing twice as fast as the manufacturing sector and experienced a 20-percent increase in productivity from 1967 to 1979. In way of contrast, the manufacturing sector had a growth rate of only 10 percent during the same period.

The growth of service industries has improved our balance of trade picture. Currently, the United States has a 20-percent share of the total world trade in services. In 1980 this significant progress in trade in services resulted in the first overall surplus in the U.S. balance of payments since 1976.

The second purpose of the bill is to direct the administration to raise the issue of an international services code at the 1982 GATT ministerial meeting and to insure that the negotiation of such an agreement is given a high priority in U.S. trade policy. One of the major problems with the international trading system is that there are no specific multilateral rules or means to deal with trade problems in services. We need to develop an international framework to deal with trade in services just as we have for trade in goods.

The first step toward achieving that goal is to get a commitment from members of the GATT to deal with the issue of services. The bill we are introducing today makes the negotiation of an international agreement on services a priority under section 102 of the Trade Act of 1974. The bill also recognizes the importance of raising the issue of services at the GATT ministerial meeting and directs the U.S. Trade Representative (USTR) to present to Congress, within 45 days after enactment, a work plan for the negotiation of such an international agreement.

The third purpose of the bill is to provide for effective coordination and implementation of U.S. trade policy with regard to services. The bill directs the USTR to coordinate the development of services trade policy and requires that he consult with Federal regulatory agencies and the States in those areas of the services sector that are subject to Federal and/or State regulation, such as insurance and banking.

The bill provides that, prior to the negotiation of any agreement on services, the USTR must develop negotiating objectives in consultation with the private sector service industry advisory groups and the States. The bill also authorizes the Department of Commerce to establish a services industries program to develop information on the flow of trade in services, analyze the impact of U.S. laws pertaining to services, and provide information to the States on U.S. policy on international trade in services.

The fourth and perhaps most important purpose of this legislation is to insure that U.S. service industries continue to have free access to foreign markets. To accomplish this objective, the bill clarifies and emphasizes the President's authority to take action against unfair practices either at home or abroad which affect U.S. service industries. The bill allows Federal regulatory agencies with authority over service industries to take into account the extent to which U.S. service industries are accorded access to foreign markets. These regulatory agencies must act in consultation with the USTR.

This bill represents an important change in the approach to dealing with trade problems. In the past we have generally reacted to trade problems only after they arise, when trade barriers have been erected and our market shares have diminished. We should learn from the past and not repeat this mistake in the area of trade in services. We should act to create an international framework to deal with trade in services problems while we still have a trade surplus in that area instead of waiting until we have a deficit. We should take steps now to insure that the rapidly expanding world trade in services remains free and open. I believe that this bill is an important step in that direction, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF TRADE IN SERVICES ACT OF 1982

SEC. 2(a) FINDINGS

This section recognizes the importance of the service sector as the largest sector of the U.S. economy, generating over half of our GNP, employing over 54 million Americans, generating $60 billion in revenues in 1980, accounting for 20 percent of the worldwide trade in services and helping to offset the serious deficits in the U.S. merchandise trade balance. This section also points out that the U.S. share of the world services market is declining due to trade barriers and that such barriers are likely to increase unless the U.S. takes prompt action to negotiate an international agreement to establish international rules to govern trade in services. The findings also point to the inadequacy of the existing legal framework governing trade in services.

SEC. 2(b) PURPOSES

The Act is intended to (1) encourage the expansion of international trade in services through the negotiation of bilateral and multilateral agreements that reduce or eliminate barriers to trade in services, (2) to integrate service sector trade issues more fully into U.S. economic and trade policy, (3) to provide for effective coordination of U.S. service sector trade policy including consultation and cooperation between federal, state, and local agencies and the private sector, (4) to provide for consideration of reciprocal market funds and suppliers to the U.S. market, and (5) the clarification of U.S. trade laws applicable to trade in services.

SEC. 3 NEGOTIATION OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

Section 3 states that a principal negotiating objective under section 102 of the Trade Act of 1974 is the development of agreements under the GATT which reduce or eliminate barriers to trade in services and establish international rules to ensure open international trade in services. Section 3 also requires that the USTR take into account the interests of the States in any negotiation of an agreement pertaining to services and that the USTR shall not enter into the negotiation of an agreement involving a service sector regulated by the States until it has developed negotiating objectives with the States. The USTR must also consult with the private sector advisory groups established under section 135(b) and 135(c) of the Trade Act of 1974 prior to entering into any negotiations on international agreements affecting the service sector. Additionally, section 3 instructs the USTR to consult regularly with the Finance Committee and the Ways and Means Committee on the progress of negotiations and that no later than 45 days after the bill is enacted the USTR must present to Congress a proposed work plan for the negotiation of an international agreement on services.

SEC. 4 UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES IN SERVICE SECTOR TRADE

Section 4 amends section 301(b) of the Trade Act of 1974 by adding the phrase "or suppliers of services" after the word "services." Section 4 also requires that the service sector involved in a section 301 case is subject to regulation by any federal or State agency, the President must consult with that agency prior to the imposition of any fees or restrictions on the foreign supplier of services. Finally, section 4 amends section 301 by providing that fees or restrictions may be imposed by executive order and it defines foreign suppliers.

Section 4 defines services as economic outputs which are not tangible goods and services including, but not limited to transportation, communication construction, and overseas investments which are necessary for the export and sale of such services. Section 4 also defines trade barriers as including barriers to the right of establishment in foreign markets and restrictions on the operation of U.S. firms in foreign markets including direct or indirect restraints on the transfer of information, or on the use of data processing facilities within or outside a foreign country.

SEC. 5 INTERAGENCY COORDINATION OF SERVICE SECTOR TRADE POLICY

Section 5 requires that the USTR develop and coordinate the implementation of U.S. policy concerning trade in services. Federal agencies responsible for the regulation of service sector industries are required to notify USTR with respect to pending matters which affect the treatment of U.S. service providers in foreign countries and in which allegations of unfair practices by foreign governments or service providers have been raised. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to establish a service industries program to promote the competitiveness of the industry at home and abroad by developing a data base on domestic and international services, analyzing the impact of U.S. laws pertaining to services industries, providing staff support for negotiations of service-related agreements, and providing the State governments with information and advice pertaining to U.S. policy on international trade in services.

SEC. 6 REGULATORY AGENCY CONSIDERATION OF U.S. SERVICE INDUSTRIES TO FOREIGN MARKETS

Section 6 expresses that it is the sense of Congress that regulatory agencies with authority over service industries should, in consultation with USTR, take into account the extent to which U.S. suppliers are accorded access to foreign markets in the service sector involved in developing policies as to the access of foreign service suppliers to the U.S. market. Section 6 also provides that when any regulatory agency is making a decision affecting the access of a foreign supplier to the U.S. Market, any interested party may present information relevant to foreign or domestic market access in such service sector. The regulatory agency is required to indicate the degree to which the action taken based on such information promotes fair trade in that service sector. Finally, regulatory agencies must consult with USTR prior to making any decisions which restrict the access of foreign suppliers to the domestic market for the purpose of promoting fair trade.

SEC. 7 AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

Section 7 authorizes such funds as are necessary to carry out the activities authorized in the Act.●

By Mr. COHEN (for himself and Mr. LEVIN):

S. 2059. A bill to change the coverage of officials and the standards for the appointment of a special prosecutor in the special prosecutor provisions of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

ETHICS IN GOVERNMENT ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1982

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Mr. LEVIN, I am introducing a bill, which would amend the special prosecutor provisions of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, to better insure independent investigations of high-ranking Federal officials and to remove inequities in the present law.

The special prosecutor provisions were established in the wake of Watergate to assure the public that high-level executive officials will be investigated fully and fairly for crimes they may have committed, and that these investigations will be conducted free from political favoritism or bias. The act does this by requiring the Attorney General to conduct a preliminary investigation whenever he receives specific information that any official designated by the law has violated a Federal criminal law. At the close of this limited investigation, unless the Attorney General concludes that absolutely no further investigation or prosecution is warranted, a special prosecutor must be appointed to conduct an independent investigation of the charges, and, if necessary, to proceed with the prosecution of the official.

In the 3 years since their enactment, the special prosecutor provisions have been surrounded by controversy. Much of the debate stems from the nature of the cases in which a special prosecutor was appointed during President Carter's administration. Two high-ranking White House officials, Hamilton Jordan and Timothy Kraft, were investigated for alleged possession of cocaine. In each case, a special prosecutor was appointed to investigate the allegations, and in each case, after extensive media attention and legal costs to both the subject of the investigation and the Government, the special prosecutor concluded that there was no factual or legal basis for bringing criminal charges against the official. These cases sparked criticisms that certain aspects of the present law are unfair, unjustly burden public officials, and are costly to both the Government and the official involved.

In response to these criticisms, the Subcommittee on Oversight of Government Management began an extensive investigation of the special prosecutor law. Last year, the subcommittee held 2 days of oversight hearings and heard testimony from both strong supporters and critics of the special prosecutor process. The bill which I introduce today would implement recommendations which the subcommittee made as a result of its investigation and hearings.

This legislation retains the basic structure of the current law because the concept underlying the special prosecutor provisions remains valid. Unfortunately, dangers of conflict of interest were not unique to Watergate, but rather are inherent in our system of government. As a political appointee of the President, a close adviser to the President, and part of an administration which hopes to gain political success, the Attorney General may be placed in a difficult situation when investigating allegations against a senior executive official. Even when such an investigation is truly handled impartially, the public may doubt that it was if the official is cleared by the Department. In other cases, the Attorney General may "bend over backwards" and prosecute an official when prosecution is not warranted, in order to avoid the appearance of favoritism. When such conflicts of interest exist, or when the public perceives there to be a conflict, public confidence in the investigation of public officials is eroded, if not totally lost. By establishing a mechanism to insure impartial and thorough investigations of officials, the act guards against conflicts of interest and guarantees that public officials are not above the law.

While a special prosecutor process must be retained, I do not believe that the present law is perfect. To the contrary. The subcommittee's hearings and investigation revealed that the act has substantial weaknesses. Failure to remedy these demonstrated defects would be to ignore the benefit of experience we have had since the law was enacted. Even more seriously, failing to correct these problems may provide justification for those who would abandon the law completely.

The foremost problem of the law is that is has created unfairness. This problem stems in large part from the very low triggering standards for conducting a preliminary investigation and appointing a special prosecutor.

Under the act, the Attorney General must conduct a preliminary investigation whenever he receives specific information that a person covered by the act has violated any Federal criminal law, other than a petty offense. No allowance is made for the credibility of the accuser. Thus, the Attorney General is forced to investigate even those allegations which he knows to be frivolous, or made by persons known to lack credibility. Such automatic investigations do not serve a valid public purpose. Rather, they can only unfairly tarnish the reputation of our public officials and waste scarce public resources.

The very low standard for appointment of a special prosecutor also promotes unfairness. The Attorney General, having conducted a preliminary investigation, must apply to the court for appointment of a special prosecutor unless he can state that the matter is "so unsubstantiated that no further investigation or prosecution is warranted." At the subcommittee's hearings, many experts on the law testified that this standard leaves little practical opportunity for an Attorney General to dismiss allegations which have little or no merit. For example, former Attorney General Benjamin Civiletti testified that in the Hamilton Jordan case, he was forced to seek appointment of a special prosecutor even though he had specifically concluded that a prosecution would not have resulted based on the facts he received during the preliminary investigation. Because, however, he was unable to conclude that no further investigation was warranted, a special prosecutor was appointed.

The present act also ignores the legitimate use of prosecutorial discretion which is given to prosecutors in both the Federal and State court systems. Over the years, the Department of Justice has developed guidelines to standardize its discretion and policies of law enforcement. By disregarding these standards, the special prosecutor law creates a different, stricter application of criminal law on public officials. Again, experience illustrates this problem: The offense alleged in both the Jordan and Kraft cases would not merit extensive investigation or prosecution under the ordinary standards of the Department of Justice in the present or past administrations.

Another serious problem of the present law is its coverage. Although the premise of the present law is that dangers of conflict of interest exist when the Attorney General investigates officials who are close to the President, the act covers over 125 executive and campaign officials, many of whom occupy middle-level positions and do not influence Presidential or Department of Justice decisionmaking. The act also can cover officials long after they leave office—in some cases up to 16 years—if the next President is of the same political party as the President under whom the official serves. Not only is this coverage excessively broad by continuing to cover officials after they have returned to private life, but it is also unequal by basing coverage on which political party wins the Presidential election. This political application of criminal law is unique in our criminal justice system.

Ironically, while the coverage of the act is overbroad in these respects, it is also underinclusive by failing to cover a class of persons who are close to Presidential influence and who may create actual or perceived conflicts of interest if investigated by the Attorney General: the President's family. The "Billygate Affair," in which President Carter's brother was investigated for allegedly having an improper relationship with the Libyan Government, illustrates how the public and press can easily perceive a conflict of interest when the Department of Justice investigates allegations of wrongdoing by the President's family.

The amendments which I am introducing today would correct many of these problems. First, the bill would raise the standard which triggers a preliminary investigation so that the Attorney General could consider the credibility of the accuser and the specificity of the information received in determining whether a preliminary investigation is warranted. In this way, the Attorney General would better be able to perform his function of screening out frivolous allegations.

Second, the bill would raise the standard for appointment of a special prosecutor from the almost automatic standard of "so unsubstantiated that no further investigation or prosecution is waranted" to one requiring appointment when the Attorney General "finds reasonable ground to believe that further investigation or prosecution is warranted." In determining whether reasonable grounds exist, the bill directs the Attorney General to consider the factual conclusions of the preliminary investigation as well as the prosecutorial guidelines of the Department of Justice with respect to the enforcement of criminal laws. The present law's safeguards against abuse of authority by the Attorney General would be maintained, however, through the reporting and disclosure requirements of the act.

Third, the bill would amend the law so that coverage more closely reflects those instances in which the greatest dangers of conflict of interest exist. The bill would restrict coverage of officials to only those who occupy top-level executive positions close to either the President or the Attorney General. It would also limit the number of campaign officials covered by the act and would extend coverage to members of the President's family. Finally, the bill would limit and standardize the length of coverage of executive officials, so that all executive officials are covered for the incumbency of the President under which they serve, plus 1 year, regardless of which political party holds the Presidency.

Other changes would make the present law less burdensome to the subject of a special prosecutor investigation. The bill would change the name of the special prosecutor to "independent counsel" to remove the Watergate connotation from the investigation and would authorize the court to award attorney's fees to the subject of a special prosecutor investigation if those fees would not have been incurred by a private citizen in similar circumstances. Additional provisions would check the potential for abuse of power by the special prosecutor.

Finally, the bill would extend the special prosecutor provisions, which would otherwise expire in October 1983, for 5 years after the date of the enactment of these provisions.

Mr. President, the special prosecutor provisions of the Ethics in Government Act were an important reform which must be maintained to insure independent, untainted investigations and prosecutions of criminal allegations against our public officials. However, reform does not in itself produce redemption. We must take advantage of the experience we now have to make the special prosecutor process fairer and reflect more accurately those situations in which conflicts of interest are likely to occur. Only in this way can we increase public confidence in the investigation of our Government officials, and, thus, in Government itself.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and a section-by-section analysis of its provisions be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill and analysis were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Ethics in Government Act Amendments of 1982".

SEC. 4. (a) Section 591(a) of title 28 of the United States Code is amended by striking out "specific information" and by inserting in lieu thereof "information sufficient to constitute grounds to investigate".

(b) Section 592(a) of title 28 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"(a)(1) Upon receiving information that the Attorney General determines is sufficient to constitute grounds to investigate that any person covered by the Act has engaged in conduct described in section 591(a) of this title, the Attorney General shall conduct, for a period not to exceed ninety days, such preliminary investigation of the matter as the Attorney General deems appropriate. In determining whether grounds to investigate exist, the Attorney General shall consider—

"(A) the degree of specificity of the information received, and

"(B) the credibility of the source of the information.

"(2) In conducting preliminary investigations pursuant to this section, the Attorney General shall have no authority to convene grand juries, plea bargain, grant immunity, or issue subpenas.".

(c) Section 592(b)(1) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking out "finds that the matter is so unsubstantiated that no further investigation or prosecution is warranted" and inserting in lieu thereof "that there are no reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation or prosecution is warranted."

(d) Section 592(c)(1) of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "finds that the matter warrants further investigation or prosecution" and inserting in lieu thereof "finds reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation or prosecution is warranted";

(2) by striking out "that the matter is so unsubstantiated as not to warrant further investigation on prosecution" and inserting in lieu thereof "that there are no reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation or prosecution is warranted"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "In determining whether reasonable grounds exist to warrant further investigation or prosecution, the Attorney General shall comply with the written policies of the Department of Justice with respect to the enforcement of criminal laws.".

(e) Section 592(c)(2) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking out "specific information" and inserting in lieu thereof "information sufficient to constitute grounds to investigate".

SEC. 5. Section 593 of title 28 of the United States Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(f) Upon a showing of good cause by the Attorney General, the division of the court may grant a single extension of the preliminary investigation conducted pursuant to section 592 (a) of this title for a period not to exceed sixty days.

"(g) Upon request by the subject of an investigation conducted by an independent counsel pursuant to this Chapter, the division of the court may, in its discretion, award reimbursement for the attorney's fees incurred by such subject during such investigation if—

"(1) no indictment is brought against such subject; and

"(2) the attorney's fees would not have been incurred but for the requirements of this chapter.".

SEC. 6. (a) Subsection (a) of section 594 of title 28 of the United States Code is amended by—

(1) striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (8);

(2) striking out the period at the end of paragraph (9) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and "and"; and

(3) by adding after paragraph (9) the following:

"(10) consulting with the United States Attorney for the district in which the violation was alleged to have occurred.".

(b) Subsection (f) of section 594 of title 28 of the United States Code is amended by striking out "to the extent that such special prosecutor deems appropriate" and inserting in lieu thereof "except where not possible".

(c) Section 594 of title 29 of the United States Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(g) The independent counsel shall have full authority to dismiss matters within his prosecutorial jurisdiction without conducting an investigation or at any subsequent time prior to prosecution if to do so would be consistent with the written policies of the Department of Justice with respect to the enforcement of criminal laws.".

(d) Paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 596 of title 28 of the United States Code is amended by striking out "extraordinary impropriety" and inserting in lieu thereof "good cause".

SEC. 7. Section 598 of title 28 of the United States Code is amended by striking out "after the date of enactment of this chapter" and inserting in lieu thereof "after the date of enactment of the Ethics in Government Act Amendments of 1982".

THE ETHICS IN GOVERNMENT ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1982—SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

SHORT TITLE

The first section sets forth the short title of this bill, the Ethics in Government Act Amendments of 1982.

Section 2: Name of Special Prosecutor

Section 2 would change the name of the special prosecutor to "independent counsel" in order to reduce the stigma of, and remove the Watergate connotation from, a special prosecutor investigation and to more accurately describe the purpose of appointing an individual to conduct an investigation.

Section 3: Coverage

Section 3 would amend the coverage of officials who are potential subjects of the special prosecutor process.

First, the present law (Section 591) would be amended to reduce coverage of middle-level Executive officials who, because they are close to neither Presidential nor Department of Justice decision-making, do not present realistic dangers of conflict of interest. Under the proposed amendments, the President, Vice-President, Cabinet members, Director and Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, Commissioner of The Internal Revenue Service, and positions in the Department of Justice at or above Level III of the Executive Schedule would continue to be covered. The amendments would limit coverage of officials in the Executive Office of the President to Level II or above of the Executive Schedule rather than Level IV or above, as under present law.

Section 3 would more precisely define which campaign "officers" are subject to the act by specifically covering the chairman and treasurer of the principal national campaign committee seeking election or reelection of the President and any other official of the campaign exercising authority at the national level, such as the campaign manager or director. The present law's coverage of campaign officials (Section 591(b)(6)) is vague and overinclusive by not limiting coverage to only officers who hold positions of authority.

Section 3 would extend coverage to family members of the President for only the incumbency of the President. Under present law, family members of the President are not covered.

This section also would reduce and standardize the length of time during which executive officials remain subject to the act. Under Section 591(b)(5) of the present law, an official remains covered for the entire incumbency of the President under which he serves and the full term or terms of the next President if the new President is of the same political party. Thus, an official can remain subject to the act for as long as 16 years after he or she leaves public office. The proposed amendment would cover all Executive officials for the incumbency of the President under which they serve plus one year, regardless of which political party holds the presidency.

Section 4: Standards for conducting a preliminary investigation and appointing a Special Prosecutor

Section 4 (a) and (b) would raise the present standard for determining whether a preliminary investigation is required. The proposed amendment states that "upon receiving information that the Attorney General determines is sufficient to constitute grounds to investigate" that any person covered by the act has violated a federal criminal law, the Attorney General must conduct a preliminary investigation. The proposed amendment stipulates that in determining whether "grounds to investigate" exist, the Attorney General shall consider the degree of specificity of the information and the credibility of the source of the allegation. The proposed standard differs from Section 592 of the present law which does not enable the Attorney General to consider the credibility of the accuser, but rather provides that a preliminary investigation must be conducted whenever the Attorney General receives "specific information" that a covered official has violated a federal criminal law. This standard can result in preliminary investigations for allegations with little or no factual merit.

Section 4(b) adds a new section 592(a)(2) to the statute. This is a clarifying amendment which provides that in conducting the preliminary investigation the Attorney General has no authority to convene grand juries, plea bargain, grant immunity or issue subpoenas. Although the legislative history of the act expressly denies these powers to the Attorney General, the act itself is silent on this issue, thus giving rise to varying interpretations on the permissible extent of the preliminary investigation.

Section (c)-(d) would raise the standard for appointment of a special prosecutor to require appointment if the Attorney General "finds reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation or prosecution is warranted." The amendment directs the Attorney General to comply with written policies of the Department of Justice with respect to the enforcement of criminal laws in determining whether reasonable grounds for further investigation or prosecution exist.

The present law (Section 592(b)-(c)) requires appointment unless the Attorney General concludes that the matter under investigation "is so unsubstantiated that no further investigation or prosecution is warranted." This trigger of appointment is almost automatic, leaving little practical opportunity for the Attorney General to dismiss allegations supported by little or no factual support. The standard also fails to incorporate the prosecutorial guidelines and policies of the Department of Justice, and requires a special prosecutor investigation even for offenses which would not be prosecuted if made by an ordinary citizen. By ignoring the standardized policies of the Department, the act imposes a different, more stringent application of criminal law on public officials.

Section 5: Extension of preliminary investigation and reimbursement of attorney's fees

Section 5 provides that the Special Prosecutor Division of the court may, upon a showing of good cause by the Attorney General, grant a single extension of the preliminary investigation for a period not to exceed 60 days. The present law (592(a)) places a 90-day limitation on the preliminary investigation with no provision for extension. This strict 90-day limitation may force the Attorney General to seek appointment of a special prosecutor simply because the 90-day period was too short.

Section 5 also would allow the court to grant, at its discretion, reimbursement of attorney's fees to subjects of a special prosecutor investigation if no indictment is brought and if the fees would not have been incurred but for the special prosecutor appointment. No provision for reimbursement exists in the present law and officials may incur extensive legal fees during an investigation by a special prosecutor. The proposed amendment would not allow reimbursement for expenses incurred during a preliminary investigation as even private citizens would be subject to this type of investigation.

Section 6: Powers and removal of the Special Prosecutor

Section 6(a) would authorize the special prosecutor to consult with the U.S. Attorney for the district in which the violation of criminal law was alleged to have occurred. Although this is not prohibited under present law, the proposed amendment would expressly authorize the special prosecutor to do so in order to assist him in determining the policy of the particular jurisdiction regarding prosecution of the alleged offense.

Section 6(b) would require the special prosecutor to follow the prosecutorial guidelines of the Department of Justice. Section 594(f) of the present law requires the special prosecutor to comply with the written policies of the Department "to the extent that the special prosecutor deems appropriate." Section 6(b) would amend this section to require compliance "whenever possible" in order to create a presumption that the special prosecutor will follow prosecutorial guidelines.

Section 6(c) states that the special prosecutor shall have full authority to dismiss matters within his prosecutorial jurisdiction without conducting an investigation or at any subsequent time prior to presecution if to do so would be consistent with the written policies of the Department of Justice. Although this is permissible under present law, the proposed amendment clarifies this authority so that special prosecutors will not unduly prolong investigations.

Section 6(d) of the bill would provide for removal of the special prosecutor by the Attorney General for "good cause," a standard which is used for removal of the heads of independent agencies. The amendment would not change the present law's provisions for full reports to Congress upon removing a special prosecutor and opportunity for judicial review of such removal; these are maintained as checks against interference by the Attorney General in the independence of the special prosecutor.

The present law (Section 596(a)(1)) provides for removal by the Attorney General only on the grounds of "extraordinary impropriety" or mental or physical disability.

Section 7: Expiration of the Special Prosecutor provisions

Section 7 would extend the sunset date of the act to five years after the adoption of these amendments.

The present law (Section 598) provides that the special prosecutor provisions will expire in October, 1983, unless otherwise extended by Congress.●

By Mr. NUNN:

S. 2060. A bill to amend the Small Business Act to increase the authorization for funding 301(d) small business investment companies, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Small Business.

MESBIC FINANCING

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce legislation which would increase the maximum funding authorization for the minority enterprise small business investment company (MESBIC) program. MESBIC's are Small Business Administration-licensed investment companies which specialize in providing equity funds, long-term loans, and management assistance to small business concerns owned by socially or economically disadvantaged persons.

Today, there are at least 145 active MESBIC's licensed by the Small Business Administration. In fiscal year 1981, MESBIC's provided a total of 692 financings for minority business—including 366 first-time financings—for a total of over $55 million to these companies. The MESBIC program is among the most visible, and successful equity financing tools for minority businesses.

In addition, this program fits perfectly into the Senate Small Business Committee's long-standing preference for programs which involve, and rely on, the private sector. Under the MESBIC program, each licensed company must have an initial paid-in private capital of $500,000 before licensing. In addition, the MESBIC makes the investment decision, and provides any management help to the company. Federal involvement is basically limited to the purchase of preferred stock in the MESBIC corporation itself—SBA makes no financial commitment to any of the MESBIC portfolio companies through this program—and insuring that MESBIC's adhere to the regulatory scheme established by statute.

Mr. President, this program works. The MESBIC industry is a stable, secure, and serious venture capital partner for minority businesses. With the hints that the Small Business Administration may cease making direct Government to business loans, a gap will exist for those quality businesses which are in need of equity for their business.

An increase in the authorization for MESBIC funding will provide the SBA and the Congress with an opportunity to prudently expand the MESBIC program. Without such a modest increase, I am concerned that this vital capital formation tool will simply cease to be a benefactor for the minority business community.●

By Mr. MOYNIHAN (for himself and Mr. MATHIAS):

S. 2061. A bill to provide for the conservation, rehabilitation, and improvement of natural and cultural resources located on public and Indian lands, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

NATIONAL CONSERVATION CORPS

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, today I am introducing, for myself and my distinguished colleague, Mr. MATHIAS, a bill to establish a national conservation corps to enhance and rehabilitate our Nation's public lands and, at the same time, provide employment opportunities for young men and women. This bill is identical to H.R. 4861, introduced in the House by Congressmen SEIBERLING and MOFFETT.

This new National Conservation Corps would be modeled after the Civilian Conservation Corps of the thirties, one of the most successful national conservation efforts in our history. During the CCC's 9-year lifetime, over 3 million young people performed conservation work valued at over $1.5 billion. Many of the CCC's projects still stand today, a testament to the quality and quantity of the Corps' work.

The CCC was terminated in 1943, but in the last decade two similar programs were established, the Young Adult Conservation Corps—YACC—and the Youth Conservation Corps—YCC. They performed much the same tasks as the CCC, and their track records were no less impressive.

The YACC and the YCC were undeserving victims of this year's budget cuts, this despite the fact that both programs returned well over $1 worth of appraised conservation work for every dollar expended. I am proud to say that in my State of New York, the YACC and the YCC produced dramatic results. For each dollar invested in New York during fiscal year 1980, the YACC returned $2.83 in conservation work and the YCC returned $1.83. Now these numbers only reflect the value of the conservation work performed. They do not include the benefits realized by putting previously unemployed young people to work. These benefits, which are not easily quantified yet are nonetheless obvious to even the casual observer, include a decline in the number of unemployed youths, a reduction in drug abuse and, one would presume, the crime that often accompanies this social cancer, and the instillation and development of a strong work ethic in young people who previously had none.

Let me emphasize that conservation of our precious natural and cultural resources is, first and foremost, the goal of this program. We are faced with a formidable backlog of needed conservation work on our public lands, yet this administration pays only lipservice to these needs. The administration supported, and achieved, the elimination of all funding for the State portion of the land and water conservation fund. As recently as 1979, the State portion of the fund, which is used for grants to the States for acquisition and maintenance of parkland, was $369.8 million. Now, just 2 years later, the States are being told to fend for themselves.

Without land and water conservation fund money, States will simply not have the resources to adequately maintain their parks and community facilities, much to the detriment of every community and every citizen in this land.

The need, therefore, for a National Conservation Corps is more pronounced than ever. I submit that the Conservation Corps created by this bill, a Corps made up of unemployed young men and women eager to gain work experience and, at the same time, help conserve a part of our heritage, is a needed prescription for our conservation ills.

This is emphatically not a make-work or leaf-raking program. The work that will be done by this Conservation Corps is work that is necessary and that, in the absence of such a Corps, will simply not get done. The work will be hard and the pay will be low. But the history of conservation programs strongly suggests that this one will be a success. Desparately needed conservation work will be done. Young people will get a chance, many for the first time in their lives, to become productive members of society and to experience the profound sense of satisfaction that comes from working the land and seeing the fruits of their labor. And the rest of us will reap the benefits of putting unemployed young people to work on projects that are vital to the conservation of our natural resources and cultural heritage.

Let me now briefly explain what this bill would do. It would create a National Conservation Corps to carry out conservation and rehabilitation projects on Federal, State, local, and Indian lands. The Corps shall be composed of unemployed young men and women between the ages of 16 and 25—15 and 21 for summer programs. Preference in employment will be given to disadvantaged youths and to youths who reside in areas of substantial unemployment. Enrollees will receive the minimum wage, and may work in the Corps for up to 24 months.

The program would be administered by the Secretary of the Interior, with the cooperation of the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of the Interior would provide assistance to program agencies in establishing and operating residential and nonresidential conservation centers. Not less than 40 percent of the funds would go to the States for State-based programs, and not less than 25 percent would go to the Department of Agriculture for work on Department-operated lands. Program agencies, which may include Federal, State, local, and tribal government bodies and nonprofit organizations, would apply to the Secretary of the Interior for grants to establish conservation centers to carry out projects.

Federal revenues generated from the franchise and permit fees, leasing activities, and timber sales in the Departments of Interior and Agriculture, including oil and gas leasing, would be used to support the program, the actual funding level being determined by the appropriations process.

Typical projects would include forestry, rangeland conservation, recreational area improvement, historical and cultural site preservation, urban revitalization, and energy conservation. Preference will be given to projects that will provide long-term benefits to the public. Projects are limited to public lands, except where a project on other lands will have documented public benefits or where reimbursement is provided.

The bill we are introducing today will contribute greatly to the conservation and rehabilitation of our public lands, it will provide employment opportunities for our young people, and it will be cost effective. As such it deserves close scrutiny. For if we do not give adequate attention to the condition of our public lands and community resources, we run the risk of losing them forever. Mr. President, this bill is deserving of broad, bipartisan support, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill and a section-by-section analysis be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2061

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Public Lands Conservation, Rehabilitation, and Improvement Act of 1981".

CONGRESSIONAL FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) public lands and resources, including parks, rangelands, wildlife refuges, forests, water resources, fishery facilities, and historic and cultural sites, have become subject to increasing public use and resource production demands;

(2) the condition of many of these lands and resources has deteriorated as a result of these increasing uses and demands and as a result of the inability of Government agencies to adequately staff and fund the maintenance necessary to arrest the deterioration;

(3) public land management agencies have a responsibility to assure that public lands and resources are managed—

(A) to assure continued productivity,

(B) to protect public health and safety, and

(C) to assure their wise and economic conservation, maintenance, and use;

(4) a program designed to systematically guide and enhance the conservation, rehabilitation, and improvement of our public lands and resources is urgently needed; and

(5) youth conservation programs have proven highly successful and cost effective in assisting land management agencies at all levels of government to reduce the backlog of neglected public land conservation, rehabilitation and improvement projects and to carry out other public land resource management work.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act to—

(1) reduce the backlog of conservation, rehabilitation, and improvement work on the public lands and prevent the further deterioration of public lands and resources;

(2) establish a program to improve, restore, maintain, and conserve public lands and resources in the most cost-effective manner;

(3) use such program to assist State and local governments in carrying out needed public land and resource conservation, rehabilitation, and improvement projects;

(4) provide for implementation of the program in such manner as will foster conservation and the wise use of natural and cultural resources through the establishment of working relationships among the Federal, State, and local governments, Indian tribes, and other public and private organizations; and

(5) use this program to increase (by training and other means) employment opportunities for young men and women especially those who are economically, socially, physically, or educationally disadvantaged and who may not otherwise be productively employed.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For purposes of this Act:

(1) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Interior, except where otherwise expressly provided.

(2) The terms "public lands" and "publicly owned lands" mean any lands and waters (or interest therein) owned or administered by the United States or by any agency or instrumentality of a State or local government.

(3) The term "program" means the public lands conservation, rehabilitation, and improvement program established under this Act.

(4) The term "program agency" means any Federal agency or instrumentality with responsibility for the management of any public or Indian lands, any State agency designated by the Governor to manage the program, the governing body of any Indian tribe, any nonprofit organization which has been in existence for at least five years and which is undertaking, or proposing to undertake, projects consistent with the purposes of this Act.

(5) The term "Indian tribe" means any Indian tribe, band, nation, or other group which is recognized as an Indian tribe by the Secretary. Such term also includes any Native village corporation, regional corporation, and Native group established pursuant to the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (43 U.S.C. 1701 et seq.).

(6) The term "Indian" means a person who is a member of an Indian tribe.

(7) The term "Indian lands" means any real property owned by an Indian tribe, any real property held in trust by the United States for individual Indians or Indian tribes, and any real property held by individual Indians or Indian tribes which is subject to restrictions on alienation imposed by the United States.

(8) The term "employment security service" means the agency in each of the several States with responsibility for the administration of unemployment and employment programs, and the oversight of local labor conditions.

(9) The term "chief administrator" means the head of any program agency as that term is defined in paragraph (4).

(10) The term "enrollee" means any individual enrolled in the program in accordance with section 5.

(11) The term "State" means any State of the United States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Trust Territories of the Pacific Islands.

PUBLIC LANDS CONSERVATION, REHABILITATION, AND IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM

SEC. 4. (a) ESTABLISHMENT AND ADMINISTRATION OF PROGRAM.—Not later than ninety days after the enactment of this Act, the Secretary, in cooperation with the Secretary of Agriculture, shall establish and administer a public lands conservation, rehabilitation, and improvement program to carry out the purposes of this Act. Under such program, the Secretary shall provide assistance to program agencies for the establishment and operation of residential and non-residential conservation centers and for the implementation by such centers of projects designed to carry out such purposes.

(b) PROJECTS INCLUDED.—The program established under this section may include, but shall not be limited to, projects such as—

(1) forestry, nursery, and silvicultural operations;

(2) wildlife habitat conservation, rehabilitation, and improvement;

(3) rangeland conservation, rehabilitation, and improvement;

(4) recreational area development, maintenance, and improvement;

(5) urban revitalization;

(6) historical and cultural site preservation and maintenance;

(7) fish culture and habitat maintenance and improvement and other fishery assistance;

(8) road and trail maintenance and improvement;

(9) erosion, flood, drought, and storm damage assistance and control;

(10) stream, lake, and waterfront harbor and port improvement and pollution control;

(11) insect, disease, rodent, and fire prevention, and control;

(12) improvement of abandoned railroad bed and right-of-way;

(13) energy conservation projects and renewable resource enhancement;

(14) recovery of biomass from public lands, particularly forestlands; and

(15) reclamation and improvement of strip-mined lands.

(c) PREFERENCE FOR CERTAIN PROJECTS.—The program shall provide a preference for those projects which—

(1) will provide long-term benefits to the public;

(2) will provide meaningful work experience to the enrollee involved;

(3) will be labor intensive; and

(4) can be planned and initiated promptly.

(d) LIMITATION TO PUBLIC LANDS.—Projects to be carried out under the program shall be limited to projects on public lands or Indian lands except where—

(1) a project involving other lands will benefit associated public lands or Indian lands and such benefit is adequately documented; or

(2) a project involves other lands but either (A) significant public benefits are to be provided or (B) adequate arrangements are made to provide for appropriate reimbursement to the program agency of costs incurred by the agency in carrying out the project on nonpublic lands.

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any reimbursement referred to in paragraph (2) shall be retained by the program agency and shall be used by the agency for purposes of carrying out other projects under the program.

(e) CONSISTENCY.—The Secretary and the chief administrators of other program agencies shall assure that projects selected under this Act for conservation, rehabilitation, or improvement of any public lands are consistent with the provisions of law relating to the management and administration of such lands and with all other applicable provisions of law.

(f) CONSERVATION CENTERS.—(1) Each program agency may apply to the Secretary for approval of conservation centers to carry out projects under this Act.

(2) Applications for approval of conservation centers shall be submitted to the Secretary in such manner as the Secretary may prescribe. Each application shall contain, in such detail as the Secretary deems necessary—

(A) a comprehensive description of the objectives and performance goals for the conservation center and a description of the types of projects to be carried out;

(B) a description of the facilities and equipment to be available for use in the center;

(C) an estimate of the number of enrollees and crew leaders necessary for the proposed projects, the length of time for which the services of such personnel will be required, and the services which will be required for their support;

(D) a plan for managing the conservation center, supplying the necessary equipment and material, and administering the payroll; and

(E) such other information as the Secretary shall prescribe.

(3) In approving conservation centers, the Secretary shall give due consideration to the cost and means of transportation available between the center and the homes of the enrollees who may be assigned to those centers. The location and type of conservation centers shall be selected in such manner as will increase the enrollment of economically, socially, physically, and educationally disadvantaged youths and of youths from areas of high unemployment.

(g) AGREEMENTS.—Program agencies may enter into contracts and other appropriate arrangements with local government agencies and nonprofit organizations for the management of conservation centers under the program.

ENROLLMENT, FUNDING, AND MANAGEMENT

SEC. 5. (a) ENROLLMENT IN PROGRAM.—(1) Enrollment in the program shall be limited to individuals who, at the time of enrollment, are—

(A) unemployed;

(B) not less than sixteen or more than twenty-five years of age (except that programs limited to the months of June, July, and August may include individuals not less than fifteen years and not more than 21 years of age at the time of their enrollment); and

(C) citizens or lawful permanent residents of the United States or lawfully admitted alien parolees or refugees.

(2) Except in the case of a program limited to the months of June, July, and August, individuals who at the time of applying for enrollment have attained age sixteen but not attained age nineteen, and who are no longer enrolled in any secondary school shall not be enrolled in the program unless they give adequate written assurances, under criteria to be established by the Secretary, that they did not leave school for the express purpose of enrolling.

(3) The selection of enrollees to serve in any conservation center carrying out projects on any public lands shall be the responsibility of the chief administrator of the program agency. Enrollees shall be selected from those qualified persons who have—

(A) applied to, or been recruited by, the program agency, a State employment security service, community or community-based nonprofit organization, the sponsor of an Indian program, or the sponsor of a migrant or seasonal farmworker program; and

(B) screened for eligibility and referred to the program agency by the State employment security service.

(4) In the selection of enrollees in the program, preference shall be given to both—

(A) economically, socially, physically, and educationally disadvantaged youths, and

(B) youths residing in areas, both rural and urban, which have substantial unemployment.

(5)(A) Except for a program limited to the months of June, July, and August, any qualified individual selected for enrollment in the program may be enrolled for a period not to exceed twenty-four months. When the term of enrollment does not consist of one continuous twenty-four-month term, the total of shorter terms may not exceed twenty-four months.

(B) No individual may remain enrolled in the program after that individual has attained the age of twenty-six.

(b) SERVICES, FACILITIES, SUPPLIES, ET CETERA.—The program agency shall provide such quarters, board, medical care, transportation, and other services, facilities, supplies, and equipment as the Secretary deems necessary for conservation centers. Whenever possible, the Secretary shall make arrangements with the Secretary of Defense to have such logistical support provided by a military installation near the proposed center, including the provision of temporary tent centers where needed.

(c) CONSERVATION CENTER MANAGEMENT.—Every conservation center shall have supervisory staff appointed by the chief administrator, including enrollees who have displayed exceptional leadership qualities.

(d) FUNDING.—(1) The Secretary may award grants to, or enter into agreements with, program agencies for the funding and operation of conservation centers approved by the Secretary under this Act.

(2) The Secretary shall not make any grant to, or enter into any agreement with, any program agency for the funding of any conservation center under this Act unless such agency certifies that the conservation center will not—

(A) result in the displacement of individuals currently employed by the land managing agency concerned (including partial displacement through reduction of nonovertime hours, wages, or employment benefits);

(B) result in the employment of any individual when any other person is in a layoff status from the same or substantially equivalent job within the jurisdiction of the program agency concerned; or

(C) impair existing contracts for services.

(3) Not less than 40 per centum of the sums appropriated to carry out this Act for any fiscal year shall be dispersed or expended by the Secretary to State program agencies; 10 per centum of such amount disbursed to such State agencies shall be divided equally among participating States and 90 per centum of such amount shall be distributed among the States proportionately according to the total youth population of the States between the ages of fifteen and twenty-five (as determined on the basis of the most recent census). Not less than 25 per centum of such sums appropriated for any fiscal year shall be disbursed by the Secretary pursuant to agreements with the Secretary of Agriculture.

(4) Payments under grants under this section may be made in advance or by way of reimbursement and at such intervals and on such conditions as the Secretary finds necessary.

(5) There is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary for each of the fiscal years 1983 through 1989 for purposes of carrying out this Act an amount equal to not more than — per centum of the sum of so much of the following amounts as would otherwise be credited to miscellaneous receipts in the Treasury—

(A) all franchise fees estimated to be collected for the fiscal year concerned by the Secretary and Secretary of Agriculture; and

(B) all receipts estimated to be due and payable to the United States for the fiscal year concerned from (i) permit fees (including fees for special use permits) imposed by the Secretary or the Secretary of Agriculture, (ii) sales of timber by the Secretary or the Secretary of Agriculture, and (iii) leasing activities of the Secretary and the Secretary of Agriculture.

Such sums shall remain available until expended.

(6) No authority under this Act to enter into contracts or to make payments shall be effective except to the extent and in such amounts as provided in advance in appropriations Acts. Any provision of this Act which, directly or indirectly, authorizes the enactment of new budget authority shall be effective only for fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1982.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEE STATUS

SEC. 6. (a) IN GENERAL.—Except as otherwise specifically provided in the following paragraphs, enrollees and crew leaders shall not be deemed Federal employees and shall not be subject to the provisions of law relating to Federal employment:

(1) For purposes of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 and title II of the Social Security Act, enrollees and crew leaders shall be deemed employees of the United States and any service performed by any person as an enrollee shall be deemed to be performed in the employ of the United States.

(2) For purposes of subchapter I of chapter 81 of title 5, United States Code, relating to the compensation of Federal employees for work injuries, enrollees and crew leaders shall be deemed civil employees of the United States within the meaning of the term "employee" as defined in section 8101 of title 5, United States Code, and the provisions of that subchapter shall apply, except—

(A) the term "performance of duty" shall not include any act of an enrollee member or crew leader while absent from his or her assigned post of duty, except while participating in an activity (including an activity while on pass or during travel to or from such post of duty); and

(B) compensation for disability shall not begin to accrue until the day following the date on which the injured enrollee's or crew leader's employment is terminated.

(3) For purposes of chapter 171 of title 28, United States Code, relating to tort claims procedure, enrollees and crew leaders shall be deemed employees of the United States within the meaning of the term "employee of the Government" as defined in section 2671 of title 28, United States Code.

(4) For purposes of section 5911 of title 5, United States Code, relating to allowances for quarters, enrollees and crew leaders shall be deemed employees of the United States within the meaning of the term "employee" as defined in that section.

(b) AMENDMENT OF TITLE 5.—Section 8332(b) of title 5, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (8);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (9) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and"; and

(3) by adding after paragraph (9) the following new paragraph:

"(10) service as an enrollee in the public lands conservation, rehabilitation, and improvement program only if the enrollee later becomes subject to this subchapter.".

SPECIAL RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE SECRETARY

SEC. 7. (a) PAY.—The Secretary shall establish standards for—

(1) rates of pay for enrollees which shall be not less than the wage required by section 6(a)(1) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (29 U.S.C. 206(a)(1));

(2) rates of pay for crew leaders which shall be at a wage comparable to the compensation in effect for grades GS-3 to GS-7; and

(3) reasonable hours and conditions of employment.

(b) COORDINATION.—The Secretary and the chief administrators of other program agencies carrying out programs under this Act shall coordinate the programs with related Federal, State, local, and private activities.

(c) MILITARY EXEMPTION STUDY.—The Secretary, in consultation with the Secretary of Defense, shall conduct a study to determine the feasibility and desirability of allowing enrollees who have completed a two-year enrollment in the program to be exempt from training and service under the Military Selective Service Act (50 U.S.C. App. 456). A report containing the results of the study shall be submitted to Congress not later than one year after the enactment of this Act.

EDUCATION, GUIDANCE, AND PLACEMENT

SEC. 8. (a) ACADEMIC CREDIT.—Whenever possible, the Secretary shall make arrangements for the award of academic credit by educational institutions and agencies to enrollees for competencies developed from work experience under this Act.

(b) STUDY.—Program agencies may provide educational materials and services for enrollees and may enter into arrangements with academic institutions for academic study by enrollees during nonworking hours to upgrade literacy skills, obtain equivalancy diplomas or college degrees, or enhance employable skills.

(c) CERTIFICATION.—The program agencies shall provide certification of the skills acquired by enrollees who have participated in the program.

(d) GUIDANCE AND PLACEMENT.—The program agency shall provide such job guidance and placement information and assistance for enrollees as may be necessary. Such assistance shall be provided in coordination with appropriate State, local, and private agencies and organizations.

ANNUAL REPORT

SEC. 9. The Secretary shall prepare and submit to the President and to the Congress at least once each year a report detailing the activities carried out under this Act. Such report shall be submitted not later than March 1 of each year following the date of enactment of this Act. The Secretary shall include in such report such recommendations as he considers appropriate.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1 provides a short title for this Act: "Public Lands Conservation, Rehabilitation, and Improvement Act of 1981."

Section 2 establishes the findings of Congress: that public lands and resources are being subjected to increased public use as well as additional demands for resources production and that this demand has produced a deteriorated condition that is beyond the funding and staff capability of government agencies to arrest or repair. The bill establishes a program to enhance and rehabilitate these public lands by providing employment opportunities for young men and women. It recognizes the need to reduce the maintenance backlog on public lands; establish a program to accomplish this work in a cost effective manner; coordinate and cooperate in this effort with State and local governments, Indian Tribes and other public and private organizations.

Section 3 defines terms used in the bill.

Section 4 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to establish and administer a Public Lands Conservation, Rehabilitation and Improvement Program. Under this program, the Secretary shall assist Federal and State agencies, non-profit organizations and Indian tribes (defined as "program agencies") in the establishment and operation of residential and non-residential conservation centers.

Typical projects to be accomplished under this program include: forestry, rangeland conservation, recreational area improvement, historical and cultural site preservation, urban revitalization, energy conservation, and other such activities which will result in public benefit. Preference to certain projects which, among other things, will provide long-term benefits to the public. Projects are limited to public lands, except where a project on other lands will have documented public benefits or reimbursement is provided. Projects must also be consistent with other provisions of law.

In addition, section 4 requires that program agencies apply to the Secretary of the Interior for approval to operate conservation centers. Application must include comprehensive description of the goals and objectives for such a center, a description of facilities and equipment to be available for the center, and estimate of enrollees, crew leaders, duration and type of services required for support, and a management plan for the center.

The location of conservation centers will be selected in such a way as to increase the enrollment of the economically, socially, physically and educationally disadvantaged youth and youth from areas of high unemployment. The Secretary must give due consideration to the cost and means of transportation between the center and homes of enrollees. Program agencies may enter into contracts with local government agencies and non-profit organizations for the management of conservation centers.

Section 5 describes eligibility for the program, including persons who are unemployed; not less than 16 or more than 25 years of age (except for summer programs where enrollees must be not less than 15 or more than 21 years of age); citizens, lawful permanent residents of the United States or lawfully admitted aliens or refugees. Except for the summer program, persons age 16–18 may not have left school for the express purpose of enrolling in this program.

Selection of enrollees is the responsibility of the chief administrator of the program agency. Enrollees shall be selected from those qualified who have applied to or been recruited by a program agency, State employment security service, community-based non-profit organization or the sponsor of an Indian program, or migrant or seasonal farm worker program and who have been screened for eligibility and referred by the State employment security service. Selection shall give preference to economically, socially, physically or educationally disadvantaged youth and to youth in areas of substantial unemployment.

No enrollee shall be a member of this program for longer than 24 months, although the period may be taken in 2 or 3 short terms which total no more than 24 months.

No enrollee may be employed as part of this program after age 26. The program agency shall be responsible for all services, facilities and supplies for the operation of conservation centers. Whenever possible the Secretary will arrange with the Secretary of Defense for logistical support to be provided by military installations near the center. The chief administrator of the program agency shall appoint supervisory staff. Enrollees who have displayed exceptional leadership qualities may be appointed as crew leaders.

This section also authorizes funding of conservation centers through the Secretary of the Interior and places limits on the funding of certain centers. The Secretary may award grants or enter into agreements with program agencies for the operation of approved conservation centers, provided that the center will not displace otherwise employed individuals or employees in layoff status from the same or equivalent job, nor impair existing contracts for services.

A funding distribution formula is also provided. Not less than 40 percent of sums appropriated for this program shall be disbursed to State program agencies; of that amount 10 percent will be divided evenly among participating States and 90 percent will be distributed proportionally according to the total youth population of the States between the ages of 15 and 25. Not less than 25 percent of the remaining sums will be disbursed to the Department of Agriculture pursuant to agreements between the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior.

Authorization for each fiscal year between 1983 and 1989 would be limited to a percentage of the amounts otherwise credited to miscellaneous receipts in the Treasury from all franchise and permit fees, leasing activities and timber sales in the Department of the Interior and the Department of Agriculture. Funding would require appropriations legislation and new budget authority would not be effective until after September 30, 1982.

Section 6 describes the Federal Employee Status of enrollees and amends Title 5 Section 8332(b) to accommodate the purposes of this Act.

Section 7 describes the Secretary of the Interior's special responsibilities with regard to setting minimum wage rates of pay for enrollees and coordination with other Federal, State, local and private activities. The Secretary is directed to submit, within a year of enactment, a study of the feasibility and desirability of allowing enrollees who have completed a two-year enrollment, to be exempt from military service and training under the Selective Service Act.

Section 8 directs the Secretary to make arrangements for the award of academic credit by educational institutions and agencies to enrollees who have attained work competencies as a result of this program.

Program agencies may provide educational materials and services for enrollees, and may enter into agreements with academic institutions to provide academic study for enrollees during non-working hours. Program agencies are directed to provide certification of skills acquired by enrollees and to provide job guidance and placement information as may be necessary.

Section 9 requires the Secretary of the Interior to make an annual report to the President and Congress on the activities of the program not later than March 1st of each year.●

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join the distinguished senior Senator from New York in introducing the Public Lands Conservation, Rehabilitation, and Improvement Act of 1982.

The need for this legislation is great. It simultaneously seeks to correct two major problems facing our Nation today.

First, the bill directly addresses the deteriorating condition of our public lands and parks by establishing residential and nonresidential conservation centers to upgrade the country's natural and cultural resources. Millions of acres of public rangeland are in substandard condition, and millions more are experiencing severe soil erosion. Furthermore, national, State, and city parks are suffering from the effects of vastly increased public use while the manpower and funds to deal with these effects are not forthcoming due to tightened budgets throughout all levels of government. Much needs to be done, especially in the conservation field. Activities such as reforestation, erosion and flood control, reclamation of strip-mined lands, and rangeland management would be promoted by enactment of this legislation.

Projects authorized under the bill would not, however, be limited to rural areas. Our towns and cities would also benefit through programs for harbor and port improvement, for repair and maintenance of city parks and community facilities, and for energy conservation. Priority would be given to those projects which will provide long-term benefits to the public and will provide meaningful work experience to the enrollees.

In addition to the environmental problems, this legislation addresses the serious problem of youth unemployment. We all know the depressing figures; but statistics tend to be cold, and at times defy understanding. Today's jobless numbers are harshly real, however. They include disillu-sioned young people, many of whom are minority group members, unable to find a job, and thus denied an opportunity to show they can contribute to this country's welfare. The bill we introduce today seeks to alleviate this deplorable situation by providing meaningful jobs on needed projects for young people aged 16 to 25. Preference is to be given to economically, socially, physically, and educationally disadvantaged youths, and to youths residing in areas, both rural and urban, which have substantial unemployment. The location and selection of the conservation centers will be made so as to increase the enrollment of such youths. In addition, the program agencies, whether they be Federal, State, local or tribal governmental bodies or nonprofit organizations, will provide job guidance and placement information and assistance for enrollees.

I believe this legislation will be cost effective. It is estimated that at a cost of $10,000 annually per enrollee the country will gain a return of $7,500 worth of public benefits. Of course, these figures do not reflect the gain in human terms to the enrollees, nor the benefits of reduced welfare and unemployment costs to our national and local economies. Furthermore, activities such as reforestation will increase our capital assets, thus returning even more money to the Treasury and thus to the taxpayer.

Unemployment diminishes the lives and aspirations not only of the unemployed and their families, but of all Americans. The Nation is poorer by virtue of the lack of goods and services produced; and by the social problems, including crime, which accompany high unemployment. We must regard unemployment in terms of its harmful effects on individuals and on our society to fully comprehend its devastation. It is a waste of energy, a waste of creativity, and a waste of our most precious national resource—our people.

This bill is not the final answer to youth unemployment. Other efforts are desperately needed, but passage of this legislation can play a significant role in easing a tragic situation.●

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

At the request of Mr. THURMOND, the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. EAST) was added as a cosponsor of S. 46, a bill to amend title 5 of the United States Code to permit present and former civilian employees of the Government to receive civil service annuity credit for retirement purposes for periods of military service to the United States as was covered by social security, regardless of eligibility for social security benefits.

S. 1172

At the request of Mr. JEPSEN, the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS) was added as a cosponsor of S. 1172, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to eliminate the holding-period requirements for capital gains treatment.

S. 1693

At the request of Mr. KASTEN, the Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABDNOR), the Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. BOSCHWITZ), and the Senator from Michigan (Mr. RIEGLE) were added as cosponsors of S. 1693, a bill to provide for the issuance of a special stamp to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the presence of the bald eagle on the official seal of the United States of America.

S. 1701

At the request of Mrs. HAWKINS, the Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN) was added as cosponsor of S. 1701, a bill to amend title 28, United States Code, to authorize the Attorney General to acquire and exchange information to assist Federal, State, and local officials in the identification of certain deceased individuals and in the location of missing children and other specified individuals.

S. 1757

At the request of Mr. STEVENS, the Senator from Indiana (Mr. LUGAR) was added as a cosponsor of S. 1757, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to clarify the tax-exempt status of certain amateur sports organizations.

S. 1918

At the request of Mr. SPECTER, the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ) was added as a cosponsor of S. 1918, a bill to establish the Northeast-Midwest States Federal Hydropower Financing Authority.

S. 1956

At the request of Mr. THURMOND, the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. LUGAR), the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK), the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. ANDREWS), and the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS) were added as cosponsors of S. 1956, a bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to authorize reimbursement for the reasonable charge for chiropractic services provided to certain veterans.

S. 1961

At the request of Mr. MITCHELL, the Senator from Alabama (Mr. HEFLIN) and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS) were added as cosponsors of S. 1961, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide energy tax credits for equipment used aboard or installed on fishing vessels.

S. 2012

At the request of Mr. PROXMIRE, the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2012, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to limit the deduction of living expenses by Members of Congress and to eliminate the provision which allows such deduction without substantiation of such expense.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 58

At the request of Mr. HATCH, the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. ANDREWS) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 58, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution altering Federal fiscal decisionmaking procedures.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 110

At the request of Mr. HATCH, the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. HUMPHREY) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 110, a joint resolution to amend the Constitution to establish legislative authority in Congress and the States with respect to abortion.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 121

At the reqeust of Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 121, a joint resolution to provide for the designation of the year 1982 as the "Bicentennial Year of the American Bald Eagle" and the designation of June 20, 1982, as "National Bald Eagle Day."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 121, ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I was to read the following statement on behalf of Mr. MITCHELL:

Mr. President, on November 9, 1981, Senator CHAFEE and I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 121, a measure designating 1982 the Bicentenial Year of the American Bald Eagle and June 20 National Bald Eagle Day. The bill, by commemorating the 200th anniversary of the designation of the eagle as our national symbol, provides a tribute not only to the majesty of the Bald Eagle and the Nation it respresents, but also the efforts of a wide variety of Americans who are working for its recovery. S.J. Res. 121 had 51 cosponsors on December 29, 1981, when it was unanimously passed by the Senate.

One early cosponsor of the legislation was Senator MATHIAS. The distinguished Senator from Maryland has long supported conserving and protecting our natural resources and his interest in S.J. Res. 121 was very helpful and greatly appreciated.

Through a clerical error, Senator MATHIAS was not properly recorded as a consponsor of the bill. I ask unanimous consent that the permanent record of the Senate be corrected to reflect his cosponsorship of the legislation.

Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. MITCHELL, I do ask unanimous consent that the permanent RECORD of the Senate be corrected to reflect Mr. MATHIAS' cosponsorship of the legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

TELEVISION AND RADIO COVERAGE OF THE SENATE

AMENDMENT NO. 1247

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table)

Mr. PRESSLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the resolution (S. Res. 20) providing for television and radio coverage of proceedings of the Senate.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 61—CONCURRENT RESOLUTION RELATIVE TO SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS

Mr. MATTINGLY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. CON. RES. 61

Whereas unforeseeable economic conditions have adversely affected the changes made by the Congress in 1977 in the social security retirement benefit formula;

Whereas those born in 1917 (and thereafter) whose work records are otherwise identical to work records of those born in 1916 will receive lower social security benefits under the present formula and economic conditions;

Whereas a simple repeal of the 1977 benefit formula would cost the Federal Old Age and Survivors' Insurance Trust Fund approximately $7,000,000,000 and would adversely affect those who chose to retire in the 1979 through 1981 period at age 62 through 64;

Whereas some compensatory alteration in benefit formulas is desirable to mitigate the benefit differentials being experienced by those retiring at age 65 in 1982; and

Whereas the National Commission on Social Security, after extensive investigation, found that this disparity in benefit amounts was unjust and that steps should be taken to resolve it: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, the Commissioner of Social Security and the Secretary of Health and Human Services should immediately conduct a study and report to Congress by March 31, 1982, on those steps (if any) which Congress might consider for purposes of changing the social security benefit disparity created under the current benefit formula transition (known as the "notch problem") in order to afford a more gradual transition between benefit formulas for those who have based their retirement plans on benefit levels which have existed for the past decade.

SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, today I rise to submit a concurrent resolution which calls for an investigation by the Commissioner of Social Security and the Secretary of Health and Human Services into what has come to be called the "notch" problem in social security.

People retiring this year are going to receive less money than those who retired in 1981. This is the result of amendments passed by Congress in 1977 that changed the method by which the rate of inflation is calculated. What was unforeseen in 1977 was the very high interest rates we have had in the last few years. This has resulted in a drastic change in benefits between retirees of the last few years and the retirees of 1982 and beyond.

Congress in 1977 unknowingly created a time bomb that is now ready to go off. The mild little adjustment in the benefit formula was scheduled to just result in a slight decrease. But the economic whirlwinds have created a potentially huge gap in monthly payments to retired workers.

How can you explain to someone who has paid into the system all of his life that he will receive far less than someone who retired the year before? They contributed the same amount into the system yet because one was born in 1916 instead of 1917, he will receive as much as $175 a month more than his fellow worker.

If someone can tell me how to explain the fairness of that to this year's retirees, I would like to hear about it and so would many of my constituents who are having trouble understanding.

I am all for saving money where we can, no matter what the program. I am not afraid of the social security problem and, as many of you are aware, I have introduced legislation with Senator SYMMS and Senator LUGAR that would change the cost-of-living adjustments on social security and other entitlement programs.

I am firmly convinced, however, that all retirees should be treated equally and any changes gradually phased in over a period of time. There is an old saying that goes, "Let's feed everyone out of the same spoon," that I think applies here.

I believe that, if properly explained, the majority of people will understand and go along with difficult decisions we will be making in the future that will affect social security. They may not be very happy about any changes in social security but as long as the changes are perceived as being fair and even-handed, they will accept them. Any hint of unfairness will be deeply resented and rightly so. We need to set the tone for fairness now in dealing with the "notch" problem.

I call upon my fellow Senators to join me in supporting this concurrent resolution. Congressman BRINKLEY of my home State has submitted a similar resolution in the House. I believe Congress should be on record as calling for fairness.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 62—CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE 70TH ANNIVERSARY OF HADASSAH

Mr. HATCH (for himself and Mr. KENNEDY) submitted the following concurrent resolution: which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. CON. RES. 62

Whereas Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America and the largest women's volunteer organization in the United States was founded on February 24, 1912;

Whereas Hadassah, with 370,000 members in all 50 states and Puerto Rico, celebrates its 70th Anniversary;

Whereas its seven decades of service have contributed to the health and education of countless thousands of persons both directly and through the training of medical personnel;

Whereas Hadassah created and maintains the world-renowned Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Center in Jerusalem, Israel, which is a living expression of the common humanitarian, social, ethical, religious and scientific values and friendship shared between the peoples of the United States and Israel;

Whereas the Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Center and its facilities have been made available to treat all peoples of the region regardless of religion, race or nationality in the tradition of this Oath of the Hebrew Physician: ". . . You shall help the sick, base or honorable, stranger or alien or citizen, because he is sick . . .";

Whereas Hadassah has striven to help promote democracy and create a better society for all peoples;

Whereas Hadassah's volunteerism in helping others, exemplified by its founder, Henrietta Szold, has provided inspiration and encouragement at a time when citizen groups are being urged to play a greater role in promoting the general well-being,

Be it therefore resolved that the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring) congratulates Hadassah on its 70th Anniversary and extends its best wishes for many more decades of international humanitarian service.

70TH ANNIVERSARY OF HADASSAH

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, in his state of the Union message, President Reagan spoke of his faith in the American people, a faith by which he expressed confidence that our citizens and private organizations would begin to perform services which our Government may no longer fund in its drive for fiscal integrity.

Mr. President, I, too, share his faith in the American people to "perform the good works they choose," and today would like to recognize and commend a service organization of longstanding dignity. Indeed, this organization does not require the motivation of a Presidential plea to perform its service, but exemplifies the quality of service from which all America can learn.

Today, Senator KENNEDY and I are submitting a Senate concurrent resolution congratulating Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America, on 70 years of exemplary service.

Hadassah was founded on February 24, 1912, as a humanitarian service organization. Today, seven decades later, it is the largest women's volunteer organization in the United States, with 370,000 members. Through the work of its many dedicated members and by training medical personnel, this exemplary organization has reached out to countless thousands of persons regardless of religion, race, or nationality.

Hadassah created and maintains the world-renowned Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Center in Jerusalem, Israel, which honors the Oath of the Hebrew Physician: ". . . You shall help the sick, base or honorable, stranger or alien or citizen, because he is sick . . ." The Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Center is a living expression of the common humanitarian, social, ethical, religious, and scientific values shared between the peoples of the United States and Israel.

Mr. President, Hadassah idealizes the hope of President Reagan. Indeed, the "volunteer spirit is still alive and well in America." We wish them success for their service in America and abroad, for now and for many years to come.

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am honored to cosponsor this concurrent resolution with Senator HATCH commemorating the celebration of the 70th anniversary of Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America.

Hadassah was founded on February 24, 1912, and for seven decades has played a major leadership role in serving humanitarian goods in our Nation and around the world. With a membership of 370,000, it is now the largest women's volunteer organization in the United States.

Hadassah created and maintains the Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Center, which trains medical personnel on the basis of the Oath of the Hebrew Physician: "You shall help the sick, base or honorable, stranger or alien or citizen, because he is sick * * *"

Through the commitment and dedication of its members, Hadassah has made major efforts to promote economic and social justice and to create a better world for all peoples.

At a time when citizens' groups are being urged to play a greater role in promoting the general well-being, Hadassah deserves the recognition and the thanks of the U.S. Senate for its volunteer efforts over the last 70 years.

I am therefore proud to join with Senator HATCH in submitting this resolution in the Senate and encouraging its formal adoption by the Senate.●

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, February 4, at 10 a.m., to hold a hearing on S. 1937, a bill to extend the expiration date of section 252 of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

ANCHORAGE POST OFFICE

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, during the holiday recess there appeared in one of my hometown papers, the Anchorage Daily News, an editorial on the operation of the Anchorage post office during the Christmas holiday season. As I have stated before, I do not hesitate to criticize the Postal Service when they are wrong or to pursue a constituent's complaint. But, I also feel it incumbent upon us to give credit where credit is due when the Postal Service and its employees perform an outstanding job. That's just what the Anchorage Daily News did in their recent editorial.

I join in saluting Anchorage Postmaster Robert Opinsky and the outstanding postal employees there for a job well done during this last Christmas season. I submit for the RECORD the complete text of the December 16, 1981, editorial in the Anchorage Daily News.

The editorial follows:

HOLIDAY GOOD CHEER FROM THE POST OFFICE

Holiday-season trips to the post office, it seems, are more often an occasion for fear and loathing than Christmas cheer. Long lines and confusion too easily can overshadow the spirit of the season with a demonstration of one of its minor aggravations. But when efficiency and cheerful service are encountered at the post office during the holiday rush . . . well, it simply gladdens the heart.

A reliable reporter offered an account of just such an experience Tuesday afternoon—a story of competence and prompt assistance at both the Spenard Post Office and the Carrier Station on Arctic Boulevard. In neither place did long lines bring long delay. Troubleshooters working in front of the counter weighed packages and sorted out difficulties ahead of time; a full staff of workers behind the counter handled matters smoothly and cheerfully. Information and assistance were available for the asking, and given with courtesy. In 10 minutes, our reporter mailed two packages, stocked up on stamps, and bought stamp collector kits to use as gifts.

No doubt there are plenty of post office horror stories afoot these days—tales of short tempers and woe, rude treatment and needless delay. Perhaps our reporter's experience was the exception rather than the rule. Perhaps the tensions of the next 10 days will reduce the effort to mail a package to an exercise in frustration and chaos. But this case was a demonstration that even the post office can be a forum for grace under pressure. The model could, and should, be copied throughout the holiday season and beyond.

Many's the time we have wished the Christmas spirit would ease the aggravations of December trips to the post office. Many's the time we have wished for a little extra effort by the postal service—something beyond lectures on early mailing—to reduce the confusion and delay involved in sending holiday packages and greetings.

Now that we've actually seen just that, we'd be remiss if we failed to sing praises and root for more of the same.

BRUCE T. KAJI

● Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, on February 4, 1982, Bruce T. Kaji, a dedicated American and Californian, will be honored by the Boy Scouts of America for his diligent support of their organization, and his many worthwhile civic contributions to our Nation. Mr. Kaji will be bestowed the honor of the Distinguished Citizen Award. Being an individual of extreme integrity and dedication, Mr. Kaji has my wholehearted support and admiration in light of his numerous accomplishments.

The development of American youth through the Boy Scouts of America has always been one of Mr. Kaji's ardent priorities. It is his belief that the Boy Scout organization has acted as a successful means in which the values in our young adults are being reinforced. His keen insight and awareness in this regard has enabled others to respect and emulate his outstanding example. There can be no greater tribute to a man's character than when other individuals are motivated by his productive deeds.

In addition to his involvement with scouting, Mr. Kaji has been an energetic force in the Japanese community. This is exemplified by his leadership in organizations such as the Little Tokyo Community Development Advisory Committee, Minami Keiro Retirement Home, Japanese Cultural Institute, Japanese American Citizens League, Nisei Veterans Coordinating Council, and other groups. With his election as treasurer of the city of Gardena in 1962, Mr. Kaji was instrumental in building the foundation of Japanese representation in government and became the first American elected to office in the continental United States. In his desire for recognition of Japanese-American accomplishments, he has most recently directed his efforts to the creation of the National Japanese American Museum which will be located in Little Tokyo.

The noble qualities of Mr. Kaji certainly warrant the respect that has been bestowed upon him. His appetite for intellectual stimulus continues to enhance and motivate his magnanimous personality. It is precisely for this reason that I, along with every other American, should be proud of this selfless individual.●

SECRETARY WATT'S CONTINUING ABUSE OF POWER

● Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, if President Reagan is serious about getting Government off the backs of the people, he should take a careful look at the activities of Interior Secretary James Watt.

Watt's first year at Interior has consisted of abuse after abuse of our laws in almost compulsive disregard of the intent of Congress. Mr. Watt has demonstrated a startling incomprehension of our Constitution and of the separation of powers.

Thus, it is no suprise that Watt should end his first year with another abuse of power: The firing of a young lobbyist who questioned Watt's flagrant rightwing radicalism. The Interior Department's pressure on the young man's bosses is an abuse of Federal power which even the Reagan White House should condemn.

Our former colleague, Senator Gaylord Nelson, now chairman of the Wilderness Society, has laid out the case against Watt's role as "a spokesman for discord and intimidation." I wish to share Senator Nelson's letter with the supporting documents with my colleagues and ask that they appear at this place in the RECORD.

The material follows:

THE WILDERNESS SOCIETY,
Washington, D.C., January 29, 1982.

Hon. ALAN CRANSTON,
Russell Office Bldg., Washington, D.C.

DEAR ALAN: The Washington Post and the New York Times this week carried reports about an energy company executive, Timothy L. Donohoe, who was fired for writing a personal letter to James Watt questioning the Secretary's statement to California farmers:

"I don't use the words 'Democrats' and 'Republicans'. . . It's liberals and Americans."

Mr. Donohoe took exception to having his patriotism questioned, and it cost him his job.

I have been an outspoken critic of Secretary Watt because I believe his policies and actions represent a serious threat to the environment and the public lands. But no action since he became Secretary more than a year ago has caused me more concern than the undisguised and heavy-handed use of arbitrary power against an individual American who happened to have honest differences with Mr. Watt.

Mr. Donohoe worked for a Dallas energy company, Enserch, which holds 324 oil and gas leases on federal land and also has lease applications pending before the Department of Interior.

Therefore, it could only have had a chilling effect on the chairman of Enserch to receive a very pointed letter from Stanley Hulett, Interior's Secretary for Congressional and Legislative Affairs and a key aide to Mr. Watt, relating that "the Secretary is, frankly, surprised at Mr. Donohoe representation in the attached letter."

One can only conclude that the Interior Department was sending a clear signal that, not only was the Secretary displeased, but that action by Enserch was expected.

The implications of this are enormous. 118 million acres of federal land have been leased to private oil and gas companies. Thousands of lease applications are pending. The Department of Interior decides what applicant shall be granted a lease and sets the guidelines that must be followed in exploring and extracting oil and gas.

Is not this whole episode a threatening signal to all who do business with the Interior Department? Rarely has Washington seen such a raw abuse of power.

This case is a reprehensible example of a consistent pattern of inflammatory and divisive statements that Mr. Watt set when he first took office and has followed ever since. The record shows beyond doubt that he has created a climate of abusive intimidation and retaliation in dealing with people or organizations who disagree with him or his policies.

Mr. Watt made this clear early in his administration. Last March in his first major policy speech, to national park concessioners, he said: "We mean business, and when you read the press you're going to find out that I can be cold and calculating, and indeed I can . . . If a personality is giving you a problem, we're going to get rid of the problem or the personality, whichever is faster."

During Mr. Watt's confirmation hearings a year ago, he pledged "to listen, to reach out" and to "open up" channels of communication. His words and actions have made a mockery of that pledge.

In December, Mr. Watt ordered Department of Interior officials not to meet with or talk to professional conservationists.

Addressing the Board of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, many members of which are regularly involved in matters before the Interior Department, Mr. Watt chastised corporate leaders whose companies make contributions to conservation organizations, specifically naming The Wilderness Society, Sierra Club, National Wildlife Federation, and the National Audubon Society.

"The battle is not one of environmental rules. The battle is over a philosophy of government," he said. "Are we going to have a centralized, socialized planned economy as we had in the last administration, or are we going to a market-oriented system?"

The Legal Times of Washington reported recently that Mr. Watt has complained about energy companies' hiring of Carter administration officials as lawyers or consultants, and that the Interior Department has made it known that Democratic counsel will not be welcome at the agency.

Addressing park concessioners, he denounced decades of Congresses, administrations, and cabinet members by declaring that he was going "to change 40-50 years of bad government."

He has pitted western states against eastern states and turned America's land and natural resources into a sectional, political battleground.

The Reagan administration says it wants to get the government off the backs of individual Americans. Yet, one individual who had the temerity to question Mr. Watt's assertion that liberals are un-American suddenly found the full weight of Interior Department on his back, and was fired.

Mr. Watt tries to pass off as a joke his distinction between "liberals and Americans." As the Donohoe firing demonstrates, that kind of mean remark coming from Secretary Watt is neither a joke nor empty rhetoric. As he said himself, "We mean business."

As the enclosed material illustrates, Mr. Watt has become a spokesman for discord and intimidation that have no place in our free society, and certainly not in the Cabinet of the United States.

Sincerely,

GAYLORD NELSON,
Chairman.

WASHINGTON, D.C.
December 1, 1981.

Hon. JAMES G. WATT,
The Secretary of the Interior,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Would you kindly furnish a further clarification of your remarks, as reported in a certain California newspaper and reprinted in yesterday's Washington Post, which could be construed as a questioning of the patriotism of certain individuals?

For the record, I am an American and a liberal. And the Washington lobbyist for a $3 billion energy concern.

I would appreciate a thorough and personal reply.

Very truly yours,

TIMOTHY L. DONOHOE.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D.C., December 15, 1981.

Mr. WILLIAM MCCORD,
President, Enserch Corporation
Dallas, Tex.

DEAR MR. MCCORD: I thought you might find interesting a copy of a letter delivered by hand to the Secretary's Office by your Washington representative. The issue Mr. Donohoe questions was part of a joke the Secretary told at a political fundraiser and is certainly not meant to question the patriotism of anyone.

The Secretary is, frankly, surprised at Mr. Donohoe's representation in the attached letter.

Yours truly,

STANLEY W. HULETT,
Assistant to the Secretary and Director of Congressional and Legislative Affairs.

[From the Dallas Times Herald, Jan. 26, 1982]

ENSERCH LOBBYIST FIRED FOR CRITICISM OF WATT: "LIBERALS VS. AMERICANS" CONCEPT CHALLENGED

(By Jeffry S. Unger)

A lobbyist for the corporation that owns Lone Star Gas Co. has been fired for questioning Secretary of Interior James G. Watt's comment that the political world is divided between "liberals and Americans."

Timothy L. Donohoe, 36, was fired after a Watt aide wrote the lobbyist's boss—and included with his message a copy of a letter Donohoe had sent Watt about his remarks. The aide said Watt was "surprised" Donohoe would do such a thing.

Donohoe, who said today he still has not received a reply from Watt or the department, was fired from his $30,000-a-year job as a Washington representative for Enserch, a Dallas-based natural gas company that owns Lone Star Gas, earlier this month for his "lack of judgment."

On Dec. 1, Donohoe said, he wrote Watt about a report in the previous day's Washington Post, quoting a Fresno Bee story about a speech Watt had made to a group of California farmers. In the speech Watt said, "I never use the words Republicans and Democrats. It's liberals and Americans."

Donohoe, in a telephone interview this morning, said the newspaper article did not lead him to believe the remark was made tongue-in-cheek, although Watt's aide claimed that was the case.

In Donohoe's letter, written on private stationery with his office address, the lobbyist asked Watt to "kindly furnish a further clarification of your remarks . . . which could be construed as questioning the patriotism of certain individuals."

"For the record," he added, "I am an American and a liberal. And the Washington lobbyist for a $3 billion energy concern."

Donohoe, whose official title with the company was federal relations coordinator, said he received no reply, but was called in two weeks ago, by his supervisor, Candice J. Shy, and shown a copy of his letter and one written Dec. 15 by Stanley W. Hulett, an assistant to Watt and director of the Interior department's congressional affairs office. Hulett's letter was to William C. McCord, chairman and chief executive officer of Enserch.

Hulett wrote: "I thought you might find interesting a copy of a letter delivered by hand to the secretary by your Washington representative.

"The issue Mr. Donohoe questions was part of a joke the secretary told at a political fund-raiser and is certainly not meant to question the patriotism of anyone.

"The secretary is, frankly, surprised at Mr. Donohoe's representation in the attached letter."

Donohoe said Ms. Shy, vice president for federal relations, told him he was being fired for his "lack of judgment" in writing the letter.

Shortly before noon today, the company issued this statement: "This use of poor judgment by Mr. Donohoe in writing such a letter was the basis of his dismissal. The fact that the letter was addressed to the Secretary of the Interior had no bearing on the decision to terminate Mr. Donohoe." McCord's office referred all questions to Ms. Shy in Washington, who could not be reached.

Hulett also was not available for comment, but Tom DeRocco, acting deputy director of the office of public affairs at Interior, said, "The letter will have to speak for itself."

Rep. Charles Wilson, D-Tex., on whose staff Donohoe had worked for seven years before joining Enserch 14 months ago, said he was disturbed by the incident.

Wilson, who is from Lufkin, described himself as "sort of a closet defender of Watt because I've had so much hell with the extreme environmentalists in my district. But that's over. I think he's as bad or worse than his detractors have been saying. This was a vengeful, nasty thing to do.

"This is McCarthyism in its worse form," Wilson said.

Wilson said he plans to talk to Rep. Morris Udall, D-Ariz., chairman of the House Interior Committee, and Rep. Sidney R. Yates, D-Ill., chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on interior, to see if they will investigate the incident.

"What I'd like to do, if they would do it, is get some hearings to find out if the department always tries to get people fired who write critical letters," Wilson said.

Wilson, a strong supporter of the oil and gas industry, was less critical of Enserch than he was of Watt. "I would say that in circumstances like this I don't fault the company, because a major energy company can be intimidated by the Interior Department," he said.

He said he called Enserch executives following Donohoe's firing but realized there was little point in pressing the issue.

Wilson said the fact that Hulett had "taken the trouble to track down" Donohoe's employer and "sent a letter to the chairman of the board, instead of to Tim . . . represents the smallness, the pettiness and the hatefulness people have been accusing Watt of."

Donohoe went to work for Wilson on March 16, 1974, after dropping out of a Catholic seminary only a short time before he was to be ordained as a priest. Wilson called him a "jack of all trades" who handled constituent case work, energy research and assisted the press secretary.

Ms. Shy had once been Wilson's press secretary and worked with Donohoe when he worked for the congressman. She hired him away from Wilson's office to become a lobbyist.

Donohoe said his letter to Watt was the first he had ever written on a private matter to a public official. Watt's luncheon comments as quoted in the Post "struck a chord," Donohoe said, and moved him to write the secretary. Donohoe said he did not notify anyone at Enserch that he had written the letter and that the company has no policy against such letters, he said.

LOBBYIST FIRED AFTER LETTER TO WATT

(By William J. Choyke)

WASHINGTON.—Until 16 days ago, Timothy Donohoe was one of two lobbyists in the respected federal relations office of Dallas-based Enserch Corp., a profitable energy conglomerate.

Today the self-described "liberal and American" is looking for a new job after he was fired for questioning Interior Secretary James Watt's recent remarks that the political world was divided between "liberals and Americans."

Donohoe, 36, was fired earlier this month after a top-ranking aide to Watt complained to Enserch president William McCord, a staunch supporter of Reagan administration policies, about a personal letter the lobbyist wrote to Watt on Dec. 1.

The letter asked Watt to clarify statements that included disparaging remarks about liberals made during a secretly taped speech to a California farm group. The House of Representatives is "riddled with a bunch of liberals" and Washington is more a city of "liberals and Americans" than of "Democrats and Republicans," Watt said in the speech, which was first reported in a California newspaper.

After reading about the speech, Donohoe wrote to Watt on stationery that included his name and office address. Although the stationery was purchased by Enserch, it did not include the name of the company, which until 1975 was called Lone Star Gas Co.

In the letter, Donohoe, identifying himself as "the Washington lobbyist for a $3 billion energy concern," said he was "an American and a liberal" and sought a clarification of the statements "which could be construed as questioning the patriotism of certain individuals."

He did not name his employer.

Two weeks later, the Interior Department congressional affairs director, Stanley Hulett, sent the letter on to McCord, whose company holds many mineral leases on federal land controlled by the Department of Interior.

In a cover letter, Hulett wrote to McCord: "I thought you might find interesting a copy of a letter delivered by hand to the secretary (Watt) by your Washington representative . . . The secretary is, frankly, surprised at Mr. Donohoe's representation in the attached letter."

Tom DeRocco, acting deputy director of the Interior's office of public affairs, said late Tuesday that "Mr. Hulett acted without the secretary's knowledge when he sent that letter." While he said Watt was surprised upon learning about the letter, he said he was not aware of any action taken against Hulett, who was unavailable for comment.

But DeRocco's explanation did not satisfy Rep. Charles Wilson, D-Lufkin, who employed Donohoe for seven years before he joined Enserch.

"It is a case of meanness and McCarthyism on the part of Watt," said Wilson, who said Hulett's letter was intended to intimidate Enserch.

"I've never seen anything that vengeful in my 10 years up here. To take the trouble to chase him down and then write the chairman of the board of his company. It's absolutely an outrage," Wilson said.

After about a month of "dealing with the problem," Donohoe said, he was fired Jan. 11 from his $30,000-per-year post by his boss and old friend Candice Shy. The order to dismiss him originated with McCord, who earned $458,315 in 1980, company records show.

"It didn't ever occur to me that I could lose my job over this," Donohoe said. "The letter (to Watt) wasn't meant to be tongue-in-cheek although it could be described as cheeky."

McCord, Enserch chairman and president, declined to respond to questions. But the company issued a statement saying that "this use of poor judgment by Mr. Donohoe in writing such a letter was the basis of dismissal."

Ms. Shy, who worked with Donohoe on Wilson's staff, said that since he began work at Enserch, Donohoe "had been doing very, very well.

"He had made a good contribution," said Ms. Shy, who in her early 30s is considered one of the top young energy lobbyists in Washington. "This was just too much."

While she did not have any specific figures available, Ms. Shy, the Enserch vice president for federal relations, said leases on federal lands "does not constitute a significant portion of our lease holds." The company's main subsidiary owned total leases of 1.9 million net acres in the United States in 1980.

A diversified energy company, Enserch has experienced rapid growth during the past seven years as its revenues have increased from $658 million in 1975 to more than $3 billion in 1981. It now has several divisions, including Lone Star Gas Co. and employs more than 20,000 persons.

While McCord is described as a non-political company president, he reported during the annual shareholders' meeting last year that "nearly everything we see going on with the Reagan administration is either favorable or suggestive of improvements to be forthcoming."

GAS COMPANY LOBBYIST FIRED FOR QUESTIONING WATT REMARK

(By David S. Broder)

A gas company lobbyist who questioned Secretary of Interior James G. Watt's comment that the political world is divided between "liberals and Americans" was fired from his job after a Watt aide wrote the lobbyist's boss that the secretary was "surprised" the lobbyist would do such a thing.

Timothy L. Donohoe, 36, said yesterday he was fired from his $30,000-a-year job as Washington representative for Enserch, a Dallas-based natural gas company, earlier this month for his "lack of judgement."

On Dec. 1, Donohoe said, he had written Watt about a report in the previous day's Washington Post, quoting a Fresno Bee story about a speech Watt had made to a group of California farmers. In the speech, Watt said, "I never use the words Republican and Democrats. It's liberals and Americans."

In the letter, written on private stationery with his office address, Donohoe asked Watt to "kindly furnish a further clarification of your remarks . . . which could be construed as questioning the patriotism of certain individuals."

"For the record," he added, "I am an American and a liberal. And the Washington lobbyist for a $3 billion energy concern."

Donohoe said he received no reply, but was called in two weeks ago by his boss, Candice J. Shy, and shown a copy of his letter and one written on Dec. 15 by Stanley W. Hulett, an assistant to Watt and director of Interior's congressional affairs. Hulett's letter was to William C. McCord, chairman and chief executive officer of Enserch.

Hulett wrote: "I thought you might find interesting a copy of a letter delivered by hand to the secretary by your Washington representative.

"The issue Mr. Donohoe questions was part of a joke the secretary told at a political fund-raiser and is certainly not meant to question the patriotism of anyone.

"The secretary is, frankly, surprised at Mr. Donohoe's representation in the attached letter."

Donohoe said yesterday that Shy told him that he was being fired for his "lack of judgment" in writing the letter. Cleaning out his desk yesterday, he said he was still in a state of "shock and disbelief."

William T. Satterwhite, senior vice president and general counsel for Enserch, last night confirmed the basic facts in Donohoe's account but said, "I believe it would be inappropriate to comment further."

Interior's Hulett was not available for comment, but Tom DeRocco, acting deputy director of the office of public affairs at Interior, said, "The letter will have to speak for itself."

Rep. Charles Wilson (D-Tex.), on whose staff Donohoe had worked for seven years before joining Enserch 14 months ago, said he was disturbed by the incident.

Wilson said the fact that Hulett had "taken the trouble to track down" Donohoe's employer and "sent a letter to the chairman of the board, instead of to Tim . . . represents the smallness, the pettiness and the hatefulness people have been accusing Watt of. I have been a defender of Watt, but this represents a kind of vengefulness I hate to see."

DeRocco would not comment on Wilson's remarks.

LOBBYIST, JOBLESS, ACCUSES WATT AIDE

(By Phil Gailey)

WASHINGTON, January 26.—A Washington lobbyist for a Texas energy company says he was dismissed after Interior Department officials complained to his employers about a letter he wrote to Interior Secretary James G. Watt.

The former lobbyist, Timothy L. Donohoe, said he wrote the letter as a private citizen, and on personal stationery. In it, he said, he sought a clarification of Mr. Watt's statement in November that the House of Representatives was "riddled with a bunch of liberals" and that Washington was more a city of "liberals and Americans" than of "Democrats and Republicans."

Instead of responding, Mr. Donohoe said, Stanley W. Hulett, assistant secretary for Congressional and legislative affairs, sent a copy of the letter with one of his own to William McCord, president of the Enserch Corporation of Dallas, Mr. Donohoe's employer. A carbon copy was sent to Charles DiBona, president of the American Petroleum Institute.

Mr. Hulett said in his letter, Mr. Donohoe continued, that "the issue Mr. Donohoe questions was part of a joke the Secretary told at a political fund-raiser and is certainly not meant to question the patriotism of anyone."

According to the Donohoe account, the letter concluded: "The Secretary is, frankly, surprised at Mr. Donohoe's representation in the attached letter."

Mr. McCord did not return a reporter's telephone call today. Neither did Mr. Watt nor Mr. Hulett, even though a message was left with their offices explaining the nature of the inquiry.

Mr. Donohoe said he was told two weeks ago by his supervisor, Candice J. Shy, vice president for Federal relations for Enserch, that Mr. McCord had decided to dismiss him for a lack of judgment in writing the letter.

"It still boggles my mind," said Mr. Donohoe, who is 36 years old and describes himself as "both a liberal and an American." He added, "I can't believe my company is doing this to me."

Mr. Donohoe said Representative Charles Wilson, Democrat of Texas, for whom he worked for seven years on energy matters, had tried to persuade Enserch officials to reconsider.

Mr. Wilson, in a telephone interview, characterized Mr. Hulett's action as "an awfully, awfully cheap shot" and said he planned to take the matter before appropriate House committees.

Mr. Donohoe said he had decided to write the letter after reading newspaper accounts of Mr. Watt's remarks to a group of California farmers last November. Although the meeting was closed to reporters, a farmer taped the Secretary's remarks and made the tape available to The Fresno Bee.

AIDE SAYS WATT NOT INVOLVED IN LOBBYIST'S FIRING

A spokesman for Secretary of Interior James G. Watt said yesterday that Watt never saw the letter one of his aides sent to an energy company executive that led to the firing of the company's Washington lobbyists.

Timothy L. Donohoe was fired from his $30,000-a-year job with Enserch, a Dallas-based natural gas company, after writing Watt a letter questioning the secretary's statement quoted in a newspaper article that he divided the political world, not between Republicans and Democrats, but between "liberals and Americans."

Instead of replying to Donohoe, Stanley W. Hulett, an assistant to Watt and director of Interior's congressional liaison office, sent a copy of Donohoe's letter to William C. McCord, the chairman and chief executive officer of Enserch. Hulett wrote that "the secretary is, frankly, surprised at Mr. Donohoe's representation in the attached letter." Enserch then fired Donohoe.

Douglas Baldwin, Interior's director of public affairs, said yesterday that Watt "was not involved in that [Hulett's] letter. He learned about it when he read it in the paper today." Later, Baldwin added that Watt had read Donohoe's letter and was "surprised" at its contents, but Baldwin insisted that Watt gave "no instructions to anyone on the staff to pursue it further."

Hulett continued to refuse telephone calls, but Baldwin said that answering the letter "was within the scope" of Hulett's office. Asked why Hulett had written to the corporation president, with a copy to the head of the American Petroleum Institute, rather than to Donohoe, Baldwin said: "Often a letter of praise is sent to a supervisor so the subordinate gets credit."

Asked if that was the intent in this case, he said, "No."

Meantime, Candice J. Shy, the head of Enserch's Washington office, said the "bad judgment" for whch Donohoe was fired was his reference to himself as an energy company lobbyist and the fact that the stationery on which he wrote, while not having the company name, did have its Washington address and phone number.

INTERIOR WARNS AGAINST RETAINING POLITICAL OUTSIDERS

(By W. John Moore)

At least four ex-Carter administration attorneys now striving to develop an energy and environment practice in Washington have found their efforts hindered by Interior Department officials who have warned present or prospective clients against retaining politically undesirable lawyers.

The intimidation ranges from comments by some Interior Department officials that they prefer to deal with Republican law firms, to outright threats to some companies that their outside counsel will not be welcome at the agency, according to former Carter administration officials.

The Interior Department scare tactics have worked in varying degrees, according to sources. In at least one case, the client dropped his lawyer and the law firm and sought new counsel. In another instance, the client shifted part of the legal work at Interior to a Republican consultant; and in a third case, the attorney agreed that a more politically palatable member of his law firm should represent his client at Interior. As a result, the lawyers conceded that the tactics have injured both their pocketbooks and their pride.

In the rarefied air of high-level Washington law, "denying access to an attorney is like signing a death warrant for his practice," said one lawyer. As a result, the attorneys targeted by Interior declined to discuss their problems on the record.

Agency officials declined to respond to questions about the attorneys, despite Legal Times' repeated phone calls to Interior Secretary James G. Watt's office, to other department officials, and to Interior's public affairs office.

Although Watt did not specifically discuss lawyer representation with the attorney's clients, the lawyers maintain that the highly charged partisan atmosphere at the agency is created by Watt.

"My suspicion is that Watt is right on top of this. He is a lawyer and knows this game intimately. He knows exactly how to cripple people," said one former Interior Department attorney.

TERRIBLE MISTAKE

According to another source, Watt "complained about energy companies' hiring Carter administration officials as lawyers or consultants and what a terrible mistake it was" at a meeting last summer with approximately 10 industry officials. The lawyers claim that W. Perry Pendley, deputy assistant secretary for energy and minerals, and David C. Russell, deputy assistant secretary for land and water resources, discouraged energy companies from hiring former Carter administration lawyers.

"This quasi-official policy met with favor in the department," said one lawyer. "I can't imagine any political appointee making these kinds of statements to companies without feeling pretty comfortable that he would be supported by Mr. Watt," said another attorney.

"What really distinguishes this administration from any other one that I have seen in my 20 years in Washington is this kind of petty vindictiveness," said a former Justice Department lawyer now in private practice.

Although the former Carter administration attorneys—all of whom held high-level legal positions at the Interior Department—believe that the officials' actions are unfair and unethical, they point out that any complaints would boomerang and only erode existing clients' confidence in their legal ability and access to power. "If there is a perception among your clients that you are an untouchable then you really are through," noted one lawyer. "To complain would be extremely foolish," added another attorney. "The only attitude to take is that I'm going to be here a lot longer than they are."

For the same reason, the four attorneys contacted by Legal Times agreed to discuss the matter only off the record, fearing that any mention of their names or their law firms' identity would only further endanger their relationship with their clients.

"If I had a stable of clients, I could talk more openly," noted one of the attorneys. "My one major client came to me because of my experience and reputation. I'm not a rainmaker, and I don't want to endanger my relationship with this client," he added.

REPUBLICAN CONSULTANT

Nevertheless, the lawyers agreed to discuss the Interior Department's actions on a not-for-attribution basis. In one instance, for example, an Alaskan-native group represented by a former higher-level Interior official was told by one Reagan appointee to get another counsel. Instead, the group decided to retain its lawyer, but hired a Republican consultant as well.

Another lawyer who has lost three clients said one of them told him that an Interior Department deputy assistant secretary frowned on the company's legal counsel.

A legal services office in the West, interested in securing a contract from the Bureau of Indian Affairs at Interior, was considering hiring a former Interior official as a consultant on the contract. But the deal eventually fell through after the attorney's name was mentioned in Washington. "At the point the details of the deal got back to Washington and my name was heard in connection with the case—at that point all negotiations were suspended," said the lawyer.

A former Justice Department lawyer now in private practice encountered similar problems with Interior. After he resolved a case out West involving his client and Interior's Bureau of Land Management, an Interior official called the client directly and complained about the client's hiring a former Carter administration lawyer. Interior's interference "caused serious reverberations in that law firm," according to one attorney.

According to one lawyer, his client was told by a political appointee at Interior that while he liked the lawyer personally, "[the attorney] is not going to be welcome representing you [here]."

The lawyers who have encountered difficulties at Interior admit to being baffled and confused by the problems. They agree that in Washington—where one administration's lawyers become the next administration's lobbyists—this type of pressure is highly unusual. "My God, half the people who came around to see us at Interior were former Nixon or Ford people, and we never gave it a thought," said one of the attorneys now running into trouble at his old agency.

"This is really a case of misplaced partisanship," noted another lawyer, who stressed that the government needs the cross-fertilization of ideas that comes from contacts with the other side.

But another attorney affected by the threats to his clients admitted there is very little he can do. "I would not try to flout that policy, whatever it is, to the detriment of my client," he said. "I have asked one of my colleagues who is politically more attuned to represent my client in this type of situation."

CHAMBER RENEWS FISCAL-POLICY STAND

(By R. T. Gray)

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce has rallied behind president Reagan in the escalating controversy over his economic policies.

At its quarterly meeting, the chamber board unanimously adopted a resolution reaffirming strong support for the Reagan program.

The statement declared, "The transition from over-dependence on the federal government to a revitalized private-enterprise economy will not occur quickly or easily.

"Yet, the course the president has charted is sound and deserves the unwavering support of all Americans and their elected representatives."

Earlier, Vice president George Bush said in an appearance before the board, "the president is determined to stay the course; you have nothing to worry about. . . . This president is not about to retreat under fire."

Bush told the directors that of the many groups with which he comes in contact, "none has been more steadfast than you, not always to the benefit of your own interests. . . . You have stood on the basis of principle. The president appreciates your support enormously."

In other activities at the meeting:

Interior Secretary James Watt said the battles he is embroiled in with his critics go beyond strict environmental concerns and involve efforts of his opponents to thwart administration efforts to restore a free-market economy.

Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger disputed claims that the president's planned military buildup will aggravate inflation.

In reaffirming its support for the president's economic initiatives, the Chamber noted it had been the first national organization to go on record in support of the program Reagan announced Feb. 19.

"We took this action," the board said, "in full confidence that the Reagan package of budget reductions, tax cuts, regulatory relief and moderation in the growth of the money supply offered a winning formula for a new era of economic prosperity in the 1980s."

The board's support did not extend, however, to the administration's recent proposal to raise additional income through what the White House calls revenue enhancements.

The proposed steps deal with tax accounting rules affecting contracts, energy tax credits, co-insurance, payment schedules for corporate taxes and industrial development bonds.

The board said the tax policies for which it had renewed its support were designed to increase savings and investment but that the new proposals would seriously jeopardize those goals. The directors said in a statement:

"Great uncertainty would be created throughout the business community because any major tax revision proposals would reopen the debate that culminated in the recent enactment of the tax bill and increase economic uncertainty."

In his speech to the board, Bush noted there are already positive economic trends despite critics' assertions that the president's program is failing.

He noted declines in inflation, the prime interest rate and the Federal Reserve discount rate.

"This is at least a start," he said. "If we are fair with each other, it is not a bad start at all."

In a particularly hard-hitting talk to the board members, Watt said many businesses were helping finance organizations attempting to block his efforts to restore market concepts to the energy field and make more effective use of natural resources in general.

He listed specifically the Audubon Society, the National Wildlife Federation, the Sierra Club, Friends of the Earth and the Wilderness Society.

"The battle is not one of environmental rules. The battle is over a philosophy of government," he said. "Are we going to have a centralized, socialized planned economy as we had in the last administration, or are we going to a market-oriented system?"

Weinberger said reductions in military and non-military spending did not have an equal impact on reducing the federal deficit.

Reducing transfer payments, he said, would lower the budget on virtually a dollar-for-dollar basis. But a dollar cut from military spending only reduces the deficit 53 cents, he noted, because of the manner in which military outlays return revenue in the form of worker and corporate taxes.

HOW INTERIOR IS CHANGING, FROM THE INSIDE

(By Mary Thornton)

Last August, the Interior Department tried to reverse more than 10 years of federal policy toward the Pyramid Lake Paiute Indian tribe by recommending that the Justice Department not challenge a court ruling that would have provided less water to the Nevada tribe and more to a federal reclamation project.

Although Justice didn't buy Interior's recommendation, it was an example of a subtle effort by Interior Secretary James G. Watt and his assistants to bring their philosophy to Interior through administrative changes and new interpretations of old laws.

The changes have taken place mainly in Interior's solicitor's office and the Office of Surface Mining, two offices that have been targeted by conservatives as enclaves of environmental activism.

According to interviews with department employes, the changes involve not only heavy pressure to come up with legal opinions favorable to administration positions—whether or not they will hold up in court—but also transfers and personnel changes that have caused many of the lawyers to look for new jobs.

A recent evaluation of Watt's first year at Interior, circulated to the department, said that the solicitor and his top deputies are "important personnel who can advance administration policies," and that, to implement those policies, Carter administration holdovers who do not agree with those policies must be removed.

Lawyers say there have been major changes in the way they are asked to do their work. They say that virtually all legal decisions are being reviewed by political appointees in the solicitor's office to make sure they are in line with Watt's policies. They add that there are major changes in the type of cases that are being pursued.

Douglas Baldwin, an assistant to Watt, acknowledged that there have been changes in management procedure, but he says those are the prerogative of any new secretary.

As one example, Interior has initiated virtually no new cases on behalf of Indian tribes since Watt took over. In addition, the department has also instituted a policy, resisted so far by the Justice Department, of giving state courts jurisdiction in Indian water rights cases. The cases traditionally have been heard in federal court because of the animosity between the tribes and the states.

On natural resources, department lawyers say the emphasis has shifted toward encouraging development. For example, department sources say Interior officials are working on a legal argument that would give the president, rather than Congress, the power to approve development in areas under study as possible wilderness areas.

Department lawyers also say there have been far fewer appeals of cases that Interior loses, even when Interior may have had a good chance of winning on appeal.

"Their attitude seems to be that if industry won in the first place they must have been right," one lawyer said.

Employes in the Office of Surface Mining say there is so much encouragement now to cooperate with the states that one employe put up a sign saying: "State Permits Approved While You Wait!"

"There are two categories of persons in the department: liberals and Americans," said one lawyer who asked not be identified. "I've been told not to bother with any option not in line with what the administration policy is."

A lawyer who recently left the solicitor's office said, "I think what happens essentially is those in the solicitor's office who provide legal arguments that don't go the way they want are simply circumvented. In terms of providing effective legal advice, the solicitor's office has been destroyed."

Employes in both offices say they believe that Watt is also trying to get rid of lawyers he is afraid may stand in his way.

Last March Watt announced the firing of 51 employes in the solicitor's office, including 28 lawyers. He said the office had exceeded its hiring ceiling and that the employes had been hired illegally by the Carter administration.

But less than two months later the department advertised for six new lawyers, some at salary levels at least twice that of most those fired.

Harman Kallman, a spokesman for the agency, said in an interview that the attorneys fired from Interior were not rehired because they did not have "the skills the department needed most. Most were junior people with limited experience and background. Since everyone counts [at a time of reduced budgets], we'll try to get the most skilled and senior people we can."

But Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), chairman of the House Interior Committee's oversight subcommittee, noted at a hearing that one of the new lawyers had experience in personal injury and child custody cases, not natural resources law.

Markey asked Watt last July to provide the subcommittee with extensive information on the new lawyers, but so far most of it has not been provided, his aides said.

Last May Watt also announced a reorganization of the Surface Mining Office, which enforces strip-mining regulations. During the transition period the office was targeted by the Heritage Foundation, a conservative research group, for its "zealotry."

Watt was forced to back off on a major part of the reorganization—transferring OSM's technical services division from Denver to Casper, Wyo.—after congressional hearings indicated that the move would be as hard on industry as on the Interior employees. But by then nearly half the employes in that office had quit.

There also have been widespread resignations among the legal staff in Denver, forcing the department to fly lawyers back and forth from Washington.

The latest personnel change is the transfer of at least 13 lawyers in the solicitor's office. The transfers involve major moves, from coast to coast in some cases, and in many instances will shift lawyers into areas about which they know nothing.

Harold Baer, for example, has worked in the Denver office as a trial attorney in the area of minerals, oil and gas. He is being transferred here, where his field will be wilderness, grazing and right-of-way law.

"They told me they needed my expertise," he said. But, he said, he is unfamiliar with his new area.

Baldwin said the transfers were "deemed to be necessary for the placing of staff resources where the work is. . . . There's always a certain amount of distress when people have to be transferred . . . but they all work for the government for the benefit of the taxpayer."

He insists that the moves are not a way of getting rid of unwanted lawyers.

Others disagree. "I believe they're going to have a wholesale housecleaning in this place," one lawyer said. "But none of us are political, none of us are policy makers. I think it's more a sickness that anyone who was there when they came in cannot be trusted. We're all a little at a loss as to why this is happening, but I think there are more to come, many more to come."

I. The Unamericans: Liberals and Environmentalists

"They (National Audubon) don't want a government that believes in people. They want a government that believes in centralized, socialist planning."—Watt speaking at Colorado Resource Consortium luncheon. Quoted in "Watt Delivers GOP Pitch to Mining Industry." The Colorado Sun, Sept. 30, 1981.

"I don't use the words 'Democrats' and 'Republicans' . . . It's liberals and Americans."—Watt speaking to farmers in Los Banos, CA. Quoted in "The Park Service Feels an Early Winter Chill from Watt's Interior," L.A. Times, Nov. 8, 1981.

"But I underline to you folks and friends that we are in a battle for individual liberty . . . not for farming . . . not for minerals . . . not for oil and gas . . . but to our very form of government. It goes back to what makes a nation great, and it is how it manages its human resources and its natural resources. The battleground is not what our critics would like you to believe it is . . . protecting the environment. We are all for that. It is for our form of government, which leads to our liberty."—Watt quoted in Editorial. World of Agricultural Aviation, November 1981.

"What is the real motive of the extreme environmentalists, who appear to be determined to accomplish their objectives at whatever cost to society? Is it to simply protect the environment? Is it to delay and deny energy development? Is it to weaken America?"—"Scenario for Ravaging the West," by James Watt, Denver Post, 1978.

"We mean business, and when you read the press you're going to find that I can be cold and calculating and indeed I am . . . Washington, D.C., March 9, 1981.

"I continue to be a sagebrush rebel. . . . We are rebelling against the liberal Democrats who would snuff out America."—Watt speaking to the Republican Western States Conference. Quoted in "Sagebrush Rebellion a success, Watt says." Tri-City Herald (Pasco, WA), Oct. 19, 1981.

"Environmentalists. . . . That's a facade for liberal democrats."—Watt quoted in Pete Hamill's column. Rocky Mountain News, Oct. 18, 1981.

"I feel truly sorry for those individuals who signed the petition sincerely, only to find out that they were misled by uninformed and uncarrying environmental extremists."—Watt quoted in Editorial. El Dorado Times (Kansas), Nov. 3, 1981.

"And those very few people in Washington who lost their privileged position to the accesses of power don't like the fact that they got kicked out and we let Americans come in, sportsmen and hunters and miners and timbermen. And we opened up the government to the people."—Watt speaking at Republican fundraiser in Wyoming, September 1981, as televised in "60 Minutes" report January 10, 1982.

"I fear that our states may be ravaged as a result of the actions of the environmentalists—the greatest threat to the ecology of the west."—"Scenario for Ravaging the West," by James Watt. Denver Post, 1978.

II. Elitists vs. the People

"The President was brought to power by a restlessness of the people because they needed change and he represents change and those old time liberals that don't want change are gonna frustrate we conservatives who want change every chance they can and we've gotta change 40-50 years of bad government. To accomplish that, we fired every person in the Department of Interior that was a presidential appointee. I mean we've cleaned every one of them out and then we started appointing good people."—Watt speaking to the Conference of National Park Concessioners Washington, D.C. March 9, 1981.

"'We feel that the NRA is representative of the real conservation movement in this country,' Watt says in the January issue of 'The American Hunter.'

Watt also reassured hunters concerned that his pro-development policies might wreck their sport. 'When I was growing up in Wyoming,' he said, 'it was often the timber roads and the mine roads that allowed us to get at the good hunting and fishing areas.'"—Watt quoted in "Executive Notes." Washington Post, January 21, 1982.

"In a conflict between preservationists and sportsmen, we're going to the sportsmen. We've sent the signals, so if there's to be a wedge driven between the conservation community we'll help drive the wedge."—Interview with Watt. Field and Stream, December 1981.

"Watt later told reporters that environmental 'special interest' groups promoting 'frivolous uses' of public land are the ones outside most people's thinking on environmental issues."—St. Louis, UPI, May 11, 1981.

"There was a tendency in the latter part of the 1970s to turn the administration of conservation and environmental laws over to the single purpose groups—to those who saw preservation as their only goal, to those who refused to consider the economic needs of our society, to those who viewed people as an intrusion on nature. . . . It was during this time that the attempt was made to turn Alaska into one huge museum of Natural History."—Watt speaking to the Anchorage Chamber of Commerce. Anchorage, AK. Aug. 10, 1981.

"Wyoming, as well as other states, had just been locked up to economic development and set aside for a few backpackers rather than the rest of us who might want to use a four-wheeler or go horseback riding or develop some energy. . . . America's resources were put here for the enjoyment and use of people, now and in the future, and should not be denied to the people by elitist groups."—Interview with Watt. Nation's Business, September 1981.

"What we seek is to move the pendulum from the far extreme of preservationism to the center where we can protect the environment, build our economy and strengthen our national security."—Watt speaking to the National Recreation and Park Association, Minneapolis, MN. Oct. 27, 1981.

"With this Administration came a dedication to a new beginning in stewardship of natural resources—a new beginning which recognizes that stewardship is more than blind commitment to preservation—a new beginning which seeks a common sense balance between development of resources and preservation of resources—a new beginning which encourages rather than hinders the private enterprise system."—Watt speaking to The National Association of Realtors. Miami Beach, FL. Nov. 16, 1981.

III. THE WEST VS. THE EAST OR WATT'S CIVIL WAR

"My thesis is that because of the actions being taken by extremists to delay or stop the orderly development of energy resources, the nation is likely to suffer energy shortages and thus severe economic hardship.

Hundreds of thousands of jobs, if not millions, will be in jeopardy. When this happens, the politicians in Washington will seize on the crisis and take whatever action is needed to extract energy from the Western states, in order to light and heat the East and to maintain jobs in the Midwest and on the East Coast. . . .

I fear for our ecology in the West and for our lifestyle. When the economic pressures start strangling the Eastern states due to short supplies of energy, their political leadership will come after our resources."—"Scenario for Ravaging the West," by James Watt. Denver Post, 1978.

"They'll nationalize the lands to deliver to their Eastern constituents. If the lands are developed by the federal government rather than by the private sector, that will destroy our way of life in the West."—Watt quoted in Pete Hamill's column. Rocky Mountain News, Oct. 18, 1981.

"I fear that the Eastern states, the industrial states, will turn on our West to get the energy. I already see it coming in the disguise of the severance tax. You watch that fight grow, and when the Eastern states and the industrial Midwest realize they are losing their economic base and political clout to the Sun Belt and to the West because energy costs there are not rising as fast as in New England and the Midwestern states, they will turn on our Western states and come in on a crash program to develop the coal and other resources. And when they do, the Federal government will come in with a crash program and destroy our ecology."—Interview with Watt. Field and Stream, December 1981.●

AN UNNEEDED HORROR

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I recently wrote President Reagan asking that he not certify the production of binary nerve gas as essential to the Nation's national defense. I cited a number of specific reasons for my opposition to reentering the chemical warfare race and I hope that the Congress will have an opportunity to thoroughly review the issue before any decision is made leading to nerve gas production.

For the purpose of informing my colleagues, I would ask that the January 29, 1982 New York Times article "An Unneeded Horror" by Tom Wicker be printed in the RECORD. It carefully examines the implications of a nerve gas production decision and provides a discussion of the issues that will be useful to every Senator.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 29, 1982]

AN UNNEEDED HORROR

(By Tom Wicker)

President Reagan apparently is ready to notify Congress that he has ordered a multibillion dollar program to produce binary nerve gas for chemical warfare—the worst possible answer to the Soviet Union's unconscionable "yellow rain."

Ours, after all, is an open society and the Soviet Union's is not. So we will openly proclaim—in the budget and elsewhere—that we are rebuilding a chemical warfare capacity that we will use if necessary. But the Russians, despite solid evidence that they have developed and used toxic substances for lethal purposes ("yellow rain") in Asia, do not and probably never will admit having done so.

Many will believe them, out of hope and naiveté, and the propaganda advantage will be with the Russians from the beginning. In this case, that's no small matter. Binary nerve gas, like yellow rain, is a horror weapon, effective primarily against civilians. It's lethal within minutes to anyone who breathes it, and capable of poisoning the atmosphere of huge areas for days at a time.

Americans, in fact, will be double propaganda losers in that we will have forfeited the advantage we now should have in the evidence that the Russians are using yellow rain. That evidence should be emphasized by the United States in every way and in every forum possible; so should Moscow's willingness to violate the 1925 Geneva Protocol by which it renounced the use of chemical weapons. Instead, if it develops binary nerve gas itself, the United States will dissipate a sound moral and political position.

In 1969, President Nixon renounced first use of chemical agents and ordered an end to their production. President Ford formally signed the Geneva Protocol—prohibiting use but not possession of chemical weapons—and proposed a world treaty to outlaw chemical warfare.

If Mr. Nixon's order is now reversed, the United States will not literally have violated either the Protocol or his pledge against first use. But with Moscow steadfastly denying any involvement in chemical warfare, many will be only too eager to ask why a nation that dropped the first atomic bomb and spread lethal herbicides in Vietnam and Laos is developing binary nerve gas if it doesn't intend to use it.

The answer, Pentagon officials say, is that if the Russians have chemical weapons we must have them, too, to deter them from their use. But the United States already has ample stocks of older chemical weapons; and this answer raises the military questions whether effective deterrence requires that we match the Russians weapon-for-weapon in every category, or whether the overall deterrent effect of all our military forces is sufficient.

Put it another way: can the Russians' use of chemical warfare be deterred only by the threat of chemical warfare turned back against them? Need we sacrifice moral and propaganda advantage, add a new dimension to the superpower arms race and expand the world's inventory of genocidal weapons, all in order to deter the use of yellow rain? Particularly when we already have stockpiles of gas artillery shells?

Richard Halloran of The New York Times reports that the Pentagon regards Europe as the likeliest chemical war battlefield, and plans to stockpile its new gas shells there, perhaps in Britain. But shouldn't we have learned something from the anti-nuclear demonstrations in European cities and from the anti-nuclear attitudes of Governments like those of Belgium and Holland, and of the British Labor Party?

At the root of this rising tide of opinion is the fear—however ill founded—that Europe will be devastated in a superpower nuclear war that would leave the United States and the Soviet Union untouched. Are we now to add to this nightmare the idea that a superpower chemical war might also be fought in Europe?

If so, European paranoia about American as well as Soviet intentions will be surely heightened, and the stresses that are already wracking the NATO alliance will be increased—also in the name of deterrence.

More than $2 billion is being projected for producing binary nerve gas in 1983 and 1984, and more will be required later. That money would be far better spent, and achieve more real Western security, if it were devoted instead to research and development of defensive equipment and techniques against yellow rain and other chemical weapons, and if the fruits of that effort were made available to any and all nations feeling themselves threatened by chemical warfare.

That would make it clear who really poses the threat, and who wants to help the world avoid it. So would a determined attempt to negotiate with the Russians and all nations a total renunciation of the use or possession of chemical weapons. But producing those weapons ourselves will divert the world's opprobrium from its proper target in Moscow, while adding one more horror to those that already haunt the future.●

CRIME AND (NON)PUNISHMENT

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, for years one of the most unprosecuted crimes in our society has been drunken driving. We have viewed the problem with tolerant indifference, notwithstanding the 25,000 deaths we continue to sustain, year after year, on our Nation's highways. With as many as 6 out of every 10 drivers on Friday and Saturday nights legally intoxicated, it is easy to understand why the number of drunk drivers who ever see the inside of a courtroom is statistically insignificant. And, of those who are arrested, 80 percent or more will receive probation or suspended or deferred sentences.

I have introduced legislation, S. 671, to establish a national "alcohol traffic safety standard." My bill would encourage each State to provide uniform, mandatory penalties for convicted drunken drivers, in addition to emphasizing the need for rehabilitation and treatment for alcoholics and chronic offenders. Recognizing that drunk driving is the major safety problem on our highways, and treating it as a problem that is truly national in scope, is the first step in ending the tolerant indifference that has allowed this carnage to continue for so long. I am pleased that just this week, Senators BAUCUS and HATFIELD have joined in cosponsoring S. 671. Identical legislation is pending in the House, which has the cosponsorship of 110 Members.

The greatest incentive for the Congress to act against drunken driving is the continuing toll this tragedy is extracting from the country's future: Our youth. Although drivers between the ages of 16 and 24 comprise only about 20 percent of all licensed drivers, they account for nearly half of all alcohol related fatalities on the highways. The February issue of Reader's Digest contains a moving article on the impact of drunk driving on our Nation's young people, and I would like to share this very disturbing account with my colleagues.

Mr. President, I ask that the February 1982 article from Reader's Digest, entitled "Crime and (Non)Punishment, U.S.A.—Drunk Driving: A License To Kill," be reprinted in full in the RECORD at this point:

The article follows:

[From the Reader's Digest, February 1982]

CRIME AND (NON)PUNISHMENT, U.S.A.—DRUNK DRIVING: A LICENSE TO KILL

GAITHERSBURG, MD.—Peter Weiger was a popular highschool sophomore. He was a 4-H Club member and a Boy Scout. He enjoyed parties and girls.

Then one night his parents received the visit that haunts them to this day. Your son, the police officer said, has been hit by a car. A half-hour later he was pronounced dead—the victim of an alcohol-related accident.

The Weigers are angry that what happened to their 16-year-old son has happened to so many thousands of America's sons and daughters. Drunk-driving crashes represent the nation's single greatest killer of people between 16 and 24, and cause nearly half of the nation's highway deaths, according to federal highway-safety authorities.

Over the last decade, more than 250,000 Americans have died because of drunk drivers—more than four times the number of Americans killed during ten years of fighting in the Vietnam war. One of every two Americans will be involved in an alcohol-related auto crash in his or her lifetime.

"The drunk-driving problem in this country has reached epidemic proportions," says John Moulden, a research psychologist with the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration. "It's a national outrage that even when thousands of people are being killed each year by drunk drivers, our society continues to accept drinking and driving as a normal part of daily life."

Peter Weiger was walking down a country road that rainy night when a neighbor in a pickup truck ran over him and kept going. The driver of another car copied the tag number, and the truck's driver was promptly arrested.

According to court records, Edgar Garfield Rogers was allowed to plead guilty to hit-and-run and driving while impaired by alcohol. He was fined $610.

DRUNK DRIVING

SAN DIEGO—It was midnight back in Connecticut, but Walter Fitzpatrick couldn't sleep. The person convicted of killing his 19-year-old son and another student at the University of San Diego had been sentenced that day. Before he went to bed, the father wanted to know what that sentence had been.

Told the sentence, Fitzpatrick was silent for a moment. Then he said, "That hurts more than I thought it would."

Jaun Ramirez Acosta, 20, who pleaded no contest to a charge of vehicular manslaughter, received one year in a minimum-security honor camp, a barracks-type facility where there are no armed guards. He would serve only eight months.

Paul Fitzpatrick and Matt Boyd had gone to the university gym to shoot some baskets that Saturday afternoon. The gym was in use, so they left for another facility several blocks away.

Driving a friend's car, Ramirez was racing up the San Diego street at a speed of more than 80 miles per hour. The car struck the youths from behind. Fitzpatrick and Boyd were killed instantly.

Ramirez and three passengers fled the scene. Three and a half hours later, after he was apprehended, a blood test showed him to be legally intoxicated.

Ramirez also had no driver's license—with reason: he was on probation for vehicular hit-and-run driving in an alcohol-related wreck less than two years before. Court records showed his performance while on probation was unsatisfactory. Twice he had been arrested for alcohol-related offenses.

The district attorney's office was unaware of Ramirez's driving record when it entered into a plea-bargain arrangement that resulted in his sentence to the honor camp. His defense attorney said it would not have made any difference. "I've seen a lot of this type of case," he said. "This is a normal result—occasionally one will go to prison, but not often."

DRUNK DRIVING

TRACY, CALIF.—The auto veered off the road, striking bicyclist LeMoin Stille from behind. The victim, a mathematics teacher at Clover Middle School, was thrown 100 feet to the road's gravel shoulder. He died of massive head injuries. The auto's driver did not stop.

When Richard Cagle arrived home, police reports say he was confronted by his wife, who saw the damage to the car. She drove him back to the accident scene. There they were questioned by police.

According to the California Highway Patrol (CHP), Cagle conceded he had been the driver of the car involved in the accident. Tests showed Cagle's blood-alcohol level to be nearly 2½ times the point of legal intoxication. He faced a preliminary hearing in Tracy Municipal Court on charges of felony vehicular manslaughter, felony hit-and-run and felony drunk driving. It wasn't the first time he had been in the Tracy court.

Only two weeks before, he had been convicted of hit-and-run and drunk driving—his fifth drunk-driving conviction in the last seven years—and sentenced to 180 days in jail. The sentence, however, was stayed so that Cagle could attend to some personal matters. Without that postponement he would have gone to jail three days before the fatal crash.

When charges relating to the death of Stille were brought before a Superior Court judge in Stockton, the defendant's lawyer argued that his client's confession occurred before police read him his Miranda right to remain silent. The judge agreed. Evidence provided at the accident scene by the defendant's wife also was disallowed.

There was no witness who could identify Cagle as the driver of the auto that killed Stille. The judge dismissed all charges against him.

"It's one of the frustrating things that happen," CHP Lt. Orval Ellis later would say. "Not many worry about the rights of the victims—just the accused."

A tribute to Stille, who had taken money from his teacher's salary to purchase weight-lifting equipment for the school, was placed in the Clover yearbook, "There are some people whose absence diminishes all of us permanently; because they are unique they will not come our way again," the tribute reads. "LeMoin Stille was such a person."

DRUNK DRIVING

Wilmington, Mass.—The 17-year-old driver of an automobile in which four teenage girls were killed in a late-night head-on collision had been convicted of drunk driving less than three months before.

Lissa Sweetland, one of the victims of the fatal crash, had been fined $93.75 and faced revocation of her license after she drove a car into a stone wall in the previous late-night crash. She appealed the drunk-driving conviction, however, and the judge who heard the appeal continued her case without a finding.

The teen-agers were killed when their auto veered into the path of an oncoming station wagon. The station wagon's driver was seriously injured.

Analysis of blood samples of the four girls showed them all to be legally intoxicated, according to a state motor-vehicle official. (The level of alcohol in Lissa Sweetland was placed at .47—nearly five times the point of legal intoxication.)

The medical examiner said that .45 is considered the level at which surgery can be performed without anesthesia.

DRUNK DRIVING

ST. LOUIS.—Lonnie Colyer, as one police officer would say, was a loaded gun the night that he left the suburban tavern to drive to his home. Moments later, his pickup truck veered into an oncoming lane, smashing into a motorcycle. Two teen-agers riding on the cycle were killed.

Colyer was a chronic traffic offender who for many years had slipped through the criminal-justice system. The fatal crash turned out to be his fourth drunk-driving charge in the past year alone. In light of his history, such an accident may have been inevitable.

When the fatal accident occurred, Colyer was awaiting sentencing on one of these drunk-driving charges. His sentencing had been postponed twice while his well-known and high-priced attorney sought to obtain a suspended imposition of sentence. That was a favorite tactic of lawyers representing clients charged with drunk-driving. And they usually succeeded. A Post-Dispatch study of St. Louis County courts showed that in 1979 eight of ten drunk-driving defendants received a suspended imposition of sentence—and walked away with nothing on their driving records to indicate an alcohol-related arrest.

DRUNK DRIVING

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Laura Lamb's expressive blue eyes scanned the cameras and crowd surrounding her. The 16-month-old child will never be able to use her hands or legs. Laura is a quadriplegic for life.

The child was brought to a Capitol Hill hearing room as a symbol of the human suffering caused by repeat-offender drunk drivers—the target of a fledgling national campaign being waged by a Fair Oaks, Calif.-based organization known as Mothers Against Drunk Drivers (MADD.) Laura's mother, Cindi Lamb of Baltimore, Md., and Candy Lightner of Fair Oaks announced that MADD was sponsoring a petition campaign calling for a Presidential commission and federal legislation to effectively reform drunk-driving laws.

Mrs. Lamb recalled the afternoon when she and Laura were driving to the grocery. Their vehicle was struck head-on by a car driven by a man whose traffic record had 25 separate entries, including three arrests for driving while intoxicated.

Mrs. Lightner told how her 13-year-old daughter was struck from behind by a car driven by a man who fled the accident scene—a man who had been released on bail from another hit-and-run drunk-driving accident just two days earlier; a man who still had a valid California driver's license although he had had three drunk-driving arrests in the last four years.

Cari Lightner was walking to a school only a few blocks from her home when she was killed.

Russell J. Newcomer, Jr., on probation for armed robbery at the time of the Lamb accident, pleaded guilty to drunk driving. He was sent to prison for violating probation. A judge added two years for the crash that crippled Laura Lamb.

Clarence William Busch pleaded no contest to felony vehicular manslaughter in the death of Cari Lightner. He was sentenced to two years in prison, though most of his sentence was spent in a community correctional center. The drunk-driving charge pending against Busch when Cari was killed was dismissed as part of a plea-bargain agreement.

While still in custody, Busch was notified by the California Department of Motor Vehicles that he would be eligible for reinstatement of his license once he could show proof of financial responsibility.

STANDING UP FOR FREEDOM

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, this country's history is filled with stories of gumption and inventiveness in the face of adversity. Last week we commemorated the 100th anniversary of the birth of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and no one exemplified those qualities more than he did when he was crippled by polio.

I am proud to report, though, that the mold was not broken with F. D. R. Seven years ago, Donald L. Ausmus of Independence, Mo., was similarly struck down. Involved in a motorcycle accident, he was paralyzed from the waist down. But he responded to this tragic blow with courage and creativity. Working in his basement, he invented a device that allowed paraplegics like himself to stand and move about. As a result, he will be honored this weekend by Intellectual Property Owners, Inc., as their Inventor of the Year for 1981.

American ingenuity has been the mainstay of this Nation since the days of Benjamin Franklin. I am delighted to be a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 140, designating February 11, 1982, as "National Inventors' Day," and I am proud to claim Donald Ausmus as one of my constituents.

I ask that an article about Mr. Ausmus that appeared in yesterday's Kansas City Times, entitled "Standing up for Freedom," be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

STANDING UP FOR FREEDOM

(By Mack Alexander)

Three years ago Hilda Stokes stood up for the first time in eight years to cook. Mike Evans, paralyzed from the waist down, remodeled his kitchen.

Both victims of auto accidents, they had given up all hope of ever again hanging up their own clothing, straightening a picture on the wall or picking up something from the floor.

But a device invented by an Independence man, paralyzed from the waist down for seven years, freed the two paraplegics from their wheelchairs.

The inventor, Donald L. Ausmus, has been named Inventor of the Year for 1981. He will be honored this weekend in Washington in conjunction with National Inventor's Day on Sunday at the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office.

Mr. Ausmus will be the 10th recipient of the award given by Intellectual Property Owners Inc., a 10-year-old non-profit trade association representing people and corporations holding patents. The trade association will introduce the La Plata, Mo., native and his invention to the press Friday in Washington.

Mr. Ausmus said the device, dubbed the Moto-Stand because it allows paralyzed people to stand and move about, is his legs on wheels, something the former mechanic has needed since May 4, 1975, when his motorcycle crashed in a dirt-bike race.

Mr. Ausmus' motorcycle injured his spinal cord, ending his hobby of racing cars, boats and motorcycles. Mr. Ausmus, the father of two teen-age daughters, was paralyzed from the chest down. Although he knew he would not walk again, he did not want to spend his life in a wheelchair.

"I had been a mechanic since I was 10 years old," he said. "I had a shop in my basement. I wanted to do the things I had been able to do. I wanted to stand up again."

Mr. Ausmus, a high school graduate, came to Independence in 1963 and took a job at a trucking firm. During work breaks, he said, he and his buddies would race in two-wheel, upright dollies used for carting heavy boxes. The races gave him the idea of putting a motor on a dolly and strapping himself standing up in it.

Three months later he had built a prototype, and he took it to the Rehabilitation Institute of Kansas City to demonstrate it. A 20-year-old paraplegic asked to try it, Mr. Ausmus said.

"I did it really because I wanted to get to stand on my feet again," he said. "But when this boy stood up on it, he started to cry. I saw this boy cry. It made me feel great. I knew how he felt. I knew how happy he was."

"That's when I realized that I could be able to help other people by making this thing better."

The device proved very popular. People began asking him to build one for them, Mr. Ausmus said. He built five in his basement, making improvements with each. But they became more expensive, he said. The first one cost about $850 and the fifth cost about $1,300.

Because he was losing money, Mr. Ausmus said, he looked for a manufacturer. Several national firms expressed interest, he said, but none decided to manufacture it.

Last year he was contacted by Larry Lynch, marketing representative for The Advanced Technology Corp., a Kansas City firm started last year to manufacture Moto-Stand, he said. The firm has dealers in 15 states and can manufacture 30 stands a month, Mr. Lynch said. He put the retail cost at about $3,100.

Mr. Ausmus' device is 44 inches tall, weighs 130 pounds, stands on three wheels and comes equipped with two forward speeds and reverse. It's battery powered and turns in a circle. Its 36-inch turning radius allows it to be maneuvered around tight corners. Of slim design, it scoots easily through doors. Some models lean forward.

"I can wash dishes, do all kinds of domestic chores," Mr. Evans, 33, said. "It's a good invention for people who want to be able to do things they used to do. I plan to put in all new waterlines this spring."

"It's terrific to be able to stand up," Mrs. Stokes, 69, said. "I can fool around in my apartment. I can reach things I can't reach from my wheelchair. It's really a godsend."

Sandy Martin, director of physical therapy at the Rehabilitation Institute, said, Mr. Ausmus' device is unique in the freedom it gives to severely disabled people. It provides an emotional and psychological lift to the handicapped and improves their chances for employment, she said.

"Emotionally, it helps a great deal," Mrs. Stokes said. "It gives you a feeling of independence when you can move around and do things for yourself. It's hard trying to prepare a meal from a wheelchair. I burned myself twice trying to do it."

Ms. Martin said the device requires far less exertion than heavy leg braces and crutches.

"If I had to do without it now," Mr. Ausmus said, "it would be like taking away my legs again."●

THE TRAGIC SITUATION IN EL SALVADOR

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, almost every day there are press reports of murders and other atrocities being committed against civilians in El Salvador. It is particularly distressing that so many of these reports involve accounts of violent acts being perpetrated by Salvadoran security forces against their own civilian population.

El Salvador is experiencing a bloody civil war that could eventually lead to a Communist takeover. If that happens, it is likely that basic human rights will be brutally repressed, and El Salvador could serve as the base for a poisonous infection spreading throughout Central America. Ironically, continued acts of violence by Salvadoran security forces could contribute to the very result that none of the non-Communist elements in El Salvador want. If the people of El Salvador conclude that their principal oppressor is the current military-dominated junta, they may throw caution to the wind and cast their lot with the guerrilla forces.

That is why I recently joined in sponsoring an amendment to the foreign assistance authorization act prohibiting further military assistance to the Government of El Salvador unless the President certifies that the Government of El Salvador is undertaking various reforms including "achieving substantial control over all elements of its own armed forces, so as to bring to an end the indiscriminate torture and murder of Salvadoran citizens." The purpose of this certification was twofold: First, it was intended to help President Duarte accomplish the reforms to which he has stated he is committed; and second, it was intended to strengthen President Reagan's hand in influencing events in El Salvador.

On January 29, President Reagan certified that the Government of El Salvador was taking the steps stipulated in the Foreign Assistance Act. On February 1, during a Foreign Relations Committee hearing on elections in Central America, Assistant Secretary of State Thomas Enders commented on the President's certification and reported that the administration intends to increase the level of military assistance to El Salvador. The committee, on February 8, will hold a hearing devoted solely to examining the President's certification.

That hearing will provide an opportunity for the committee to look carefully at the administration's justification for continuing a military assistance relationship with El Salvador and for increasing the current level of arms being sent to that country. That justification will have to be studied carefully in light of recent press reports on atrocities committed by Salvadoran security forces and in light of assertions by the American Civil Liberties Union and the American Watch Committee that there is a pattern of "systematic murder, torture, and arbitrary arrests" by government security forces.

Any major foreign policy initiative in order to be successful must have the confidence and support of the American people. The administration proposes to increase our involvement in support of the Salvadoran military junta, and it is therefore important to get at the truth as to just what kind of government the junta is and whether it has any significant support among the Salvadoran people. If we do not get good answers to those questions, I doubt that the American people will support closer military ties to the Salvadoran junta.

I have always been troubled by the administration's emphasis on throwing weapons at what are basically political, economic, and social problems in El Salvador. Moreover, I fear that by increasing the level of military assistance to El Salvador we are running the risk of causing the military officers who dominate the governing junta to conclude that they do not have to do anything further to stop the violence against their own people.

America has a role to play in bringing peace and needed reforms to El Salvador, but we must be certain that by stepping up military aid we are really contributing to the achievement of those objectives. We do not want a Communist takeover; but we also do not, I hope, wish to be the arsenal of right-wing oppression.●

BATH IRON WORKS

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, although the description "Bath-built" has long been equated with excellence and dependability in the shipbuilding industry, the Bath Iron Works has followed a rather stormy course on its way to making Maine the shipbuilding capital of the world.

I have seen no better account of BIW's century-long, "see-saw" history, than the following article in Down East Magazine, written by well-known Maine author and columnist John N. Cole. I submit to my colleagues and for the RECORD this story of how BIW overcame the handicaps of location, size, and a "roller-coaster" financial history to become an invaluable asset to Maine and the country.

TOUR DE FORCE ON THE KENNEBEC

(By John N. Cole)

It was impossible to see the black waves rising against the black sky of a stormy night in late November, but on the bridge of the trawler 400 miles at sea the first mate at the helm and a passenger beside him knew the North Atlantic was in turmoil.

One minute they braced to maintain their balance as the ship reared on the foamy shoulders of an oceanic swell, then shuddered at the peak of the twenty-foot sea, weightless for the instant before she pivoted into the waiting trough. In their guts, the two men could feel the split second when gravity gave way, and they hung on, knowing what came next.

As the ship careened into the trough and met the sea head on, her bow plates boomed like a steel drum, the sound resounding through the vessel. The ship's riveted skin buckled ever so slightly, the stress could be felt the length of her keel as if a giant sledge had struck deep belowdecks.

Then came the pause, the wait for the ship to reassert herself, to regain control, to push herself from the valley, to climb the next sea.

That was the longest moment—when anxiety flashed its signals of momentary alarm and the passenger supposed the ship could crack like a walnut shell against the chill Atlantic.

Sensing the tension, the mate tapped a brass plate on the binnacle. "Don't worry," he said, "she's Bath built. She won't have any trouble with this blow, even if she is a bit past her prime."

Bending to scrutinize the plate in the dim light of the pilothouse, the passenger could read: "MV Delaware—Bath Iron Works—1937." More than a quarter-century had passed since the Delaware went down the way and into the Kennebec River. Since then, she had done her work as a trawler for her first owners, Boston's Booth fisheries, and ten years later had been transferred to the U.S. Fisheries and Wildlife Service as a gear research vessel operating out of Gloucester, Massachusetts. It was from that doughty New England port that she had sailed on this November mission off Newfoundland to search for swordfish along the Gulf Stream's thermocline. And it was from that stormy location that the 146-footer would return without incident and as usual to her homeport in time for Thanksgiving.

That dark night in the Delaware's pilothouse was the passenger's introduction to the confidence inspired by the Bath Iron Works nameplate on a vessel, and he was surprised by the genuine reassurance the bit of brass provided. The mate sounded absolutely convinced that no trouble could come to a Bath-built ship, and his confidence was pervasive. The rest of the long night was less awesome, and when dawn broke and the wind eased off, the ship seemed so solid and seaworthy that the passenger wondered how he could have let the doubts of darkness get their grip.

During the past ninety years more than 350 vessels have worn the Bath Iron Works insignia, and, as the decades rolled by, the legend of quality, of invincibility, continued to thrive. Through two world wars, Korea, and Vietnam, and through nearly a century of growth for the nation's commercial fishing and transport fleet, the name of the small Maine town on the Kennebec became a maritime marque as trusted by mariners as any that has ever put to sea.

This, when the history of the shipyard is reviewed, is nothing less than a miracle. For just as the Delaware on the dark night in the North Atlantic appeared to be trapped beyond recovery in the trough of those cold November seas, so, too, has the Bath Iron Works often appeared so awash in oceans of red ink, red tape, and bad debts that nothing but a miracle could save it from sinking.

Yet today, almost a century after BIW Hull Number One went down the ways, yet another dawn has broken for Maine's premier industry, and those who were so anxious about the yard's future just a few years ago now wonder how they could have doubted its ability to recover.

It's been that way since the yard's improbable beginnings. Not that shipbuilding hasn't been a way of life along the Kennebec for more than three centuries—ever since America's first ship was built at Popham in 1607. But that was a wooden ship, and so was every other one of the thousands of vessels built by Maine men and sailed by Maine skippers from every harbor from Kittery to Machias until the end of the nineteenth century and the last of the clipper ships and coasting schooners.

There were formidable reasons for the state's shipbuilding supremacy. They grew on every slope that rolled inland from the surging sea: tall pine, mighty spruce, sinewed oak—the raw materials from which every great ship was once made. Maine's granite shoulders wore capes of the tallest trees, and when they fell, they could be rolled to hundreds of sheltered, deepwater harbors along the convoluted, 3,500-mile coast. No other state in this booming nation could boast of the combined resources that made Maine the shipbuilding capital of the world.

Until steel. Even though some shipyards persisted long after the Industrial Revolution had been won in the blast furnaces and coal mines of Pennsylvania, an era had ended. Maine's forests and her harbors were grudgingly converted to pulp production and the lobster fishery. What else could the future hold for a shipbuilding site that suddenly found itself the furthest from its raw materials instead of the closest to them? It would take nothing less than a tour de force to maintain shipbuilding on any industrial scale, and such an effort would require the ultimate in stubborn conviction and good luck. After all, what else could sustain a shipyard in a state that had no real reason but memories to sustain one?

Like the Delaware at the peak of a sea, the first Bath Iron Works, created from the zeal of General Thomas S. Hyde's visions for Bath, was poised on the brink of disaster the moment it was born in 1884 with $100,000 of Hyde's capital. "The enterprise of a small number of men," he had told the people of Bath in 1881, "keeps this city alive." Then he went out and proved that of that small number, he was certainly the most enterprising.

No compilation of facts could keep Hyde from his vision of Bath's successful transition from wooden to steel ships. No contemplation of the difficulties of casting steel plates in Scranton and Dayton for fabrication a thousand miles from the furnaces could turn him from his single-minded pursuit. And neither could the disastrous fire of 1893 which destroyed his Iron Works three years after its first ship had been launched. Even though he was offered more efficient and economical space for rebuilding in New London (1,200 feet of waterfront at a dollar a year), Hyde rebuilt the Bath yard from the ashes and launched the largest, most luxurious yacht of her day, the Eleanor, a year after the fire.

Less than a decade after Hyde had revived a burned-out yard with the breath of his unique enthusiasm, General Hyde's son John, who had taken over after his father had died in 1900, watched the last ship for which the yard had a contract slide down the ways. In a few months, the facilities were sold to a New Yorker, but remained vacant. Two months later, John Hyde bought them back and a month after that had a navy contract for a scout cruiser named the Chester. It was that single ship that sustained the facility long enough to see red ink turn to black, and to keep 600 men employed for three years.

Although the Bath Iron Works was less than thirty years old in 1910, it had been burned down once, closed, bought by an out-of-state entrepreneur, closed, purchased by a Maine man, and reopened.

Like a ship at sea on a stormy night, the yard was on the crest one year, in the deepest trough the next. Yet, somehow, the tour de force was maintained. And more. As the years went by, the Bath-built emblem began to acquire its reputation for quality, endurance, and dependability. In spite of the convoluted troubles of capitalization and navy contracts, the small shipyard in Maine seemed to be able consistently to turn out ships that set the standard. An Iron Works aura began to gleam; an Iron Works mystique acquired its initial tenuous presence.

But at the Iron Works, troubles continued. In 1925, eight years after John Hyde's death and seven years after the armistice that ended World War I and more contracts from the U.S. Navy, the Iron Works went broke, shut it doors, was sold into receivership and was scheduled to become a manufacturing facility for paper pie plates.

But, at the last moment, yet another master of the tour de force came to the rescue, changing the yard's future and Maine's.

He was William Stark Newell, known to everyone in Bath as Pete—a Yankee son of a Yankee father, an MIT graduate, and a man with a particular and positive belief in the future of the Bath Iron Works. In 1927, the year after the ghost of what General Hyde had foreseen had folded and was about to become a pieplate assembly line, Pete Newell, with the help of Walter Wyman, head of Central Maine Power Company, and a few other intrepid investors, bought the Iron Works at auction and began the inch-by-inch process of acquiring new contracts, rebuilding the stripped plant, and reconstituting a skilled labor pool that had been dispersed for several years.

"I well remember," purchasing agent Dayton Hill later told a journalist, "how the first office was set up there in 1927. The secretary had a secondhand typewriter on a homemade table and used a nail keg as her office chair."

Five years later, after a low-ebb in navy contracts aggravated by the arms control clauses of the Geneva Accords, it looked as if that office furniture might reappear. In the 1933 wave of bank closings, the Harriman National Bank folded, taking with it a large chunk of Iron Works stock. As BIW's traditional luck would have it, however, the stock, when it came on the liquidator's block, was purchased by Ross W. Judson, a Detroit auto tycoon who had once purchased an Iron Works yacht. He returned the stock to Pete Newell on the condition that he continue to manage the company in which Judson already held considerable shares. Shortly after, Newell landed contracts for three navy destroyers—the Dewey, Drayton, and Lamson—ships that allowed the yard to begin its long climb from the deepest financial trough it had gotten into since the Chester showed up in the nick of time thirty-two years before.

With those three ships on its ways, the Iron Works held on to build yachts and trawlers (like the Delaware) until the shadows of Nazi Germany and World War II spanned the Atlantic and the navy rushed to make up for what had been its leanest years. During the war that followed, the Iron Works sent an incredible eighty-two destroyers down its ways—nineteen more than were built in the entire Japanese nation during the same four years. Many of those destroyers seemed to lead charmed lives, and those that did suffer punishment came through better than other ships in the navy. Once again, the Bath legend was enhanced; once again, the yard that logic said should never have been built in the first place acquired new luster, even more mystique.

Nevertheless, almost in concert with the rise in its prestige, the Iron Works slid into still another trough. From a high of 12,000 employees at the yard in 1943, the work force plummeted to less than 300 in 1947. The boom-or-bust cycles that had plagued the little-yard-that-could for a half-century seemed determined to continue their relentless stress—a trend maintained in startling counterpoint to the Iron Works' ever ascending reputation for excellence, contract compliance, quality control, and economy. The total contract dollars saved at BIW because ships were delivered early and below cost limits would run into the hundreds of millions, yet the skeleton crews who showed up to work on Major Max Fleischmann's yacht Haida in 1946 wondered what they would do when she was finished. Meanwhile, BIW management went to the bank to negotiate another loan, and to Washington to try for what few navy contracts would be let.

Under the leadership of John R. Newell, Pete's son, the Iron Works persisted, but did not thrive, until 1965 when John Newell retired, James Goodrich was named his successor, and a man named William Kyle put BIW on a list of acquisitions he planned to fold into a conglomerate he was building. Kyle got the stock he wanted, took over the Iron Works in 1967, moved it under the conglomerate umbrella of the Congoleum Corporation (which now has its headquarters in Portsmouth, New Hampshire), kicked Goodrich upstairs, and installed John F. Sullivan as BIW president with instructions that unless the yard stopped losing money, it would be closed.

According to its incredible seesaw history, the Iron Works should have shut down, only to be reopened by yet another knight on a white horse. And that moment came close. In 1974, BIW lost $11 million; by '75 the slide had been stopped and a small profit was recorded. In the year that made the difference, Sullivan had been within a micrometer of ordering the place out of business.

With gathering momentum, a succession of good years that continues to this day were to vindicate his judgement.

The Iron Works launched itself into an era of unprecedented efficiency and prosperity. By 1977, the Iron Works division of Congoleum produced a $10 million profit on $167 million worth of contracts. In 1978, the profit numbers were close to $20 million, and that was the last year they were to become public. The following year, a private investment group, which included several Congoleum principals, bought in the outstanding public shares. Annual reports are no longer published and profit-and-loss statements no longer issued.

There is, however, little doubt that the Iron Works is doing well—better than ever; in fact, better than General Hyde or Pete Newell ever dreamed it would do.

In a talk to the Brunswick Rotary club last March, John Sullivan, now chairman of the board, told area business people that the Iron Works ". . . is on the crest of a $757 million backlog in new construction, with nearly 6,200 Maine men and women on the payroll, and more on the way. Since 1976," he continued, "the Bath Iron Works has been transformed from a sickly shipyard in deep financial trouble to the healthiest in the United States, a yard envied for its performance in delivering quality ships ahead of schedule and below contract costs." By the end of 1981, the new construction backlog had nudged the billion-dollar mark, and the employment roster stood at 6,700.

The Iron Works "on the crest. . . ." That's a familiar image to those who have traced the yard's heaving history. As is the reputation for quality performance that Sullivan highlighted. What he did not underscore is the Iron Works' propensity for maintaining its superb production reputation while its finances surge to the crests and then drop to the troughs with shattering vibrations that shake the foundation of the enterprise.

It is an odd, contrapuntal cycle that has taken the Iron Works through the past eighty-seven years, and, even in the wake of Sullivan's well-founded enthusiasms, anyone familiar with that history might tend to view the yard's future with an eye peeled for the unexpected.

But when, if they do, it will be difficult to deny that an end to the BIW storms seems to be in sight. The current economic health of the state's number-one employer (and at the highest wages) appears by every objective judgment to be the true dawn of a calmer day, not a false one. In the next decade, according to every projection, the stormy financial seas that historically have plunged the Iron Works from the top of a wave of activity to a trough of layoffs and plant closings—and, in some cases, liquidation—seem at last to be at peace. There is a backlog of high-priced work; there is a diversity of projects, from navy guided-missile frigates to ship overhauls and the construction of more commercial ships; there is even a newly expanded industrial-engineering and design-consulting division. And there is the Reagan Administration with its emphasis on the complete moderization of the "new" two-ocean navy. In keeping with that purpose, the Iron Works has contracts for twelve more guided-missile frigates—in addition to the nine it has delivered since turning over the USS Oliver Hazard Perry to the navy in late 1977. There is also a drawerful of contracts to recondition navy ships already wearing the BIW medallion. And as 1981 drew to a close, word from Washington arrived that the Kennebec yard was being considered as a prime contractor for construction of the billion-dollar "Aegis" cruisers, one of the U.S. Navy's most sophisticated new guided-missile and command warships.

There is a vast change in the complexity of the work the Iron Works does today compared to the techniques used in the roller-coaster decades of Hyde and Newell. In one sense, the business of shipbuilding has gotten so complex that any yard which learns to build a contemporary vessel well has an edge on staying in business. There just aren't that many other facilities that can duplicate what they've learned to do at BIW.

Most of the 10 million summer visitors to Maine who cross the Kennebec on the Carleton Bridge turn their heads to gape at the most visible evidence of this new technology. In addition to the gray hulls of sleek missile frigates and destroyers that are docked almost below the bridge just to the south, there is the towering neck of what appears to be a huge white and orange steel dinosaur arching over the vast, blank-walled buildings in the yard.

What those visitors are gaping at is Crane Number 11, the tallest crane in the Western Hemisphere, a $4 million mechanical marvel that reaches almost 400 feet above the yard and glides back and forth on its tracks as easily as a polishing cloth slips across a fine table. Up in his cab, Lloyd Merrill looks down on a miniature scene with tiny workers in tin helmets moving across and along a maze of machinery while hundreds of them cluster around each of the modular units that will be preconstructed and then joined to become a total ship, fitted with most of the internal machinery she will need.

The crane is an integral part of the ship construction systems that are the keystone of the Iron Works' most recent surge to the crest. What goes on below, in the yard, is a sophisticated, computerized version of what used to be done by individual riveters and burners in Pete Newell's day. Now the machines that make the cuts are precise and complex. Electricians work for several months to install the cascade of tiny wires that flows like a waterfall from the computers aboard today's frigates. Piping, ladders, ventilators, power trains, communications systems, and every structural element of every modular unit must fit with absolute precision when it is joined to its predestined mate.

There are sixteen of these modules in the new navy frigates that the Iron Works' crews are currently building. When one of the units, which can weigh as much as 220 tons, is complete, when it's been given its computerized checks for the precision of its dimensions, Lloyd Merrill makes his moves. Listening to the instruction crackling over the radio in the crane's control cab, nudging gently at the array of levers in front of him, he moves his gliding monster to pick up an entire unit—one-sixteenth of one of the U.S. Navy's most complex and sophisticated attack weapons—and lowers it as gently as a thin-shelled egg to its predestined position on the Iron Works' way where it will be joined to its mated module.

For a merchant ship, a large cargo vessel, up to 100 units will have to be lifted. But the process for each is essentially the same; precise, painstaking, and so advanced that there are only a few places in the world capable of the planning, the quality control that assures the Iron Works managers and foremen that each assembled and outfitted unit will align perfectly when it is joined to become a ship—a ship of such complexity that few of the 10 million tourists who turn their heads to look at Number 11 could comprehend even the most fundamental technologies that must be employed in its construction.

Yet, because its survival was at stake, the Iron Works learned and then developed the modular process. It is now equipped and staffed to do the best job of unitized shipbuilding that's being done anywhere in the nation. And this tour de force, this mastery, this unique ability is what gives the yard its reason for being. The skills employed, the crews who do the work, the techniques invented—these are the engines that have powered the yard from the trough and put it on the crest. By its own bootstraps, Bath Iron Works has overcome the handicaps of its remote location, the relative smallness of its ways, and a roller-coaster financial history.

This never could have happened, according to every knowledgeable observer, if it hadn't been for the foundation of skilled Maine workers that has been the sustenance of the yard since General Hyde took Kennebec craftsmen from the wooden ships they fashioned so superbly and taught them how to apply the same concern for quality to ships of steel. Over the years, the riveters, the crane men, the frame benders, the burners, the pipe fitters, the caulkers, the welders, chippers, sandblasters, machinists, and an array of additional shipfitters with scores of various skills have developed a reputation for dependability, for staying on the job, for making the Iron Works their total career.

During the Second World War an Iron Works riveter named Henry J. Dionne captured the world's record for driving three-quarter-inch rivets (3,476 rivets driven in an eight-hour day). It was that sort of spirit that inspired the Maine women who flocked to the yard in those days to become riveters and welders and set the standards for the yard's policy of equal pay for equal work that applies to the women who work there today, welding and riveting and pipe fitting alongside the men.

It was during those war years that Arthur Hummer of Brunswick went to work as a burner, cutting steel plates with a torch. Twenty-five years later, he retired to the tidy clapboard house in the pines near Middle Bay—a house that sails in a sea of flower and vegetable gardens that Arthur tends every day with hands gnarled and scarred by a quarter-century of handling hot steel. He is a gentle person, not the stereotypical hard hat, a man whose voice must be listened for and whose shyness is always a presence.

"A shipyard is a hard place to work," he says, leaning to trim one of the hundreds of gladiola that march in colorful rows along one of his gardens. "It gets awful hot inside those steel ships in the summer. You can't touch the plates with your hands, and they'll stay that hot for days. Rain is the only thing that'll cool them off.

"Still, the Iron Works pays the best wages, always has. That's why so many Maine people stick with it. They know there's no better jobs close by. They'd have to leave the state to find a better one, and most Maine people don't want to have to do that.

"That's why the work crew at the Iron Works is a good one. It's the men, you know, that make the place what it is. Some of those fellows have been there all their working lives. You know Foster King, over on the Old Bath Road? He started there when he was eighteen, worked until he was sixty-five. I'll bet that when he left he could have taken a couple of other men and built a whole destroyer by himself.

"It's that kind of thing that has the yard turning out ships on time, below cost. There's such a low turnover. Now you know the longer a fellow stays on the job, the faster he's going to figure out how to save time doing what he's doing. You get a bunch of men learning how to do their jobs better and faster and it makes a difference, I'll tell you."

What Arthur Hummer learned on the job, others have seen from other perspectives, yet produced the same conclusions. At Litton Industries shipyard in Mississippi, for example, work-force turnover averages 30 percent; at BIW in 1977, it was 1.1 percent.

Speaking at the August, 1980, launching of the frigate Jack Williams, Navy Rear Admiral Edward J. Otth took note of the workers who had built the ship, and delivered two more like her ahead of time and $22 million under cost.

"It is fitting," the admiral said, "to give special mention to the workers of Bath Iron Works. Without your skill, devotion to excellence, and productivity, the navy would be hard pressed.

"We salute you for all you've accomplished here, but especially for the care with which you build and repair our ships. Those who fear for the productive efficiency of industrial America can take comfort by visiting Bath.

"As the Jack Williams is about to meet the elements, we can be supremely confident that she will be a distinguished addition to the United States' fleet. You ask, 'Why?' The reason is simple. She's a Bath-built ship."

Less than a year later, the Iron Works appeared to fulfill the admiral's praise when it announced plans for a $45.7 million facility on the Portland waterfront. The adjunct yard will have a huge floating drydock which can handle the overhaul and refitting of ships too large to navigate the Kennebec. An estimated 1,000 shipyard jobs will be created once the facility is completed in 1983, an eventuality that was made certain last fall when Maine voters approved the issuance of $30 million of state and city bonds to help finance the expansion.

Nearly forty years before, during those wartime days when the Iron Works employed 12,000 Maine men and women, it had an auxiliary yard in South Portland. That was closed quickly as the postwar work force shrank to less than 300 and the Iron Works slid into another of its troughs. When the next trough will come along, or if another ever will, is not a matter of immediate concern in Maine today, however. Today, BIW is on the crest, and the ships that slide down its ways and glide down the Kennebec are following a familiar course sailed by hundreds of vessels during the past ninety years.

Now that the good times are here, the best of those ships are recalled with fondness and reverence, each taking its turn past the buoys, islands, shoals, and shores that mark the Kennebec's tumble to the sea.

Off the ways and past the Long Reach that runs from the Iron Works to Fiddler's Reach sail yachts like Morgan's Corsair, Vanderbilt's Ranger, Chisolm's Aras, Payne's Aphrodite, and Pynchon's Defiance.

Around the corner at Doubling Point and south to Ram Island come the famous four-stackers built to help win World War I—the Davis, the Allen, the Manley, the Wickes, and the Hale, ships that survived to fight for Britain more than two decades later in yet another global conflict.

Past Goat Island, just off the pristine white steeple at Phippsburg, and on to Perkins Island and beyond, steam the ram Katahdin, the battleship Georgia, the cruiser Chester, and the PT810—the prototypes and experimental ships that made a history all their own.

And there, surging past Fort Popham on the west and Gilbert Head on the east come all the eighty-two destroyers that helped turn the tide on two oceans in the years after Pearl Harbor—Bath-built, every one.

Out past Sequin, in the open ocean now, the Delaware is underway again, rising and falling on the gentle seas. She's in smooth waters, not the dark swells of that dark night in November when she rose and tumbled from crest to trough like the yard that built her, riding out the storm. That was the night I knelt in her pilothouse to read the brass plate on her binnacle and learned firsthand what the words "Bath-built" can mean to sailors everywhere.●

THE BOOKBURNERS MEET THEIR MATCH

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, one of the best things about American freedom is the way our liberties are constantly revitalized by the victories of uncommon heroes on uncommon battlegrounds.

The latest victory took place yesterday at a student assembly in Girard High School, a few miles from the city of Erie, Pa. The community had become embroiled in controversy over an effort to ban Studs Terkel's book, "Working," from the school.

In many other towns across America, other books are under similar siege today, as the bookburners of the New Right defy the Constitution and seek to impose their ideology of censorship on their fellow citizens.

But in Girard, a courageous high school English teacher and his equally courageous principal took a stand. They invited Mr. Terkel to visit the school and defend his book. According to press accounts, the bookburners were routed in an overwhelming display of support by the school and the student body for Mr. Terkel and his book.

In these difficult days of concern over repression in Poland and escalating violence and massacres in El Salvador, it is heartening to read of this example of the way the freedoms won two centuries ago in America are renewed in our own generation. And it is perhaps poetic justice—in this time of concern across the United States over the deteriorating economy and rising unemployment—that the instrument of vindication in this case is an author whose book is titled "Working."

Mr. President, I ask that an article from today's New York Times describing this confrontation with the bookburners may be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

TERKEL FINDS 'HEROES' IN BOOK PROTEST

(By William Robbins)

GIRARD, Pa., Feb 2.—Studs Terkel, author of several best-selling books, came here today to defend one of his works against a book-banning movement and captured a school.

The short, vibrant, voluble, 69-year-old author pleaded his case at the Girard High School in the low and warm tones of a suitor, and the 650-member student body twice gave him standing ovations. "I am deeply moved," he said.

Mr. Terkel, invited here by a determined teacher backed by an equally firm school principal, spoke in the afternoon after spending the morning talking to class after class about academic freedom and the meaning of his work.

The focal point of the controversy was his book "Working," which was based on recorded interviews with dozens of working people describing their jobs and their lives. Their words were almost simple, often eloquent and sometimes profane.

UPROAR OVER PROFANITY

It was that profanity that stirred dispute, after the book had been in use in English classes for senior vocational students here for about seven years.

About a week ago, in this town of about 2,500 people in the center of a mixed agricultural and industrial area 20 miles from Erie, 30 parents appeared at a school board meeting to protest the use of the book. They were led by Linda Burns, the mother of a student in a senior English class. At about the same time one class of eight students refused to read the book. No other students have protested.

"We strongly object to profanity in the book and fear that students will receive a distorted view of the working world by reading it," Mrs. Burns said later.

Saying that she strongly opposed the work as required reading and would like to see it "banned from the district," she added, "It's bad enough that it's in the library."

AUTHOR SEES "EXQUISITE IRONY"

Before his arrival here, Mr. Terkel remarked, referring to the protesters, "The exquisite irony is that they are the heroes and heroines of this book."

Said Jan Calhoun, the school district's acting Superintendent: "He's on the spot. They want to hear his defense."

Robert Burns, the bearded 18-year-old son of the protest leader, remained unmoved after meeting Mr. Terkel in class: "I think he's good with his words, but he didn't convince me." He said he was receiving failing grades for each day he continued to refuse to read the book.

If the school board orders the book out of the class, Walter Blucas, the high school principal, said today, "I would have to make a very serious professional decision." He added, "Right now, I don't feel like backing down."

Asked today what effect the controversy might have on sales of "Working," which is now available in most stores only in its paperback edition, he said: "Oh, I don't think it will have any. You know it's been out so long." The book was first published in 1973.

But local bookstores reported numerous calls of book seekers and a shortage of copies.

Mr. Terkel planned to return to the school tonight to plead his case at a closed meeting of the educational committee of the school board. He was to be accompanied by the teacher, Kay Nichols, and a representative of the Pennsylvania Federation of Teachers, which has an academic freedom clause in its contract here.

The highlight of the day was the student assembly meeting, addressed by Mr. Terkel, at which the only vocal critics in evidence were Robert Burns and a classmate, James Richardson.

A STUDENT'S APOLOGY

One student who had been among the protesters arose to say he had changed his mind. He had been convinced that the message of the book was more important than the type of words used, he said, adding: "I thought I owed you an apology."

The remark brought deafening applause, and Mr. Terkel said softly, "Now I know why I came to Girard."

Challenged by Mr. Richardson to read aloud one of the passages upon which the dispute has focused, Mr. Terkel opened a paperbacked volume and began, leaving blanks for obscenities that were obvious to his audience. It was a passage of words from a Brooklyn firefighter named Tom Patrick, and Mr. Terkel said it summed up much on the meaning of his work.

It would not have been the same, he said, if Mr. Patrick had said "the world is all fouled up."

Inspiring a final ovation, Mr. Terkel, still speaking softly, told the students, "I hope you have a long, decent life, work hard—and read."●

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABDNOR). Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECORD OPEN UNTIL 4:30 P.M. TODAY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the RECORD remain open until the hour of 4:30 p.m. for the introduction of bills, resolutions, and statements.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR THE RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BUMPERS ON TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the recognition of the distinguished junior Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) under a special order on tomorrow, the distinguished Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS) be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes under a special order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL TOMORROW AT 10 A.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I know of no further business to come before the Senate. I will inquire of the distinguished acting minority leader if he has any further business to come before the Senate today.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, this side has no further business.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the distinguished acting minority leader.

Mr. President, I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate now stand in recess until the hour of 10 a.m. on tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to and, at 3:15 p.m., the Senate recessed, to reconvene on Thursday, February 4, 1982, at 10 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, February 3, 1982

The House met at 3 p.m.

The Reverend Panama Mutu, vice chairman, Christian Congregational Church of American Samoa, offered the following prayer:

O God, our Heavenly Father, Creator of light and Giver of life to men. We thank Thee, for days, season, and years in which we live.

Cleanse our lives of all sin and evil, and create in us clean hearts, that we may go forth into the year with confidence and courage.

Help us to redeem the days that Thou hast given us. Permit us not to lose our lives in the pursuit of the unworthy and the worthless.

Keep us from entanglements with the sordid and the lustful. May our delights be found in the true, the beautiful and the good.

Help us, O God, to walk the ways of righteousness and peace. Teach us to know truly our cause to mankind and to the world.

Lord of all nations, grant that in this our Nation, there may be none high or low, whatever his race or caste, but a new enthusiasm of humanity where brother is working with brother. We need good men and more citizens dedicated to building bridges of understanding and good will. We all have spiritual suitcases and we know where we are going. We do not pray for a lighter load, but we pray for a stronger back. Help us, our leaders of today, the executive, the legislator, the judicial, and all who are in authority to bind the wounds of the world, with the cleansing and healing oil of your sympathy and love. Now, may we find new life in touching the hem of Christ's garment, by listening to His words, by our awareness of His presence in our midst, and by opening our lives to His grace.

Bless our Nation with peace and the good of all the world. Give to the rising generation a strong faith in Christ and a sincere devotion to His cause.

This our prayer, O God, through our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

THE REVEREND PANAMA MUTU

(Mr. SUNIA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SUNIA. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasant duty to add to your own welcome our welcome to the Reverend Panama Mutu, who is vice chairman of the Christian Congregational Church of American Samoa.

It is also my very pleasant experience to be able to invite him to the National Prayer Breakfast tomorrow and at the same time extend our greetings to the first Samoan minister ever to offer the prayer in this Chamber of ours.

Reverend Mutu's other duties, while he is in this Nation, are to finalize the arrangements to bring the American Samoan chaplains into the Armed Forces of our Nation.

So, it is indeed with great pleasure that I welcome Reverend Mutu to our Nation's Capital and to wish him a safe trip back to paradise.

THE SYNFUELS CORPORATION SHOULD BE ALLOWED TO ENCOURAGE BIOMASS FUEL DEVELOPMENT

(Mr. GLICKMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing along with my colleagues, WES WATKINS of Oklahoma and DON CLAUSEN of California, legislation to authorize the Synthetic Fuels Corporation to provide support to production of fuels from biomass just as the Corporation is presently authorized to provide for other alternative energy resources.

When we passed the legislation establishing the Synfuels Corporation during the last Congress, fuels from biomass were specifically excluded from the Corporation's jurisdiction because we had programs providing good amounts of financial support to these energy resources within the Energy and Agriculture Departments. Times have changed, and the direct Federal support for biomass energy resources have dwindled. This morning at a breakfast sponsored by the Congressional Research Service, the Chairman of the Synfuels Corporation, Ed Noble, said that he felt the Synfuels Corporation should have the legal authority to assist biomass energy projects. We agreed and that prompted us to submit this legislation today.

We need to continue developing alternative energy resources and biomass-based fuels should not be excluded.

THE TWO EXTREMES OF EL SALVADOR

(Mr. DAN DANIEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Speaker, a great debate is raging throughout this country about internal conditions in El Salvador.

I do not know which of the two extremes are correct; perhaps, neither. But I find a curious consistency in those who support the leftist coalition of insurgents in El Salvador.

In our recent history, these are the same groups who supported the Castroists in Cuba, the guerrillas in Vietnam, the followers of Ayatollah Khomeini in Iran, and the Sandinistas in Nicaragua.

Can they really feel that the people in those countries are enjoying a better way of life today than they did before their governments were so radically changed?

THE SEARCH FOR PEACE IN EL SALVADOR

(Mr. WRIGHT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to salute the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. DAN DANIEL) and to join in the plea that he makes for patience and understanding with those people who are attempting in good faith to create a peaceful solution to the problems in El Salvador.

The only person who ever has been elected as President of that country is Jose Napoleon Duarte. Recently when he was in the United States, I was present with a bipartisan group from this House. We asked him all kinds of questions, and he responded affirmatively. He expresses a total willingness to let the people choose, by the electoral process, which group they want to govern them. The terrorists, on the other hand, are doing everything within their power to sabotage the electoral process.

Surely it is our responsibility to stand with those moderate people like President Duarte who are willing to settle those problems by ballots not by bullets, and who are willing to hold free and fair elections. I cannot imagine our succumbing once again to the siren song of those who would sell down the river the responsible people who are trying to have a stable, free democratic government in behalf of those who would follow the example of Castro's Cuba.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS OF CONGRESSMAN NORMAN D. DICKS FOR LEGISLATION MANDATING AN ANNUAL OPEN SEASON FOR FEDERAL EMPLOYEE HEALTH BENEFITS

(Mr. DICKS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to insure that Federal workers and retirees are provided the opportunity to change their health benefits plans on a predictable and regular basis.

One of the foundations of the Federal employees health benefits program is the competition among various health insurance plans. This competition encourages a wide variety of coverage options, helps lower costs, and allows participants to purchase the type of health coverage that best suits their needs, at a price they are willing to pay.

But recent actions of the Office of Personnel Management have undermined this competition and prevented FEHB participants from exercising their free market right of choice. OPM has repeatedly refused to implement the open season scheduled for last December. In fact, they have taken the issue to court to determine if any open season is in fact required.

My bill is intended to clarify once and for all any confusion about the necessity for an open season. Current law provides the Office of Personnel Management complete discretion as to when to provide opportunities for employees and retirees to change health plans. In the past, OPM has regularly granted an open season at the end of each year. The system worked well in balancing the need for ease in administration with the desires for FEHB participants to change plans. But the events of the last few months demonstrate that we can no longer rely on OPM to honor this time tested arrangement. I frankly fear that future attempts to manipulate the system may come about without a clear requirement for annual open seasons.

This bill, because it promotes competition, will help keep costs down and guarantee the type of feedom in selecting health insurance plans that all Americans expect and deserve. I strongly urge its prompt passage by the House.

JAPANESE QUARANTINE ON CALIFORNIA PRODUCE IS UNFAIR

(Mr. THOMAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, the United States has worked for decades to establish a worldwide trade policy which relies upon the free movement of goods among nations.

Unfortunately, our generosity in admitting foreign goods to America is not often reciprocated. Farm exports, which account for about one-fifth of total U.S. exports, often face tariffs, quotas, and other barriers in foreign markets.

The most recent trade restriction on farm products has been Japan's quarantine of all produce grown in California. Japan has required fumigation or cold treatment for any California farm product, ostensibly out of fear that the Mediterranean fruit fly might enter Japan in a shipment of California produce. This Japanese quarantine is not grounded in scientific fact.

USDA evidence shows that only 240 square miles require produce treatment and other Medfly control measures. The USDA has identified 240 host species which, if grown in a Medfly-infested area, must be fumigated. Fumigation is costly and can greatly reduce produce shipping range.

Japan, however, requires treatment of all produce from anywhere within California, which encompasses 158,000 square miles. This entirely unreasonable quarantine represents a formidable nontariff barrier which discriminates against California growers and shippers.

Shippers located hundreds of miles from a Medfly-infested area must treat their produce at great expense, yet shippers equidistant from a Medfly area but outside the State—in Arizona, for example—may ship freely to Japan. In addition, shippers of nonhost material such as strawberries, potatoes, and lettuce must treat their produce even though no scientific evidence exists showing these crops to be even remotely connected with the Medfly.

California farmers are suffering unfair treatment under this arbitrary quarantine. We in this body often hear about our trade deficit with Japan and about the dumping of Japanese cars and radios on the U.S. market. I am here today to tell you that California farmers are being dumped upon.

LAW OF THE SEA

(Mr. FIELDS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, last Friday, President Reagan announced to the Nation that many of the provisions of the current draft convention of the so-called Law of the Sea Treaty are unacceptable and inconsistent with U.S. interests. This determination followed an extensive interagency review.

I invite my colleagues and all Americans to join me in extending high praise and commendation to the President for this decision.

While last Friday's announcement passed with relatively little note in this country, I believe that future American historians will view it in the same light as the Declaration of Independence. Finally, another American leader has looked into the dark face of tyranny and refused to blink.

The present draft treaty represents a striking affront to the sovereignty of the United States, and is nothing short of a thinly disguised attempt by part of the Third World, joined by the Soviet-bloc, to co-opt the United States, and have Americans assume the majority financing for a new international organization which is unalterably committed to locking up the wealth, riches, and resources of the world's oceans which are so vital to America's national interest.

ANOTHER UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICE BY JAPAN

(Mr. SCHULZE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, the Japanese manufacturers of specialty steel pipe and tube have been selling their products in the United States at less than fair value. In a word, they have been dumping their excess production over here in order to maintain high levels of employment at home.

Is that an example of traveling a two-way street? Are the working men and women of the United States required to go on furlough every time a foreign producer runs out of market for his product?

The dumping of specialty steel by the Japanese will have a crippling effect on our domestic industry. If our manufacturers go under, who will supply our needs? Clearly, the Japanese will, and anyone who thinks they will do it at a fair profit should think again; they will demand monopoly profits.

It is time to do something about the trading practices of our major trading partner across the Pacific. The Congress must act. It is time to man the defenses.

UNITED STATES-JAPANESE TRADE

(Mr. JAMES K. COYNE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JAMES K. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to register my approval of the Japanese Government party's recent proposal to ease or to eliminate 67 nontariff trade barriers, but I suggest that further action is necessary.

The $20 billion trade deficit with Japan that the United States will incur this year is staggering and demands attention. The intricate web of excessively stringent customs, product standards and testing requirements of the Japanese economic system accounts for a substantial portion of this deficit, and I suggest that only the removal of these barriers will open Japanese markets to an acceptable degree.

I believe that although the Japanese Government's proposal is a step in the right direction toward a Japanese market open to foreign products, the actual change will be little more than superficial. The proposal primarily affects industries involved with cosmetics, pharmaceuticals, processed foods, and sporting goods and makes scant mention of high-technology products such as data processing and telecommunications equipment.

I support the U.S. Trade Representative's efforts to communicate to the Japanese Government that we will not be content with minor alterations to Japan's complex system of economic obstacles. We demand more extensive elimination of trade barriers.

DISCONTINUING SUPPORT FOR BLUE ANGELS AND THUNDERBIRD PROGRAM

(Mr. MARKS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MARKS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to advise the House that it is my intention within the next few days to present a concurrent resolution which will urge the Defense Department to discontinue support for the Blue Angels and the Thunderbird program.

I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have great concern for those people in the program and great, great sympathy for their families and their relatives.

Mr. Speaker, I am presenting this concurrent resolution because I feel very strongly that the loss of 38 of our best and brightest and most human being pilots should not go on. I believe this because I do not believe it is necessary after 38 deaths of these extraordinary young men to have that type of a program to instill patriotism or to convince our young men or women to join the Armed Forces.

As a part of this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I will ask that this Congress approve gold medals for those families of the deceased pilots who have suffered and given their lives in the interest of this country.

There was no objection.

EXPRESSING SENSE OF CONGRESS REGARDING SUCCESSFUL RESCUE OF BRIG. GEN. JAMES L. DOZIER

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Armed Services be discharged from further consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 260) expressing the sense of the Congress regarding the successful rescue of Brig. Gen. James L. Dozier, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so for the purpose of allowing the prime sponsor, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO), and the chairman of our Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI), to explain the resolution.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very brief and very succinct resolution which expresses the sense of Congress regarding the successful rescue of Brig. Gen. James L. Dozier and the various activities of the Italian Government. The resolve clause congratulates the Italian Government and its antiterrorist police forces for the rescue of General Dozier.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, since it is obvious that I support the resolution, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

H. CON. RES. 260

Whereas the kidnaping of Brigadier General James L. Dozier by the Red Brigades represented another tragic example of the sickness of international terrorism;

Whereas the Italian antiterrorist police forces exercised patience and efficiency in their investigation of the kidnaping;

Whereas the Italian Government demonstrated sensitivity and resolve in its oversight of police activities and its dealings with the Dozier family;

Whereas the difficulties of rescuing General Dozier without bodily harm required the highest degree of skill and courage: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress congratulates the Italian Government and its antiterrorist police forces for the successful rescue of Brigadier General James L. Dozier; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress extends to General Dozier and his family best wishes for a quick recovery and return to normal life.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half of my time to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD) pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ZABLOCKI

Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZABLOCKI: Page 3, line 2, strike out "recovery and".

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Concurrent Resolution 260, concerning the successful rescue of Brig. Gen. James L. Dozier. At the outset may I commend the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. FRANK ANNUNZIO, for his leadership in bringing this resolution to the attention of the House. I am proud to join him as one of the 166 cosponsors of House Concurrent Resolution 260.

Mr. Speaker, Americans were shocked and saddened by the kidnaping of General Dozier by Red Brigade terrorists on December 17. Throughout his 42 days of captivity, Americans watched with interest and concern as the Italian Government and police struggled with this latest example of the sickness of international terrorism.

The successful rescue of General Dozier on January 28 was cause for celebration. It was also a time to recognize that without the efforts of the Italian police and the Italian Government, General Dozier's rescue would not have been possible.

In that spirit, Mr. Speaker, House Concurrent Resolution 260 provides a congressional expression of appreciation to the Italian police and government in rescuing General Dozier unharmed. The resolution, as I earlier stated, commends the Italian antiterrorist police for their patience and efficiency in the investigation of the Dozier kidnaping, as well as the sensitivity and resolve of the Italian Government in its oversight of police activities and its dealings with the Dozier family.

Finally, House Concurrent Resolution 260 expresses best wishes for a quick return to a normal life for General Dozier and his family. I urge unanimous adoption of the resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield such time as he may consume to the prime sponsor of the legislation, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. FRANK ANNUNZIO.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to urge the support of all of my colleagues for House Concurrent Resolution 260, the bill I introduced, along with the distinguished chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, the Honorable CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI, to congratulate the Italian Government and its antiterrorist police forces for their skill and courage in resolving the brutal kidnaping of Brig. Gen. James L. Dozier, and to extend to General Dozier the best wishes of the Congress for a quick recovery from his recent ordeal in the service of his country.

All of us were relieved and delighted that General Dozier was rescued without bodily injury, and I thank my good friends Chairman ZABLOCKI and WILLIAM BROOMFIELD, ranking minority member for their expeditious committee action to report this legislation for consideration of the full House of Representatives. I also thank the 166 Members of the House of Representatives who cosponsored this resolution of national gratitude, including the 10 full committee chairmen who gave their support.

Brig. Gen. James L. Dozier has proved himself a courageous soldier dedicated to the well-being of his country, and our Nation extends its congratulations and its highest tributes to him for his exemplary fortitude and valor.

In 1978, I was privileged to be a part of the American delegation representing the President of the United States at the memorial service in Rome for Aldo Moro, the former Prime Minister who was slain by vicious renegade terrorists. We came away from this brief visit both strengthened and inspired, for we witnessed firsthand the dignity of the Italian people and their leaders who stood firm in their determination to defend and preserve the values of democracy for which Aldo Moro struggled during more than three decades of dedicated public service. Italy has always been a part of the Western tradition of faith and belief in the nobility of the individual human spirit, and it is this tradition that will remain of tremendous importance in the continuing struggle against terrorist advocates of oppressive state control of individual freedoms dependent on brute force.

About 2 weeks ago, I was again in Rome, along with my distinguished colleague Chairman PETER RODINO, and other Members of the Congress, and we had a discussion with President Pertini of Italy. All of his remarks centered on the fight against the scourge of terrorism in Italy and the strong and concerted efforts being made to eradicate this terrible threat to his country's values of freedom.

During those 4 years since I last visited Italy, he emphasized the tremendous progress that had been made to strengthen his nation's defenses against terrorism, and his optimism in his country's ultimate triumph over terrorism was rewarded by the rescue of General Dozier a few days later. General Dozier is reported to have said that Italy's antiterrorist action was a "stupendous operation."

The United States and Italy have a long tradition of friendship in addition to the cultural and ethnic ties between our peoples, and it is most important that our alliance with a strong, democratic Italy in NATO is maintained and strengthened for our mutual benefit. Italy has long been a vital member of that alliance in opposition to Communist conquest and oppression.

I want to commend Ambassador Rabb for the outstanding manner in which he conducted himself during this trying period while General Dozier was being held captive. He was a tower of strength in preserving the long friendship between the United States and Italy.

With the passage of this resolution of national gratitude today, we as a nation say to the Italian people, and to the Italian Government and the brave members of its antiterrorist forces, "Bravissimo." With this resolution we send to them our heartiest congratulations for this important victory, our best wishes for continued success in their firm stand against the forces of oppression, and our strongest expressions of support in the unswerving dedication to the ideals of liberty.

An editorial from the February 1 edition of the Christian Science Monitor entitled, "Italy Saves the General," follows:

ITALY SAVES THE GENERAL

Terrorism is not impregnable. That is the message of the dramatic rescue of American Brig. Gen. James Dozier by Italian police last week. The raid was a tremendous victory for the Italian carabinieri and anti-terrorist commandos. It was also a major blow to the Red Brigade terrorists who had been holding the general since his kidnapping Dec. 17. During the 42-day period of incarceration, Italian authorities captured some 20 carloads of documents and arrested a number of suspected terrorists. They will now be able to put together the first detailed picture of the makeup and operation of the Red Brigades organization over its 11-year history.

The battle against terrorism, of course, must go on. The brutal assassination of a Turkish diplomat in Los Angeles the same day as the rescue of General Dozier was another incident in an unrelenting chain of terrorist acts in many parts of the world. As long as misguided individuals and groups resort to such mindless methods of political or social protest, every human and spiritual resource must continue to be brought to bear on the problem.

Every success in combatting terrorism, however, lessens the fear of it and gives encouragement to the forces of order. The world can only cheer the magnificent work of the Italian police. In the grateful words of General Dozer, it was "a stupendous operation."

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I yield to my distinguished friend, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Defense of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from New York (Mr. ADDABBO).

Mr. ADDABBO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentleman on his statement and I join with him in his accolades and his full and detailed report of this important matter in the history of our country and the Italian Government relationship.

I wish to also commend the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) and the ranking minority member, Mr. BROOMFIELD.

Also, as we commend the Italian Government, Mr. Speaker, I think we should also commend all of those who worked in conjunction with helping the Italian Government and working very closely with them. I think they are also the unsung heroes in this great drama that we saw unfold and which came to a happy ending.

I join in commending General Dozier for his exemplification of the finest in our military service.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI), the chairman of the Subcommittee on Merchant Marine of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. BIAGGI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) for the introduction of this resolution so promptly, in order to provide a governmental response to a remarkable achievement.

I would also like to commend the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) without whom we would not have been able to have this resolution on the floor today for consideration and whose conduct in areas of this kind have been consistently supportive. We are grateful to him for that.

I would like to associate myself with the gentleman's remarks and to dwell on a facet of the entire undertaking that most people would recognize but sometimes lose sight of in the excitement and jubilance of the recovery and release of General Dozier.

As a former policeman for 23 years in the New York City Police Department, I have viewed the acts of terrorists over these many years, the successful acts of the terrorists, with increasing alarm. It seems they functioned with immunity and impunity and functioned in such an effective manner that they were seemingly impenetrable. Time after time, person after person was either kidnaped or assassinated—governmental officials, business executives, or some peasant who was an impediment to their organization. These terrorists became a threat, not simply to the tranquility of the Republic of Italy, but a threat to all democracy, and they represented a universal threat. Their counterparts were found in other countries, their acts of terrorism, whether it be in Germany, in Libya, in Ireland, or wherever, and their acts of terrorism had to be suppressed.

Sometimes the terrorist is more quickly apprehended, but it seems that the Red Brigade in Italy functioned in such an effective manner that a pall had developed over the entire law enforcement structure of the world, because it seemed these individuals could escape detection, and could function with an arrogance that was frightening.

I focus it on this area because I feel with the apprehension not simply of those who had actual custody of the general, but those others who were in the field and in a number of other places, we have broken into the structure of the Red Brigade. I hope that it is the first step in the destruction of the entire Red Brigade organization.

As a former policeman, I pay a special commendation to all of those who were responsible for the release and the recovery of the general, as well as those who were responsible for the arrests of the terrorists in this manner. I am the author of House Joint Resolution 394, cosponsored by some 70 of my colleagues. I rise to join in support of the pending resolution saluting the Italian Government, and most specially the police, for their remarkable rescue of Brig. Gen. James L. Dozier.

One week ago at this time, freedom for General Dozier was no closer than it had been in any of the other 42 days of his captivity. Suddenly, last Thursday morning—in a masterful performance—a group of specially trained Italian police rescued the general from a small apartment in Padua. The feat has been applauded around the world.

Thanks to their work, General Dozier is now a free man, just a few miles away from us right now at Fort Myer. Just as important is the fact that the Government may have broken the back of the Red Brigade.

As Americans, we are proud of General Dozier and grateful to Italy. Let us continue to work cooperatively to end terrorism and protect our diplomats abroad.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I thank my good friend, the gentleman from New York, for his very succinct remarks and for the expertise that he brings to the floor of this House on all police matters.

Mr. ZEFERETTI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I yield to my good friend, the gentleman from New York (Mr. ZEFERETTI) who is also chairman of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control.

Mr. ZEFERETTI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to rise in support of the concurrent resolution and to associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) and compliment him and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI), for bringing this important resolution to the floor.

It is not too often that we pay recognition to those who put their lives on the line every day in support of people. And that is what it is all about. Whether it is a police force in Italy or whether it is a police force in the United States, it is people who go out and put themselves in jeopardy to protect someone else. I would just like to compliment those who have had the ability and the desire to bring this concurrent resolution to the floor.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I thank the gentleman from New York for his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I want to once again express my deep appreciation to the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD), for all of the help and the assistance and cooperation. I know that the other day he took the floor of the House and he praised the Italian antiterrorist squad for the work that they did in bringing General Dozier back home, without bodily injury. The introduction of this resolution and the passage of this resolution by the Congress today is timely, because it is my understanding that General Dozier will be in the country tomorrow, where he will be guest speaker at the prayer breakfast.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) on the work that he has done on this particular resolution and also the chairman of our Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI), and all of the sponsors who have worked so hard to bring this resolution to the floor.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Concurrent Resolution 260 commending the Italian authorities for their skillful efforts in securing the freedom of General Dozier and wishing the general and his family a speedy return to a normal life.

This resolution is especially timely coming as it does on the day the general and his family are returning to the United States and the day before his appearance as the President's guest at the national prayer breakfast.

We all have reason to celebrate his safe return. "America," as President Reagan said, "has finally won one."

But it is a victory shared and made possible by the skill and daring of the Italian Government and its antiterrorist police.

Certainly, they have set an example for professionalism and cooperation that if emulated in other nations would permanently cripple terrorist activities around the world.

Their conduct during General Dozier's 42-day ordeal was exemplary. They combined unparalleled police professionalism with a scrupulous sensitivity to the standards of a democratic society and scored a total success.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the 165 other Members of this body who cosponsored this resolution for their bipartisanship and say that I am proud to be among them.

I know you would all join me in saying: "Welcome home, General Dozier. We're proud of you."

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. MINISH).

Mr. MINISH. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the resolution and commend the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) for bringing the resolution to the floor.

Mr. Speaker, last Thursday an outstanding rescue mission occurred in Padua, Italy. This mission should be a sign to those who believe that terrorism can be a successful and acceptable means to their political ends. The skillful and valiant rescue of Brig. Gen. James Dozier is deserving of the highest praise. I am therefore honored to join my colleagues Chairman ZABLOCKI and Congressman ANNUNZIO, as a cosponsor of a House concurrent resolution commending the Italian Government and the antiterrorist police forces for their outstanding performance in the rescue investigation and mission.

As we have all followed with keen interest and admiration for the last week, it took only 90 seconds for the 10 masked commandos to end the captivity of General Dozier. The quick actions and clear thinking of the Italian police enabled them to safely rescue General Dozier and arrest the Red Brigade members present at the apartment.

This concurrent resolution is a sound piece of legislation which deserves the full support of my colleagues. The resolution begins by recognizing that the kidnaping of General Dozier is another alarming example of international terrorism. With that background, the main body of the bill commends the Italian police and Government for their patience and efficiency in handling the investigation, and emphasizes the extremely competent job of the Italian police for returning the general unharmed.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution is both timely and appropriate, and I believe a fitting way to honor the Italian Government for their assistance to an American citizen, who is also our highest ranking NATO official in Italy. I thank you for recognizing me at this time and I urge my colleagues to give Mr. ZABLOCKI's and Mr. ANNUNZIO's resolution their full support, so that expeditious passage of the legislation may occur.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I move the previous question on the concurrent resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the concurrent resolution just agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KAZEN). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION DISCOURAGING USE OF PUBLIC FUNDS TO PAY DEBTS OF POLAND

(Mr. PEASE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, incredible as it seems, President Reagan has decided to have our Government pay $71.3 million owed by the Government of Poland to U.S. commercial banks. This figure could grow to $613 million over the next 20 months. Our constituents are being forced to pay the debts of the martial law regime of General Jaruzelski in Poland at the same time the fiscal year 1982 deficit is soaring past $100 billion and unemployment offices are closing their doors all over America.

This ill-advised policy flies in the face of the commonsense and decency of the American people. It could only be implemented secretly behind closed doors. And that is precisely the course of action being followed by the Reagan administration. If the Congress does not act quickly, every American taxpayer will be directly subsidizing the brutal repression of the Polish people and the destruction of the Solidarity trade union movement.

I have introduced a concurrent "sense of the Congress" resolution to dissuade the President from using public funds to underwrite the complete subjugation of the Polish people. Specifically, my resolution urges that no agency of the U.S. Government be authorized to make payments on the current debts owed by the Government of Poland to either the U.S. Government or to U.S. commercial banks until:

First, the Government of Poland has formally and publicly been declared in default on its debts and concrete steps have been taken to recover at least some of the outstanding funds from Polish assets; and Second, the military government of Poland has lifted the martial law imposed on December 13, 1981.

WHY SHOULD YOU SUPPORT THIS RESOLUTION?

First, it is the Soviet Union which dominates political, economic, and military developments in Poland. Therefore, it is the Soviets and their Polish military pawns who should shoulder the burden of financing Poland as well as the blame for the economic collapse and military crackdown.

Second, it is painfully apparent that, as Americans, we do not have either the influence or the power to substantially improve the lot of the Polish people. They have no personal freedom and, just this week, prices for food and fuel were increased 200 percent to 400 percent by government fiat.

Third, the Reagan administration has used surreptitious means to subvert the rules and charter of the Commodity Credit Corporation to pay off its friends in the Wall Street banking community. Apparently it is easier to dun the American taxpayer for the expense of Polish martial law than to ask the commercial banks to lift a finger toward seizing Polish assets.

Most importantly, the bankruptcy of the entire Communist system will be dramatically borne out if the Government of Poland is found in default on its loans. Felix Rohatyn, senior partner of the investment banking firm of Lazard Freres, recently pointed out:

> The West has been relieving the Soviet Union of what may be its greatest shortage—capital—at the cost of making bad loans while pretending to oppose Communism. That is bad business, bad policy and bad morality.

The weapon of capital is potentially one of the most powerful and least used in the Western world. Poland affords us a chance to use it. It might turn out to be our only effective way, in the long run, of bringing about change behind the Iron Curtain.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to include in the RECORD the following article from the New York Times:

PAYOFF FOR REPRESSION

(By William Safire)

WASHINGTON.—The U.S. Government last week decided in secret to pay $70 million a month to American banks unable to collect loans to Poland, despite rules of the Commodity Credit Corporation that require the debtor first be declared in default.

Here are some documents—passed along by officials in defiance of lie-detector threats—that show how a craven State Department recommendation, rubber-stamped by national security adviser William Clark, takes the financial pressure off the Polish military junta by interfering with the C.C.C.'s normal guarantee requirements.

On Jan. 8, acting Secretary of Agriculture Richard E. Lyng wrote to then deputy N.S.C. adviser James Nance, pointing out that loans from U.S. banks to Poland, which had been guaranteed by the C.C.C., were coming due along with direct loans in the amount of $70 million per month. ("We're like co-signers on a note," explains Secretary Lyng," and when the debtor can't pay, the creditor comes to us.")

However the C.C.C. requires the banks to aggressively seek payment from the borrower before the Government makes good on a bad debt. Was it O.K., asked Secretary Lyng, to stick to the rules: to demand a declaration of default from Poland before paying the American banks?

On Jan. 16, three low-level officials at State sent to the White House a draft of an answer for the new national security adviser. "There is complete agreement," the memo states, despite disagreement by some defense officials, "that the USG should not take any action which increases the risk that Poland could be declared in default . . . it is imperative that USDA take all possible steps to avoid any inducement for banks with claims on C.C.C. to call default. . . ."

Among these "all possible steps" were extraordinary means to get around the rules: "We therefore urge that you explore all possible methods under the C.C.C. charter to authorize payments by the C.C.C. in the absence of a declaration of default," and three such methods were suggested: "Through interpretation of the regulations, the issuance of a temporary and emergency amendment to the C.C.C. regulations, or through the direct repurchase of C.C.C. guarantees on other outstanding obligations covering credits to Poland."

That favored treatment to avoid pressuring Poland's oppressors had to be disguised, the memo indicated, because the Administration had agreed with NATO allies two days before to withhold any rescheduling of the Polish debt: "While minimizing any increase in the risk of default, this interim method of settlement should also avoid being construed as a rescheduling of Poland's C.C.C. debt."

In plain works, the appeasement crowd at State (with the acquiescence of Treasury) not only recommended that we subvert the financial pressures on Poland agreed to at NATO two days before, but that we turn the charter of the C.C.C. upside down to do it—and then in such a secret way as to deceive the U.S. public.

Incredibly, the White House—in the person of William P. Clark, hero of hopeful hardliners—signed the memo, including the "complete agreement" canard. In its final form, sent to USDA 10 days ago, the White House order directs that American private banks who made risky loans to Poland be repayed with taxpayer dollars without requiring the usual pursuit of the debtor into default. The C.C.C. will then send Poland a bill, to be payed when and if. Without the fact of default, that is de facto rescheduling.

Of course, Agriculture complied with the White House order. An emergency regulation was secretly promulgated. However it was felt that the arrangement had such a reek to it that the seven members of the board of the Commodity Credit Corporation, with a quorum available in Washington, D.C., could not be trusted to vote on this rape of the rules without objection or leak. So the no-default decision was made by departmental fiat, to be ratified later by the C.C.C. board.

Deputy Secretary Lyng, a longtime California Reaganite, avoids all questions on this extraordinary regulation as "a national security matter," which it is not. He cannot deny that he received an order from the White House to authorize C.C.C. payment without the normal demand of default.

Meanwhile, President Reagan—who has probably not been briefed on this, because his N.S.C. briefer may not yet comprehend the import of the decision—blithely sails along, assuring one and all that more stringent methods are on the way unless Poland's junta eases off.

Just the opposite is taking place: the secret regulation giving the junta extraordinarily lenient treatment makes a mockery of pretensions of pressure.

In an eyeball-to-eyeball confrontation, the Reagan Administration has just blinked. Poland's rulers can afford to dismiss the Reagan rhetoric because they have seen that the U.S. is ready to do regulatory nip-ups to save them from default.

AMBIVALENT AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

(Mr. JOHNSTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. Speaker, the ambivalence of American foreign policy is well illustrated by the State Department's recent attempt to change the rules insofar as bank loans to Poland. If we lack the courage to confront the Soviets militarily, let us at least have the courage to confront them economically and insist they play by the rules.

I commend to my colleagues the editorial from today's Wall Street Journal which clearly and unequivocally points out just exactly how the rules are being bent in favor of the Soviets as they enforce their crackdown on the once free people of Poland.

CONGRESS CHANCE ON POLAND

It looks as if the battle for freedom in Poland is going to have to be taken to the floor of the U.S. Congress. With Ronald Reagan's administration slipping into tacit collaboration with martial law by making it easier for the Soviet block to finance repression, any serious action against the Polish regime will have to be taken by another branch of government.

It turns out that the administration, far from calling in the Polish debt to hamper the flow of credit to the Soviet Union and its satellites, is bending U.S. law to keep Poland out of bankruptcy. The Commodity Credit Corporation provides government guarantees to banks financing grain shipments abroad, offering to repay the banks if foreign governments cannot. For ordinary, non-Communist governments, no payment is made until the bank declares the loan in default. But in the case of Poland, this was deemed too embarrassing.

So the State Department lobbied to change the CCC rules, and the administation decided to pay off $71 million to the banks without their declaring a formal default. This is a down payment on about $400 million in guarantees on Polish loans due this year. No sooner is the decision taken than Secretary Haig rushes off to Chicago to spend Solidarity Day posturing before Polish voters as a tough guy on Poland.

One point that begs attention is how this decision was reached. At what level of the government was it decided? Did the President understand the full implications of the change in the rules? Did the National Security Adviser? Where was the Treasury? (The undersecretary for monetary affairs says he's under instructions not to discuss the issue.) Was the Defense Department even consulted? Was this the foreign policy equivalent of the decision to change the tax status of segregated private schools? Everything we learn leads us to suspect that the answers to these questions would be profoundly embarrassing, that this is another example of sloppy management at the White House.

A second point concerns the banks. They have refrained from declaring a default in Poland because the writedowns would hurt their earnings. It would also hurt their chances of doing new business with the Communist dictators of Poland and the rest of the Soviet bloc. But the real question is how did U.S. and other Western banks make all these bad loans, and how can we stop them from doing it again?

The banks have made the loans because Western governments encouraged them to do so, implicitly suggesting that loans to Communists had a favored position, deserved lower rates and would more or less be backed by Western governments. The CCC deal can only encourage this notion. The Soviets rushed to get the gas pipeline deal and other credits wrapped up before the Polish crackdown, and with the new incentives just demonstrated by the Reagan administration, the flow of credit will resume again as soon as the bad press dies down.

The U.S. government ought to at least stay neutral toward Communist loans. The Polish loans clearly are sick, and probably terminally so. The banks ought to be establishing large reserves against them—we have previously suggested 50 percent—as a matter of pure commercial prudence. The government ought to be encouraging them to do this, not helping them avoid it, to limit the commercial damage from any forceful foreign policy initiative. Instead the Reagan administration sponsors a TV show.

Fortunately Congress will have an opportunity to show greater forcefulness, for it controls the power of the purse and bail-out money has to come from somewhere. Specifically, it would come from House Joint Resolution 389, a budget-busting supplemental appropriation of $5 billion for the CCC. This measure has been marked up—with unseemly haste—in the agriculture appropriations subcommittee by the Mississippi Democrat, Jamie Whitten. The main purpose is to provide pork for American farmers, who are calling on their CCC entitlements because of low farm prices. But a lot of the money—between $500 million and $1.5 billion, so far as we can learn—could be used to bail out repression in Poland.

It would not be the worst thing in the world if this whole supplemental were grounded, farm price supports being one of our least favorite subsidies to the landowning poor. But if Congress in going to bail out the American farmer, it can at least write in an amendment prohibiting the use of these tax funds to bail out Polish dictators, at least until a default is declared and the economic lessons of Poland digested.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. ADDABBO) is recognized for 60 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the matter of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

A TRIBUTE TO JAMES C. HEALEY

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, many of us here today remember former Congressman James C. Healey, of New York, who passed away on December 16. He was not a figure one would easily forget. I extend my deepest sympathies to his son, Jim and to all his family.

When I first came to the Congress in 1961, Jim had already been here for 4 years. Many a Member, especially an inexperienced one as I, was glad to have Jim's advice and guidance. His good cheer, too, eased our adjustment to congressional life.

During his 8 years in the House, Jim served on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee and the Banking and Currency Committee. He was, even at that time 20 years ago, greatly concerned about international air agreements and the competition our own international carriers faced.

He was also a staunch supporter of Israel, often opposing ill-advised proposals to sell arms and equipment to Arab nations. This, you will remember, was a time when the Israelis were approaching their 10th anniversary and struggling for survival against the economic and military sanctions of their neighbors.

One particular instance in 1956, when the Eisenhower administration proposed to send arms to Saudi Arabia against the strongest opposition from the Congress, spurred a response by Healey and other Members of the New York delegation highly critical of the sale. This brings to mind the struggles we faced last year against a different Republican administration, but also highlights the sensitivity of Healey and others to the hardships and hazards the Israeli's courageously bore then, and continue to face.

The problems in the Mideast were not the only ones to occupy Jim Healey's attention. For Jim Healey, the time spent in the Congress spans a period of fundamental change in our domestic and foreign policies. Serving during the tenures of Presidents Eisenhower, Kennedy, and Johnson, Jim Healey participated in the cold war debates and then, later, in those promoting peaceful coexistence.

On the domestic end, he was here to lend his hand to the shaping of the Great Society. And it is obvious that he kept his eye on the needs of his people—those who lived in the 21st Congressional District in the Bronx, New York. The district, typical of the melting pots that make New York the great place it is, found in Healey a man who supported its needs. Jim pressed for Federal aid for housing and education, looked to raising the minimum wage, and stood beside adequate pay for postal and other Federal employees.

Civil rights, too, was one of his priorities. Long before it became the vogue, Healey saw that our Spanish speaking citizens could not fully exercise their rights as voters if election material was not available to them in their own language. This is only once concrete example of the Congressman's diligence to foster individual rights. He fully supported these rights for all Americans and stood solidly behind the President as Johnson began his historical struggle for equally.

Jim was one of the most active members of the New York Democratic Party organization. Though some might be tempted to say that this role overshadowed all others he played, one cannot help but admire Healey's staunch party loyalty and spirit. How many of us, I wonder, would push so hard for a Presidential candidate's election, as Jim did for Kennedy, that he or she would literally forget his or her own campaign? How many, today, would end our campaign speeches with, "Oh, incidentally, vote for me, too." Jim Healey did.

Those of us who were lucky enough to be counted his good friends were sorry to see him retire after he suffered a stroke in the early 1960's. We are sadder still to hear of his death.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADDABBO. I am delighted to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. O'NEILL).

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I served in the House with Jim Healey for 9 years. He came from the Bronx in New York City. He came to Congress with a distinguished record for his country, having served in the Navy and local politics at home. He was borough president of the Bronx.

To know Jim was to enjoy him. He was a lovable individual and one of the most popular Members I can ever recall through my years in the Congress.

I can say of Jim Healey that he could get more done accidentally than the average fellow could get done if he was to studiously work on a program.

He was a lovable, talented, able fellow and during the thirties he was a great athlete. He went to the University of Pennsylvania. On a Saturday night in the thirties, amateur athletics prevailed to a tremendous degree in America, and there were great games that would be held in the major cities on Saturday nights.

The University of Pennsylvania always had great teams and Jim was one of the great quarter milers of his day, and up until probably quite recently, his team in the 1930's at the University of Pennsylvania held the mile relay championship.

They used to talk with great interest. In those days he was a sports buff, among many things, as so many of us in public life are. During the thirties when Jim was on the track circuit as a big name, Glen Cunningham was a great runner from Kansas.

There was a fellow by the name of Frensky who was the second greatest miler in America in those days.

Jim told the story about a fellow calling and asking where could he locate Frensky, and he said, "Any Saturday night you can find him a step and a half behind Cunningham." At that time it was true that 7 or 8 weeks in a row Frensky ran behind Cunningham. It got international press at that time.

Jim, as I said, knew how to get things done. He was extremely popular and well liked here in the Congress of the United States, and young Jim is working now and has worked for DAN ROSTENKOWSKI as one of his AA's. Young Jim has all the traits of his Dad, that of a beautiful human being, knowledgeable, who loves the Congress as his Dad did.

All I can say to young Jim is, "Jim, if oldtimers like myself walk up to you and say you remind us of your old man," that is the highest compliment we can pay him, because Jim Healey was indeed a delightful, honorable, decent guy who really loved this Congress.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADDABBO. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I served with Jim Healey in the House, and as the Speaker has stated, he was a warm person, he was a dedicated American. I was saddened to hear of the passing of our former colleague, Representative James C. Healey, who represented the 21st District of New York for 10 years. Representative Healey, whom I had the honor of serving with during his entire time in Congress, was a dedicated, hard-working, and productive Member of the House of Representatives. He will be sorely missed by all his colleagues.

Representative Healey came to the House with excellent credentials which enabled him to have a fulfilling career. Educated in New York City public schools and Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania, he later attended Fordham and St. John's Law School. As a practicing attorney and lieutenant in the U.S. Navy, Jim Healey gained invaluable experience and expertise which soon became obvious in the legislative initiatives he took in the House.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, our colleague consistently voted for responsible social programs and human needs legislation that responded to the needs of our low- and middle-income people. He was a supporter of Federal aid to education, of Federal minimum wage, of civil rights legislation, and public housing.

As a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, he developed an interest in air carriers and worked to improve the conditions of American air carriers in the international field. Jim Healey was a persistent legislator with determination; he was respected on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. Speaker, it was a pleasure to serve with Jim Healey who well represented his constitutents in the Bronx. I extend my deepest and heartfelt sympathy to his wife, Mollie, his children, and entire family.

● Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join the Members of the House in paying tribute to the late Honorable James C. Healey who died on December 16, 1981. Those of us who served with him in the House from 1956 to 1964 will remember him as a dedicated and effective legislator and a fine friend.

During Jim's career in the House I developed a close friendship with him. I admired him for his devotion to his duties as a representative of the 21st district of New York, his open-mindedness about issues confronting the Congress, and his great sense of humor.

Jim's calm and friendly disposition made him universally well-liked, and made the House of Representatives a more effective forum for debate than it could have been without him. I am pleased to have this opportunity to extend my sympathy and best wishes to Jim's beloved wife Mollie and his family.●

● Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of great loss and sorrow that I now pay tribute to the late Honorable James Christopher Healey. On December 16, Jim passed away at the age of 71.

An outstanding Member of Congress, Jim Healey received a bachelor of science degree from the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania in 1933, and a degree in law from St. John's University in 1936. After law school, he served as an attorney with the New York State Labor Relations Board and then as an assistant U.S. attorney for the southern district of New York.

With the outbreak of World War II, Jim served as a lieutenant in the U.S. Navy. After the war, Jim again applied his legal skills as assistant corporation counsel for the city of New York and later as counsel to the borough president of the Bronx until his election to Congress in 1956.

Until my assignment to the Ways and Means Committee, I had the pleasure of serving with Jim on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. On that committee, I remember Jim as always being helpful with any of my inquiries. He was the kind of individual one always wanted around.

Later as fate would have it, his son, James Christopher Healey, Jr., joined my staff in 1970 and still works for me today.

James Christopher Healey was a good friend, a good legislator, and a proud servant of the House.●

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, on December 16, 1981, our Nation lost a great American. Congress lost a distinguished colleague who served from 1956 to 1964. Bronx County and New York City lost a native son, who became one of their most notable leaders. I lost a good friend and colleague in service for the borough and city we both have loved so much for so long.

James C. Healey, Democrat who served New York's 21st Congressional District of the Bronx, but who was foremost a very devoted family man, has gone to an eternal reward. It is very fitting that we take this time in tribute to observe the person of Jim Healey, witness his achievements, and give our fondest wishes to those he loved and who contributed so much to his life.

A product of the New York public school system, the great New York educational institutions of Fordham and St. John's Universities, receiving his LL.B. from St. John's in 1936, Jim Healey began his public service career as an attorney for the New York State Labor Relations Board in 1938. He went on to become assistant U.S. attorney for the southern district of New York in 1940, which service gave way to World War II and assignment to Europe as a lieutenant in the U.S. Navy.

In 1946, James Healey was appointed assistant corporation counsel for the city of New York. From 1948 to 1956, he was counsel to the borough president of the Bronx.

Then Jim Healey came to Congress. He was elected to the 84th Congress to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Sidney Fine. He was reelected to the 85th and to the three succeeding Congresses, serving from February 7, 1956, until January 3, 1965.

Jim Healey was well respected and greatly admired as a brilliant public figure on the New York and Washington scenes in the early 1960's. He struck an attractive figure. His was a sparkling, charming personality. He had an outstanding record of personal achievements and public accomplishments. His future in public life seemed to have no limits. It was expected that Jim Healey would be tapped for other leadership posts locally, and nationally.

Then suddenly, tragedy struck. He was felled by a stroke 14 months before his reelection primary. While he was not able to win reelection, he was to recover.

While in Congress, Jim Healey championed the efforts of the young nation of Israel. As a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, he felt it was the job of Congress and his committee to monitor international air agreements to make certain American carriers got, at the very least, an even break in negotiations.

Jim Healey also served on the Banking and Currency Committee, and during his congressional career, he established a record as having voted for: Federal aid to education, the $1.25 minimum wage, civil rights, more Federal aid for housing, and pay increases for postal and other Federal employees.

Also a track star who helped to set records for the mile, while on scholarship at the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania, Jim Healey leaves a devoted family behind. To his wife, Mollie, and children, James, John, Joseph, and Elizabeth, I express my deepest sorrow at their loss, and my warmest wishes that God will sustain them in happiness and prosperity as Jim Healey would have wanted.●

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of sorrow yet honor that I participate in this special order in honor of Jim Healey's death on December 16. I was fortunate enough to know Jim for the 6 years that he served with me in the House.

As a Member from the other side of the aisle, Jim and I were in disagreement from time to time. Yet I was always impressed by his compassionate sense of realism, and I think you will all agree with me that we need more distinguished public servants like Jim around today.

Jim served his Nation with distinction. He was an attorney for the New York State Labor Relations Board until 1943, and he was a lieutenant in the Navy during World War II. Jim came here before I did, to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Sidney Fine. I appreciated his friendship and guidance when I came here 2 years later, in 1959.

Jim left the House in 1965, but took a part of all of us with him. He still served his party and his Nation with distinction as a delegate to the Democratic National Convention in 1960, 1964, and 1968.

I began my remarks today by noting that Jim had a sense of compassionate realism. He knew the limits, but he also knew that we had a responsibility to help those who could not help themselves. Many of you remember Jim as a dreamer; some of you could claim that he was a Rube Goldberg-type idealogue, out of touch with the people of the Nation. I do not remember that of him at all—although, he was a dreamer. The world would be a better place in which to live if there were more dreamers.●

● Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I was saddened to learn of the death of Jim Healey. He was not only a most-able Member of this House—he was a warm, generous, compassionate human being. It was a joy to be with him because he brightened and cheered any room he entered.

He was a close friend of my brother Charles. We used to reminisce about my brother, and he would tell me of the experiences both of them had together.

I regret so much of his later years were marred by illnesses; but even suffering as he did, he still possessed a joy and appreciation of life and the events of the day.

Jim will be missed. My wife and I send our deepest condolences to his family.●

● Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in the tribute to former Congressman James C. Healey, who died recently in his native New York.

Congressman Healey's tenure in the House was relatively short—8 years in duration, but his contributions to his district and to his country were long and significant. Among his special concerns were aid to education and housing, and support for the minimum wage and civil rights. He fought hard on behalf of American air carriers and was an outspoken friend of Israel.

Congressman Healey's dedicated spirit and keen sense of competitiveness were nurtured early in his life. His talent as a track star secured for him a scholarship at the University of Pennsylvania. His commitment to this sport survived long after his years of competition and he later served as a track official for the Amateur Athletic Union.

Congressman Healey participated in World War II serving as a lieutenant in the Navy in the European Theater.

Before serving in the House of Representatives, Congressman Healey "paid his dues" doing public service in New York. He served as attorney for the New York State Labor Relations Board; as assistant corporation counsel for the city of New York, and as counsel to the borough president of the Bronx.

Jim Healey's fine educational, military and public service experiences prepared him well to serve with honor and distinction the people of New York's 21st Congressional District.

Mrs. Rhodes joins me in expressing sympathy to the Healey family.●

● Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I was saddened to hear of the passing of our former colleague, Representative James C. Healey, who represented the 21st District of New York for 10 years. Representative Healey, who I had the honor of serving with during his entire time in Congress, was a dedicated, hard-working and productive Member of the House of Representatives. He will be sorely missed by all his colleagues.

Representative Healey came to the House with excellent credentials which enabled him to have a fulfilling career. Educated in New York City public schools and Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania, he later attended Fordham and St. John's Law School. As a practicing attorney and lieutenant in the U.S. Navy, Jim Healey gained invaluable experience and expertise which soon became obvious in the legislative initiatives he took in the House.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, our colleague consistently voted for responsible social programs and human needs legislation that responded to the needs of our low- and middle-income people. He was a supporter of Federal aid to education, of Federal minimum wage, of civil rights legislation, and public housing.

As a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, he developed an interest in air carriers and worked to improve the conditions of American air carriers in the international field. Jim Healey was a persistent legislator with determination; he was respected on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. Speaker, it was a pleasure to serve with Jim Healey who well represented his constituents in the Bronx. I extend my deepest and heartfelt sympathy to his wife Mollie, his children, and entire family.●

● Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleague from New York (Mr. ADDABBO) in paying my respects to the Honorable James Healey who died December 16, 1981. He served in this body in the 84th through the 88th Congresses. Mr. Healey was elected from the 21st Congressional District of New York which I have represented since 1972, although the boundaries of the district are now quite different. He came from a very political family, as he was the son of a Democratic district captain, and I am pleased to note that his own son is now a congressional staffer for our colleague, the Honorable DAN ROSTENKOWSKI.

Mr. Healey worked hard at representing the people of the Bronx in the Halls of Congress. He made sure that the problems of his constituents were not lost in some corner of the Federal bureaucracy, and he established a tradition of the highest quality constituent service that would be the envy of even the most conscientious Member of this body today.

He used to make trips back to the Bronx from Washington every Tuesday and Thursday and meet with streams of constituents who needed one kind of help or another with the Government and then follow up each case diligently until he got results.

Mr. Healey was a strong supporter of John F. Kennedy's Presidential campaign and was one of his strongest supporters in Congress when he won the White House.

In this too, I am sure he was serving his constituents well. He fought in congressional battles on the side of labor, the poor, minorities, recent immigrants and the elderly. He was particularly active in supporting legislation to help improve retirement benefits for Government employees. He is also remembered for his dedication to track and field, an interest which he kept up long after his own personal accomplishments as a track star at the University of Pennsylvania were over. I understand that he used to serve as a track official for the Amateur Athletic Union, and even after he was elected to Congress he helped run the Melrose meets in Madison Square Garden, probably the only Member of Congress to have earned, and deserved, this distinction.

I express my condolences to Mr. Healey's family. This was a fine man who served his country well.●

CLOSING CONGRESSIONAL LOOPHOLES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CORCORAN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Speaker, during the last session of Congress, a bill was enacted that indirectly increased the salary of Members of Congress by increasing the amount of deductions we can take for tax purposes. This, of course, increases our take-home pay. Numerous bills have been introduced to repeal all or part of this provision, and I have cosponsored legislation to repeal completely this unnecessary tax benefit. I am also concerned that if this deduction is not repealed, the language of the provision we passed is so broad that this deduction will be open to widespread abuse.

We should place some limits on the largess with which we treat ourselves, and I am not at all happy with the regulations the IRS issued delineating the limits of our tax deductions. In general, the new regulations provide that a Member can deduct $75 per day of congressional session or, if the Member owns a home, $50 plus taxes and interest per day of congressional session. This deduction is without regard to whether the Member is even in town on that day, or whether the session is a legislative session or merely a pro forma session not requiring our presence—and during which we may well not even be in Washington, D.C.

Under these regulations, we could deduct travel expenses for congressional travel outside of the metropolitan area and at the same time take a hefty deduction for expenses incurred in Washington, D.C. Even those Members who feel that the deduction Congress passed is appropriate will realize that such regulations are ripe for abuse.

I am introducing legislation today that will stipulate that we will be eligible for this tax deduction only if the House of Congress of which a person is a Member is actually in a legislative session—that is, has legislation scheduled for consideration—and only if the Member claiming the deduction has recorded his or her presence by a record vote or a vote by yeas and nays. The very least we can do is claim deductions only for those days on which our presence is required and on which we are actually present.●

INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION—FALL CONFERENCE IN HAVANA, CUBA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) is recognized for 60 minutes.

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I have requested a special order for today to inform the Members of the House of the results of the U.S. congressional participation at the fall conference of the Interparliamentary Union held last fall in Havana, Cuba.

As many of the Members are aware, the fact that the meeting was held in Cuba and that U.S. parliamentarians would attend, was cause for certain controversy.

Indeed that were those who strongly urged that we boycott the meeting as a sign of American displeasure at its location. I believe that such a course of action would have been in error and would have done more to help Castro than to hurt him. It is obvious that our nonparticipation would not have confronted Castro with a very difficult foreign policy challenge. On the other hand, since U.S. congressional delegates did attend, the United States was able to stand up to Castro's propaganda, and in the process earned considerable admiration from other parliamentary delegates from around the world in the atmosphere which prevailed in Havana.

The Havana IPU meeting was attended by delegates from 88 countries plus observers from international organizations such as the United Nations. All U.S. delegation statements were listened to and actions closely watched, therefore, by influential representatives from the Eastern bloc, nonalined, Latin American, NATO, and other countries. Impressions were undoubtedly developed concerning U.S. performance in the IPU conference that could have long term impact on policies in their home countries. The U.S. delegation was particularly active in the following ways:

First, rebutting Castro's opening address: Senator ROBERT STAFFORD directly and immediately responded, in a plenary session, to charges contained in Castro's opening ceremony statement. Senator STAFFORD'S statement characterized Castro's address as an "outrageous lecture", a "diatribe" and "without factual basis," and went on to describe positive actions the United States has taken to help combat the Cuban dengue fever epidemic and receive Cubans forced to leave from the port of Mariel.

Senator STAFFORD'S speech was extremely well received, and many delegates, most notably form nonalined countries, went out of their way to praise the dignified tone of his response and express their embarrassment at Castro's misuse of the IPU conference. U.S. participation, in this manner, very likely gained much support for the United States from nonalined countries and encouraged further questioning of the role that Castro is playing in the nonalined movement.

Second, rebutting other criticism of and affirming U.S. principles and policies: Senator STAFFORD, Representative CROCKETT and Delegate WON PAT were present during debate including much criticism of U.S. policies in several areas. Senator STAFFORD confronted a barrage of Eastern bloc and Soviet propaganda that criticized U.S. arms policies, such as the neutron bomb, while welcoming Brezhnev arms control proposals, such as his proposed arms moratorium in Europe. He was able to counter prejudicial allegations on these issues and on Mideast issues as well. Moreover, he was able to challenge the Soviet Union and its friends to pick up on peace opportunities available such as those regarding Afghanistan and Kampuchea. Similarly U.S. delegates CROCKETT and WON PAT enunciated U.S. principles, accomplishments, and policies of human rights and energy.

Third, eliminating references in resolutions prejudiced against the United States: Through action by Representative DANIELSON and myself, many references critical of U.S. policies were eliminated from draft resolutions. For example, an original draft resolution contained criticism of U.S. military assistance to the Duarte government in El Salvador. Drafting committee efforts by Representative DANIELSON were important to accomplish deletions of these references and prevent one-sided criticism of the Duarte government for human rights violations in El Salvador.

In one session, I was confronted with proposed resolution language that represented one-sided criticism of the Reagan administration decision to develop and deploy enhanced radiation weapons—neutron bomb. Despite concerted efforts by the U.S.S.R., Eastern bloc and Cuban delegations, no reference to neutron bombs is contained in any final documents to the conference.

As Members will notice when they read the final report our delegation will issue in print shortly, any of the resolutions adopted by the Havana IPU meeting contain provisions that we, as Representatives of the American people, could not accept. On the other hand, some results of the meeting offer useful encouragement for parliaments and governments to direct their efforts toward practical and productive activity—such as in the areas of arms control, the strengthening of parliamentary government, and in dealing with energy challenges. In one resolution on parliamentary relations with governments, the IPU has unanimously agreed on supporting an approach that urges and I quote:

> All states to establish and unconditionally guarantee fundamental human freedoms and, in particular, to defend freedom of assembly and association within the framework of periodic elections, the will of the voters and their right to freedom of speech and opinion, freedom of expression—particularly in parliaments—and the free reporting of parliamentary proceedings; and calls on parliaments to watch over the exercise of their prerogatives.

As we consider the situation in Poland and the various threats to parliamentary democracy throughout the world, and as we consider how much other parliamentary systems fail to show the strength of our own, it is important that some international organization point the finger directly at what should be our fundamental role and concern. Sadly in many places in the world, the expressions of high purpose that come from meetings such as the IPU are not followed by actions in fact. Freedom of assembly, regular elections, freedom of speech and opinion are regrettably not as fully respected elsewhere as in the United States, and we should do what we can to extend these rights. The IPU has made a contribution toward this objective, ironically even in Cuba.

It was a distinct honor for me to serve as chairman of the delegation to the IPU meeting last fall and an honor and pleasure to work together with other Members of the House in a situation that was not always comfortable or pleasant.●

INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION LEAGUE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. DANIELSON) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) was kind enough to take a special order to report to the House of Representatives on our activities last fall at the Interparliamentary Union League in Havana, Cuba. It was to say the very least a rollicking experience.

The structure of that particular conference—I have gone to more than one of these—had some departure from the norm in that the presiding officers and the like were all people adherent of the Eastern or Communist bloc, and those of us with differing points of view had some rather interesting parliamentary situations in making our voices heard.

I want to state that the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) and I were the only two who finally went to Havana. Apparently there were some there on an earlier week but for the final sessions Mr. DERWINSKI and I were there alone, and I understand some of our colleagues felt that the political implications of visiting Cuba were rather strong meat and they did not choose to have that in a year before an election.

We had a great time and Mr. DERWINSKI was a magnificent leader of our two-person delegation. We took them on from wherever they came, always from the left, but we took them on wherever they were, and I think we did an excellent job of making the point of view of the free world heard. We pointed out the difficulty of free debate when the cards were obviously stacked against you.

The interesting thing was that before that meeting was over we began to find a little bit of support out of such diverse places as the newer African republics who themselves thought it was a pretty good idea to be able to speak up freely.

I am pleased to report that our brethren from the British Commonwealth, those from the British Isles themselves, from England, our good friends from Canada on the north and those wonderful Aussies from down in Australia did line up with us and I can tell you that although we were outvoted from time to time, in fact quite often, our voices were heard and they did not run over us. They thought they had run over a patch of brambles.

It was a pleasure for me to serve with ED DERWINSKI in that meeting. He deserves great credit for supporting the principles of the United States of America. I am looking forward to that kind of battle any time it comes along.

RESCISSION OF PATIENT PACKAGE INSERTS RULE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. ROGERS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, during the congressional recess, the Reagan administration took a major step toward preserving stability in the price that consumers pay for prescription drugs. I am referring to the recent decision by Health and Human Services Secretary Richard Schweiker to rescind a regulation called patient package inserts.

This regulatory program developed by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) would have required extensive and highly technical information leaflets for more than 400 different drug products. Industry sources estimate that the PPI regulations would easily cost more than $100 million annually and could eventually exceed $1 billion if FDA were to expand the rule and require these leaflets for all drugs that are on the market.

While the Congress is certainly in favor of consumer information, it is my belief that Secretary Schweiker has made the correct decision. His decision to rescind the patient package insert rule does not mean that the Federal Government is denying consumers access to important drug information. On the contrary, withdrawal of the regulation will mean that drug manufacturers, pharmacists, physicians, and other health care professions will have the freedom to fashion cost-effective voluntary informational programs for the general public—ones that will give the public needed information without prohibitive costs.

According to the National Association of Chain Drug Stores, Inc. (NACDS), a strong opponent to the so-called PPI scheme from its inception, and the Begley Drug Co., which is headquartered in my congressional district, FDA's regulation would have short changed consumers by limiting their access to drug information primarily to one source; namely the agency's leaflets. Such a result, in my opinion, would not be in the best interest of consumers and would not be a sensible approach to take in these times of growing consumer interest in health care matters. Rather than limiting the dissemination of drug information to leaflets by regulation, we should be encouraging innovation in the competitive marketplace. I have reviewed public testimony of the NACDS that was recently presented at public hearings held by FDA Commissioner Hayes on this issue and I am very encouraged by the number of different informational activities that are already in place in chain pharmacies. It would be my guess that we will see more of these voluntary programs from community pharmacies and the industry in the future simply because this rigid rule will be abandoned.

Of equal importance to the Congress is that the proposed rescission of the PPI regulation will also mean considerable cost savings to private paying customers who purchase their medications out of pocket and savings to State medicaid programs which provide drugs to needy recipients. The drug leaflets would have added significant costs to medicaid at a time when the Congress is attempting to bring back into control the skyrocketing cost of important programs like medicaid and medicare.

In conclusion, I urge my colleagues in the House to join with me in applauding the President, Vice President BUSH, Secretary Schweiker and Commissioner Hayes for making a tough but right decision on the PPI rule. I am confident that the consumer will enjoy the benefits of this decision both in terms of the price of the medication which will not be inflated by unnecessary regulation and by the fact that drug information will now be available from a wide range of sources in the marketplace. And I call on the community pharmacies and the industry to implement their voluntary programs to provide consumers with adequate information on drugs.

VIOLENCE IN SPORTS

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, maybe it is because I grew up in southern California and I am not a hockey aficionado, but I do have difficulty understanding the place of violence in that sport. While I did have the opportunity to grow up enjoying football, playing football and knowing what controlled violence is on a sports field, something that occurred in the last couple weeks has bothered me a tremendous amount. My concern is greatest, as a father of small children who watch television and have very impressionable minds as they watch professional sports.

In the last week it is alleged that a member of a professional hockey team was ordered by his coach to leave the bench and engage in a fight. The story suggests that when he refused to do so he found that he was shipped out by that team and his waivers were not picked up by anybody in the league. Unfortunately, the suggestion appears to be that if you are not willing to make it a blood and guts gory battle on the ice, they do not want you in the NHL.

Mr. Speaker, I have not been one of those who has joined some Members in this House in supporting Federal legislation dealing with violence in professional sports because I do not think that ought to be our legislative concern. However, the events of last week made it more difficult for me to continue in that position.

If professional sports in this country want to go back to the days where they were sponsored by the local automobile dealer, and they want to play on back lots or rinks with a couple of hundred people watching them, where barely any kids are going to see them, fine. Then let them go by their rules as long as they do not violate the criminal statutes of the jurisdictions in which they find themselves.

But if professional sports are going to continue to occupy a privileged position in this society; if they are going to be on national television, if every youngster is going to be told in America he should look up to sports figures as idols, if every youngster in America is going to have an opportunity to collect pictures of his favorite players, to go out and see them and to emulate them; if we hold them up in society as models, if national television is going to continue to expose these sports, then I think professional sports in this society has an obligation to police their own. But is this being done?

One of the problems that I noticed several years ago while watching professional football, for instance, was the fact that some of the commentators seem to delight whenever there would be a violation of the rules that was not caught. You might remember the scene of a wide receiver going down the field when he was not thrown the ball, and a defensive back with some vengeance trying to clothes line him; or you may recall when a player wrote a book called "The Assassin," talking about the greatness of violence in professional sports outside the regularized rules.

But at least I think we have seen some improvement in that area. I think the National Football League has responded to some complaints of the citizens. If you watch the broadcasts now I do not think you see the expressions of delight being made by those commentators when they see isolated acts of violence outside the rules.

I think we ought to be assured as members of this society that an institution such as the National Hockey League is going to take action to stop the seeming tremendous avocation of violence outside the rules before it overtakes hockey.

I am not a hockey expert. Yet I do recall a few years ago joining in the feelings of patriotism that most Americans had when the U.S. amateur Olympic team beat the Russians. We enjoyed that because of the fact that we had amateurs representing our country beating what was a professional team of Russians. But in addition to that, I think we enjoyed it because it was hockey as a sport. There was skill involved and exhibited. There was no dedication to violence and it became an enjoyable pasttime for people to enjoy. It was not something of grade B TV stuff where you watch sluggers rather than players who practice their profession with some skill.

My thought to the NHL and some of the people in it is, if you want to have or be fighters, we have professional boxing in most States of the Union. If you want to fight, put your gloves on, follow the rules, and be judged accordingly.

I suspect most of the fighters in the NHL would not make very good boxers. If you have watched their form they really do not seem to do a whole lot. But in fact, there seems to be a persuasive attitude of violence that is increasing. And we ought to speak out against it.

As a Member of Congress who does not believe that we ought to take Federal jurisdiction in this, I am taking advantage of the opportunity I have to speak before this audience and to my fellow Members as an expression of concern. But I do think it is a concern that ought not to go unnoticed. It is a concern that is real. Frankly, I think those who have those positions of authority in the National Hockey League ought to remember that there is legislation that has been introduced with a number of cosponsor that would create Federal jurisdiction of a criminal nature for violence in professional sports.

That being the case, I think they ought to look to clean up their own house before others outside their house make an effort to do it for them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. LUNGREN) is recognized for 15 minutes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my special order follow the special order of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) in today's RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

FIGHT RECESSION NOW

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. REUSS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, I include an article by myself and James K. Galbraith, executive director of the Joint Economic Committee, which appeared in the Washington Post on January 12, 1982.

FIGHT RECESSION NOW

With the predictable failure of the "supply-side miracle" to materialize following the passage of the Reagan tax and spending cuts, the administration has focused its vision resolutely on the distant future. Its spokesmen ready huge new budget cuts for fiscal 1983, which doesn't begin for nine more months. For 1984, the president will permit no tax increases, though perhaps a little "revenue enhancement." And the recovery promised by the Reagan "Economic Recovery Program" recedes every day like a desert mirage.

Meanwhile no one seems concerned about our immediate problems: today's recession and 8.9 percent unemployment. Almost everyone seems to have taken on faith the word of the consensus forecasters that by mid-1982 natural forces—lower interest rates, pent-up demand for autos and housing, lower inventories—will combine inexorably with the July 1982 tax cuts and with the arms buildup to end the recession and generate economic recovery. Unfortunately, these are the self-same soothsayers who a year ago were predicting that natural forces would forestall a deep recession in the second half of 1981.

Before concluding that we shall be out of the woods by July, we should take note of what administration economic policy is currently up to. Perversely, in the face of recession, macroeconomic policy—taxes, spending and money—is being tightened by fine tuning the wrong way:

TAXES

Social Security payroll taxes rose again on Jan. 1. This was on top of a rise in the Social Security tax rate on Jan. 1, 1981, that more than offset the Oct. 1, 1981, reduction in personal income tax rates for most low- and moderate-income taxpayers. Further, while we wait for the 10 percent tax cut scheduled for July 1, 1982, inflation continues to push workers into higher withholding brackets and so erode real disposable incomes. At the same time, state and local taxes are going up everywhere as these governments struggle to cope with cuts in federal aid that strike at the heart of their ability to deliver vital services.

SPENDING

Last year vast social spending cuts were proposed and adopted on the economic assumption that the economy would shortly boom. Instead of a boom, we now have a brutal recession. Yet, drastic new spending cuts are now proposed.

MONEY

Monetary policy in 1981 was plenty tight. The growth rate of M1B, the most commonly used monetary aggregate (cash plus checking accounts) has been held tightly to the bottom of its target. Yet the administration is sticking to its February 1981 instruction that the Federal Reserve cut the targets for 1982 even further, and the Federal Reserve seems predisposed to comply. The result could be a floor rate of growth for new money in 1982 of only 2.5 percent. This is consistent with no economic recovery in 1982 or, if a recovery occurs, with a rapid return to excruciatingly high interest rates.

Thus the administration's fiscal and monetary policies are combining in the short run to work against any natural forces for recovery. Before next July, when fiscal policy will become more stimulative, a bad situation could become intractable. There is simply no guarantee that this recession won't end up on long-term stagnation, or even in a depression.

What is the solution? Clearly, we don't need a return to fiscal folly or monetary madness, like Richard Nixon's go-for-broke reelection boom of 1971–72. But we equally clearly don't need to compound our recession into depression by restrictive policies as in 1929–33 or 1937. To avoid repeating these fiascos, we should promptly and moderately change course.

TAXES

We should advance the effective date of the July 1, 1982 personal tax reduction to Jan. 1, 1982, and so get the demand stimulus that we need when we need it: right now. At the same time, we should foster a more rapid return to budget balance later by deferring indefinitely the tax cut scheduled for July 1, 1983. Under present law, this cut will occur, by the administration's own forecasts, at exactly the moment when recession will have been replaced by growth and further stimulus could be most dangerously inflationary.

SPENDING

We should hold the line on spending at the real levels of fiscal 1982 just enacted by Congress. Further cuts at this time would mean a deeper recession, aggravated unemployment and personal suffering and social strife. Maintaining spending, furthermore, by promoting economic growth, would ultimately shrink the deficit. Revenues would increase, and unemployment-related expenditures decline. A few weeks ago the administration manipulated upward its forecasts of economic growth so as to bring its forecasted deficits down from politically catastrophic levels. If reducing deficits by increasing growth is worth doing on paper, why not do it for real?

MONEY

The Federal Reserve should be told by the president not to tighten money any further this year. A hold-the-line order on the 1982 monetary target ranges, coupled with an injunction to hit the upper half instead of the bottom of the target ranges, could help guarantee liveable levels of interest rates and so permit economic recovery to begin.

But if we now change fiscal and monetary policy from restrictive to neutral, what about inflation? Clearly, if we reject the notion of beating inflation through recession as a costly and ineffective chimera, then we must come up with a better solution. There is one: growth plus a social contract between labor and government, based on negotiation and compromise rather than confrontation and struggle, in which labor trades wage moderation for social and political gains. Other countries, like little Austria, have proved that a social contract can achieve close to full employment with close to no inflation.●

SOVIET ADVENTURISM IN THE HORN OF AFRICA REGION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WILSON) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, in the recent past, one of the major areas of Soviet adventurism has been in the Horn of Africa region.

This strategic region forming the soft underbelly of the Persian Gulf region, controls access to the Red Sea and the Mediterranean from the Indian Ocean and constitutes the gateway to East Africa.

Soviet interest in this area dates back to 1971 in South Yemen which now has become the most secure satellite of the U.S.S.R. in the Third World and the only Marxist Arab state. Thereby, Moscow has acquired a naval and air base at Aden which is located at a few miles of the Beb el-Mandeb Straits. While the Soviet Somali adventure did not end well—the Soviets had to leave Somalia in 1978. In 1977, the Soviet Union acquired substantial influence over the most powerful country in the region: the Ethiopian Empire. Today the Soviets control all of the Horn except Somalia and Djibouti. They are building an air and naval base at the Dahlok archipelago off the coast of Eritrea and are exploiting Ethiopia as a rearward base to undermine General Nimiery's regime in the Sudan which is also menaced by Libya. In August 1981, the tripartite pact between Libya, South Yemen, and Ethiopia brought Libyan development funds and terrorist knowhow to Ethiopia against Somalia and Djibouti.

The relative Soviet success was achieved in part by Cuban troops, by East German advisers to the secret police and by Soviet advisers attached to the civilian and military authorities in Ethiopia. The Soviet presence must be effectively counterbalanced and contained. The invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union caused the Carter administration to initiate the first measures of containment by signing the August 1980 agreement with Somalia, Kenya, and the Sultanate of Oman for air and naval facilities for our nascent RDF.

Our policy took a low-key approach in the case of Somalia: $40 million in FMS was promised for 2 years as well as some economic support funds which is too little to make an appreciable difference and too much as not to arouse Ethiopian fears. The latter was caused by the ongoing guerrilla struggle in the Ogaden province, an area administered by Ethiopia since 1948 after a short British administration. The province was reconquered by Cuban troops, in 1978 in a war lasting over 1 year, from the local Somalis and Somali army which came to their support. Our aid to Somalia was only increased marginally in fiscal year 1982.

At the present, the Reagan administration continues to increase aid slightly, but it has not yet defined an effective containment policy in the Horn region. It is for this reason that I, with 63 of my colleagues, wrote to Secretary of State Alexander M. Haig, Jr., on October 20, 1981, asking for higher levels of aid and closer strategic relations with Somalia. We have received a generally positive response from Richard Fairbanks, Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations on December 15, 1981. May I ask for unanimous consent to insert into the RECORD the two letters and an appropriate Op-Ed page article by Z. Michael Szaz, Ph. D., which appeared in the September 28, 1981, issue of the New York Times and the international Herald Tribune? Dr. Szaz is studies program director of the American Foreign Policy Institute and former associate professor of international law and relations at Seton Hall and Troy State Universities.

Also, I would like to reiterate my major concerns which are shared by many of my colleagues and to propose appropriate measures to effect a containment and progressive challenge to the Soviet, Cuban, and East German presence in this region.

We must provide the necessary military and economic assistance to our friends in the region; that is, to the Sudan and Somalia. The administration performed effectively in the case of the Sudan and we have reason to believe that the crisis in the Sudan is over. The same consideration in terms of extending accelerated and substantial arms deliveries and providing economic support funds has yet to be applied to Somalia.

The Somali Army, which lost half of its mechanized equipment in the Ogaden war and remains exposed to repeated air attacks by Ethiopia in the bordering areas that include most of the refugee camps, needs large-scale assistance in order to provide a credible defense against Cuban and Ethiopian forces poised at the border. Our defense experts estimate that it would take about $500 million during a 5-year period to retrain and re-equip the Somali forces. While budgetary reasons may prevent us from supplying the entire amount, we must provide at least the technology-intensive items and must work closely with the Somali military command. We believe that Saudi Arabia might provide financing for the remainder of the equipment and that Egypt would help with Somali procurement. Nevertheless even this limited contribution would cost more than what the present FMS levels have appropriated or planned for Somalia.

We must also increase our ESF and development assistance. Without finding some employment for the refugees, we will perpetuate an unproductive camp life for them and create another Palestinian problem. While the administration and Congress were more generous with refugee aid and development assistance—$30 million ESF was appropriated in fiscal year 1982—the effort must be expanded in fiscal year 1983 and fiscal year 1984 if we want the survival of a stable, pro-Western Somalia.

In the past, there were two guiding examples for large-scale refugee problems. One example was the German case where approximately 12 million refugees and expellees were dumped into West Germany between 1945–47. By 1952, they were absorbed into the national economy and provided with the manpower and many of the skills and comparable to the German "economic wonder." This would have been, of course, impossible, without the Marshall plan which provided the impetus to accelerated economic development and political stabilization.

The other example is that of the Palestinian refugees on the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, and southern Lebanon. Generations were brought up in the camps since 1948, with little productive experience and low self-esteem, providing the manpower for the terrorist activities of the PLO in order to arouse international public opinion about their plight and lack of self-determination.

It is up to us which direction the Somali refugees will have to take. For the sake of justice and peace as well as our national interest, I hope that the administration will choose adequate assistance so that the Somali economy may develop substantially and that political stability may be preserved in Somalia.

Only by strengthening the Sudan and Somalia will the Soviets and their allies be contained in the Horn region and then, we can acquire secure access to their facilities. I trust the administration will move in this direction and hope both the administration and the House will divorce themselves of the commendable, but illusory notion that by not supporting Somalia we may regain Ethiopia as a Western ally.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., October 20, 1981.

Hon. ALEXANDER HAIG, Jr.,
Secretary of State, Department of State, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SECRETARY HAIG: We, the undersigned members of the U.S. House of Representatives, would like to call your attention to our continuing important interests in Somalia and to recent developments which threaten the peace and stability of the Horn region in Africa.

Particularly, we refer to the August 1981 pact between Libya, Ethiopia and South Yemen, "the latter two Soviet surrogates whose military, economic and state security systems are controlled by Soviet and East German "advisors". In the case of Ethiopia, 17,000 Cuban mercenaries are also present. Especially, the Ethiopians remain on inimical terms with Somalia because of the past support Somalia extended to the indigenous national liberation movement of the Somalis in the Ogaden which is administered by Ethiopia. Ethiopian planes bombed repeatedly this year Somali villages and refugee camps.

In addition, both Ethiopia and South Yemen support the "National Salvation Front", a group of pro-Communist Somali exiles in Ethiopia which is trying to subvert the legitimate government of President Siad Barre of Somalia.

At the present, Ethiopia and the Cuban mercenaries have complete military superiority as the Ethiopian army has received $1.5 billion worth of military equipment from the U.S.S.R. in 1978 and continues to receive military aid from Moscow. Somalia lacks both fighter planes and anti-aircraft batteries.

Somalia is also threatened by the coming influx of Libyan money and terrorist know how which will be directed against its government by the leaders of Libya and the Soviet surrogates in the Horn area.

We believe that the increased threats to Somalia must be answered by a clear American commitment to our Somali allies in the political, military and economic fields.

May we suggest that the Department of State take any measures necessary to communicate this commitment both to the Somali government and to our regional adversaries and the Soviet Union and that we accelerate our various economic and military programs to Somalia, including the early delivery of the anti-aircraft batteries contracted for by Somalia.

We also call upon the Administration to reevaluate our present aid programs, military and economic, to Somalia in the light of the recent developments in the region, especially the tragic assassination of President Anwar Sadat of Egypt, and submit concrete proposals for enhancing the security and stability of Somalia which is providing us with air and naval facilities badly needed by our RDF.

With every good wish, we are Very sincerely yours,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., December 10, 1981.

Hon. CHARLES WILSON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. WILSON: The Secretary has asked me to respond to the letter dated October 20, 1981, from you and several of your Congressional colleagues expressing your views regarding U.S. Government assistance programs for Somalia. As you suggest, the current political climate, especially the August Ethiopia-Libya-South Yemen Tripartite Agreement, warrants our increased attention to developments in the region. The Administration is keenly aware of these and other potential threats to Somalia, a country whose friendship we value both for political and strategic reasons.

You may recall that acknowledgment of Somalia's important geographical location in the Horn of Africa and the Somali Government's willingness to promote a cooperative relationship with us led to the negotiation of an agreement with the Somalis last year which allows us access to Somali air and naval facilities, thereby increasing our ability to respond to Soviet challenges in the Southwest Asian area. Although we have not linked specific amounts of military or economic assistance to that agreement, we have expressed a clear interest in Somalia's territorial integrity, security and economic development. In this connection we initiated a Foreign Military Sales relationship with Somalia and the Congress approved a request to provide a total of $40 million in FMS credits to Somalia for fiscal years 1980 and 1981. This Administration's fiscal year 1982 budget proposal includes another $20 million in FMS credits for Somalia.

In recognition of Somalia's critical air defense needs, we concurred in Somalia's request to use the FMS credits for early warning radars and air defense guns. The Somalis have recently revised their request in favor of more urgently needed transportation, communications and engineering equipment. We are reevaluating Somali needs in an effort to be responsive as quickly as possible.

Moreover, we have recently scheduled more frequent U.S. Navy calls at Somalia ports, established an Office of Military Cooperation in Mogadishu and included Somalia in the RDF exercise "Bright Star." These steps convey clear signals that we are committed to friendship with Somalia.

The military relationship is only one aspect of our growing assistance ties with Somalia. We believe that the U.S. also has a humanitarian and development role to play in providing assistance to lessen Somalia's refugee burden and assisting the country in realizing its economic potential, particularly in agriculture, which is vital to the country's future stability. Towards these ends, the U.S. Government has been the most substantial contributor in response to a UNHCR appeal for Somali refugee relief, providing about $45.5 million in food and non-food assistance in 1981. In addition, the Administration's FY 1982 budget proposal includes $36.2 million designated for development assistance in Somalia.

The Department greatly appreciates your interest and support for our efforts to assist Somalia.

Yours sincerely,
RICHARD FAIRBANKS,
Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations.●

LOCAL FLEXIBILITY FOR PUBLIC HOUSING OPERATING ASSISTANCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill that would provide public housing authorities greater flexibility in the use of Federal funds that are allocated to them for various purposes. It is no secret that most public housing authorities throughout the country, both large and small, are in serious financial difficulties because of the very high rate of inflation, the astronomical increases in utility costs, the large number of very-low-income people residing in public housing units, and the administration's efforts to curtail the Federal Government's operating subsidies for public housing authorities.

The public housing authority in my city, the Chicago Housing Authority, is probably the most vivid example of the financial difficulties that public housing authorities find themselves in today. We have one of the largest authorities in the country with the most difficult financial and social problems of any public housing authority. Past management difficulties and legal problems have put our authority in a situation that causes the authority to live from month-to-month on the verge of financial bankruptcy. Without any changes in the existing law, the Chicago Housing Authority could very well close up shop within the next few months.

What I believe needs to be done in my city at this time is not to provide additional Federal funds for the development of new public housing authority units, but to preserve the huge Federal investment already made in public housing units in Chicago. My constituents find it almost impossible to understand the fact that the Federal Government is willing to provide new funding for additional units while at the same time unable to provide funds to maintain an adequate and decent living situation for its current tenants.

My bill would give a local public housing agency the authority to decide for itself whether to use the public housing development funds for its own operational needs or to build new units. In addition, it would provide that the authority could use those development funds that are already in the pipeline for its operational needs rather than for new units that are in the planning stage.

With a Federal investment of almost $33 billion in public housing units, it seems to me that at this time of curtailment of Federal social programs, it is in the best interest of the taxpayers and the tenants in public housing to manage, upgrade, and modernize the existing facilities rather than build new ones. We have a crying need in this country for reinvestment in the public infrastructure of both the Federal and local government, and I believe that my bill begins to address this great need.●

NATIONAL SPACE POLICY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BROOKS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to include extraneous material.

Mr. Speaker, on a recent trip to Texas I had the pleasure of visiting the Lyndon B. Johnson Space Center in Houston. While I was there I met with several people from the Houston Section of the American Institute of Aeronautics and Astronautics. I was most favorably impressed by this group and found their proposal concerning our Nation's space policy to be meritorious and worthy of consideration. I am putting the AIAA policy statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the enlightenment of the Members:

NATIONAL SPACE POLICY: A PROPOSAL BY THE HOUSTON SECTION—AIAA

Historically, the United States has provided, to the benefit of the entire world, dynamic leadership in the discovery, development and application of new technology, through its natural resources and the imagination, innovation and vitality of its people. For the first time, this leadership is in danger of being assumed by others. Both the commercial and security implications are disturbing—and even unacceptable—to many informed Americans.

With the Space Shuttle, our nation has reached a threshold in space operations capability. We have within our grasp the opportunity to lay the foundation for space industrialization and utilization that can play a crucial role in the future economic, military and scientific strength of our country. A thrust in this direction is a logical continuation of our previous accomplishments. It utilizes our unparalleled experience and talents to provide a real investment in the future with unlimited opportunity and challenge for industry, defense and science to the benefit of the public, both domestic and foreign.

The industrialization of space over the next twenty years involves the assembly, deployment, routine servicing and maintenance of commercial space systems, many of which will be very large and complex. This, in turn, will require a significant expansion in our manned space operations capability for maximum utilization, cost effectiveness, and security. It is our view that our national space objectives would best be served with a national space operations system which includes the Space Shuttle; free-flying support platforms for science and applications payloads; a reusable orbit-to-orbit transfer vehicle for transporting unmanned and manned payloads between low earth and geosynchronous orbits; and a permanently manned operations center in low earth orbit. This operations center will be used to assemble and service space vehicles and systems, to conduct on-board experiment and development work, and to permit the progressive development of the engineering and operations capabilities to reduce dependence on ground support. This system will form a basic capability for employing space to provide for the security of the United States and to preserve peace in the world.

Toward these ends, in behalf of all Americans, the Houston Section of AIAA proposes a National Space Policy with which the United States can lead the world into a new industrial revolution. We ask for a bold commitment to a goal of placing a permanent manned operations center in low earth orbit and the operational deployment of space-based manned orbital transport spacecraft by 1990. In addition to the enormous direct economic benefits available from such a goal, the capability inherent in its achievement is a direct step toward mankind's twenty-first century vision of bold and vigorous exploration and utilization of space—our ultimate frontier.●

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 2 minutes p.m.), the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, February 4, at 11 a.m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

2962. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting his review of the proposed rescission and defer-

rals of budget authority contained in the message of the President dated November 10, 1981 (H. Doc. No. 97-106), pursuant to section 1014 (b) and (c) of Public Law 93-344 (H. Doc. No. 97-139); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2963. A letter from the Acting General Counsel, United States General Accounting Office, transmitting a report on the status of budget authority that was proposed for rescission, but for which Congress failed to pass a rescission bill; to the Committee on Appropriations.

2964. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Manpower, Reserve Affairs and Logistics), transmitting a report on the performance of Defense Department commercial and industrial-type functions, pursuant to section 502(c) of Public Law 96-342; to the Committee on Armed Services.

2965. A letter from the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense (Facilities, Environment, and Economic Adjustment), transmitting notice of the location, nature, and estimated cost of various construction projects proposed to be undertaken by the Army National Guard, pursuant to 10 U.S.C. 2233a(1); to the Committee on Armed Services.

2966. A letter from the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense (Facilities, Environment, and Economic Adjustment), transmitting notice of the location, nature, and estimated cost of various construction projects proposed to be undertaken by the Army Reserve, pursuant to 10 U.S.C. 2233a(1); to the Committee on Armed Services.

2967. A letter from the Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Air Force (Installations), transmitting a report on Air Force military construction contracts awarded without formal advertising during fiscal year 1981, pursuant to section 604 of Public Law 96-418; to the Committee on Armed Services.

2968. A letter from the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, transmitting an evaluation of the impact of the urban development action grant program; to the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

2969. A letter from the Secretary of the Army, transmitting a report on voluntary agreements entered into by the Army, pursuant to section 708(1) of the Defense Production Act of 1950 as amended; to the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

2970. A letter from the President and Chairman, Export-Import Bank of the United States, transmitting a report on loan, guarantee, and insurance transactions supported by Eximbank during August, September, and October 1981, to Communist countries; to the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

2971. A letter from the Comptroller, Washington Gas Light Co., transmitting the balance sheet of the company as of December 31, 1981, pursuant to section 8 of the act of March 4, 1913; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

2972. A letter from the Deputy Secretary of Energy, transmitting notice of a delay in submission of the annual report on coordination of Federal energy conservation standards for buildings, required by section 597 of Public Law 96-294; to the Committee on Energy and Commerce.

2973. A letter from the Administrator, Energy Information Administration, Department of Energy, transmitting the quarterly report for the period July through September 1981, on imports of crude oil, residual fuel oil, refined petroleum products, natural gas, and coal; reserves and production of crude oil, natural gas, and coal; refinery activities; and inventories; together with data on exploratory activity, exports, nuclear energy, and electric power, pursuant to section 11(c)(2) of the Energy Supply and Environmental Coordination Act of 1974, as amended; to the Committee on Energy and Commerce.

2974. A letter from the Vice President for Government Affairs, National Railroad Passenger Corporation, transmitting a report covering the month of August 1981, on the average number of passengers per day on board each train operated, and the ontime performance at the final destination of each train operated, by route and by railroad, pursuant to section 308(a)(2) of the Rail Passenger Service Act of 1970, as amended; to the Committee on Energy and Commerce.

2975. A letter from the Acting Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations, transmitting the proposed allocations to countries and international organizations of the economic support fund, military assistance program, international military education and training, and peacekeeping operations for fiscal year 1982, pursuant to section 653(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

2976. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations, transmitting notice of the State Department's intention to consent to a request by the Government of Korea for permission to transfer certain U.S.-origin military equipment to Korean private firms, pursuant to section 3(d) of the Arms Export Control Act; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

2977. A letter from the Acting Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations, transmitting notice of a delay in submission of the first annual report on the status of U.S. policy to encourage an international strategy to prevent production and trafficking in narcotics, pursuant to section 502(b) of Public Law 97-113; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

2978. A letter from the Assistant Legal Adviser for Treaty Affairs, Department of State, transmitting copies of international agreements, other than treaties, entered into by the United States, pursuant to 1 U.S.C. 112b(a); to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

2979. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of Housing and Urban Development for Administration, transmitting notice of a proposed new records system, pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 552a(o); to the Committee on Government Operations.

2980. A letter from the President, Phelps-Stokes Fund, transmitting the final financial report on the Ralph J. Bunche memorial project, pursuant to section 1(b) of Public Law 96-596; to the Committee on House Administration.

2982. A letter from the Acting Assistant Administrator, Office of Coastal Zone Management, National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, Department of Commerce, transmitting notice of the withdrawal of the final rules published July 8, 1981, by NOAA implementing the Federal consistency provisions of section 307(c)(1) of the Coastal Zone Management Act, pursuant to section 12 of Public Law 96-464; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

2983. EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

TAX BURDEN MUST BE EASED FOR CERTAIN FARMERS

HON. L. A. SKIP BAFALIS
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. BAFALIS. Mr. Speaker, the 1976 Tax Reform Act imposed an unintentional burden on citrus groves and other farms operated as a partnership. So, I have today introduced legislation to provide relief from that burden and to allow the individual partners of a farming partnership to continue their productive investment role, rather than forcing them to sell their interests either to larger agribusinesses or to commercial real estate developers.

The general practice of citrus grove and other farming partnerships is to use a cash method of accounting, as allowed by the code. However, section 447 of the code, provides that any farm partnership which includes a certain type of corporation as a partner must use an accrual method of accounting. Therefore, a partnership could be forced to convert from the cash to the accrual method if a corporate partner's gross receipts rise above a fixed statutory level, if a corporate partner loses its small business corporation status because of the death of a shareholder or an internal dispute, or if a corporate partner is no longer owned by a family because of the death of a family member. Such changes are beyond the influence of the individual partners, yet these individuals suffer the consequences of a change in method of accounting.

The conversion to an accrual method results in an acceleration of income and a deferral of deductions. This creates an added tax liability for each partner, distorts cash flow of the operation, and may make participation in the farm partnership no longer an economically worthwhile venture for individual partners. Consider the real possibility that the tax liability on a partner's accrual income will approach or exceed the actual cash that can be distributed if the farm is to remain in operation. This can cause the partners to force the partnership to sell its land to condominium or other developers in order to liquidate what has become an uneconomical investment. This is of great concern to us in Florida.

Even if the partnership does not sell its land, its partners are at a disadvantage with respect to farming partnerships that have no corporate partners. This is a form of unfair tax discrimination.

Whatever the merits of this penalty for what were thought to be shelter situations, the law had trapped those partnerships that were already in operation with a corporate partner when section 447 was enacted in 1976. The individual partners in such a situation are powerless to protect themselves from the adverse tax consequences of changes in the circumstances of an existing corporate partner. A partnership formed after the enactment of section 447 had fair warning of the potential consequences of taking on a corporate partner, but the partnership that was already in business had no such protection.

The bill that I propose today would rectify this situation. It provides a fair solution to a problem that inflation or death may bring upon citrus grove and other farm partnerships. Solely for those partnerships that were engaged in the trade or business of farming when section 447 was enacted and which at that time had a corporate partner that is no longer exempt, an election could be made to allow the individual partners to continue to report on the cash basis while the corporate partner reports on the accrual basis.

It is a common practice today for partnerships to keep their accounting records on a cash basis, thus recording income and expenses when received or paid during the year, and to make appropriate accrual adjustments at the end of the year. Farming operations generally will need only three such adjustments to produce accrual basis information for the corporate partner—first, recording yearend receivables, second, establishing the inventory value of both growing and unsold crops, and third, recording accrued and prepaid expenses and accounts payable.

Prompt action is essential because of the time for filing 1981 partnership returns and 1981 tax returns of the individual partners of April 15, 1982. Given the tax agenda last year, it was not possible to consider such a seemingly minor matter as this legislation in the context of the 1981 Economic Recovery Tax Act. However, that circumstance will also lead to a painful situation for those who are required to file 1981 returns on the accrual basis. The legislation rectifies the problem without disturbing any of the rationale underlying the enactment of section 447 of the Internal Revenue Code.

I invite the support of my colleagues on this legislation and ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

H.R. 5434

A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to allow certain partnerships to continue to report income on the cash method

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. DOUBLE METHOD OF ACCOUNTING

Section 447 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to method of accounting for corporations engaged in farming) is amended by adding after subsection (h) the following new subsection:

"(i) SPECIAL RULE FOR ELECTING PARTNERSHIPS—

"(1) ELIGIBILITY FOR ELECTION.—A partnership shall be permitted to make an election under this subsection only if—

"(A) on October 4, 1976, and at all times thereafter, the partnership was engaged in the trade of business of farming; and

"(B) subsection (a) would apply (but for this subsection) solely because a corporation which was a partner on October 4, 1976, and at that time was described in subsection (c), is no longer so described.

"(2) TIME FOR ELECTION.—A partnership must make the election under this subsection on or before the return date for the first taxable year of the partnership which begins on or after the end of the first taxable year of the corporate partner in which it is no longer described in section (c).

"(3) METHOD OF MAKING ELECTION.—A partnership shall make an election under this subsection using a method prescribed by the Secretary in regulations.

"(4) ELECTION.—A partnership may elect to compute its income under both the method specified in subsection (a) and the method used in the year preceding the year when subsection (a) became applicable. An electing partnership shall file returns reporting income under each method and shall keep such records as the Secretary may prescribe. If a partnership makes an election under this subsection—

"(A) A partner which is a corporation which is not described in subsection (c) shall report its distributive share of income and credits (including the distributive share of any section 481 adjustments resulting from a change in accounting method) based upon the partnership computation of income under the method specified in subsection (a), and

"(B) the remaining partners shall report their distributive shares of income and credits based upon the partnership computation of income under the method used in the year preceding the year when subsection (a) became applicable."

SEC. 2. EFFECTIVE DATE

The amendments made by this Act shall apply to taxable years ending after December 31, 1980.●

GEORGIA HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES URGES CONGRESS TO PASS LEGISLATION RELATIVE TO THE DEATH PENALTY

HON. LARRY P. McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, on January 22, 1982, the Georgia House of Representatives adopted a resolution urging the Congress of the United States to pass legislation providing for a sentence of death in a State court to be reviewed only once in the Federal judiciary by the U.S. Supreme Court on direct appeal from the highest appellate court of a State. This request is being made on behalf of the citizens of Georgia and in order for those States who have a death penalty to carry out such sentences without unnecessary delay due to the cumbersome and lengthy appellate procedures in the Federal courts. Such delays are not only costly to the taxpayers but are repugnant to the concept of swift and sure punishment.

The position taken by the Georgia House of Representatives is an example of positive thinking at the State level. We at the Federal level would do well to heed their call and act to limit the Federal Government, at all levels—executive, legislative, and judiciary—to those functions outlined by the Constitution and leave those matters reserved to the States to the States. As the Georgia House of Representatives resolution points out, perhaps the most flagrant example of Federal interference is the numerous obstacles that the Federal judiciary has imposed on the States in the area of criminal justice.

I commend the resolution and the proposal of the Georgia House of Representatives to the full consideration and careful attention of my colleagues:

A RESOLUTION

Urging Congress to pass certain legislation relative to the death penalty; and for other purposes.

Whereas, the greatest concern to the citizens of this state is the dramatic increase in violent crime; and

Whereas, the people do not understand why the death penalty is not enforced in the same manner as other laws and punishment; and

Whereas, the complex legal system, especially involving the federal courts, is being used to delay the carrying out of death penalties; and

Whereas, the State of Georgia has 91 offenders on Death Row, some of whom have been under a sentence of death for over eight years; and

Whereas, the appeals procedure is very expensive for Georgia's taxpayers and time consuming for the Attorney General's office which is required to represent the state in all postconviction proceedings; and

Whereas, at any given time seven attorneys in the Attorney General's office are working on death penalty litigation at an annual cost of $280,000.00 to the taxpayers of this state; and

Whereas, the State of Georgia has adopted a unified motion for review procedure in cases where the sentence of death has been imposed; however, such unified procedure is virtually meaningless with the cumbersome and lengthy appellate procedures in the federal courts. Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the House of Representatives that the members of this body do hereby urge the Congress of the United States to pass legislation providing for a sentence of death in a state court to be reviewed only once in the federal judiciary by the United States Supreme Court on direct appeal from the highest appellate court of a state.

Be it further resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives is authorized and directed to transmit appropriate copies of this resolution to each member of the Georgia Congressional Delegation.●

ABOLISH THE SYNTHETIC FUELS CORPORATION

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I have joined with six of my colleagues in introducing legislation to abolish the very symbol of corporate welfare: the Synthetic Fuels Corporation.

The existence of the Synthetic Fuels Corporation today only confirms the most cynical view of the Federal Government. For while we make low- and middle-income Americans suffer increasing hardship in the name of economic recovery, we give out billions of dollars in loan guarantees to Exxon and Texaco, among America's richest corporations—billions for uneconomic ventures that the private sector will not finance.

The administration wants to virtually eliminate programs to promote energy conservation and the use of renewable resources. It wants to eliminate energy aid for the poor, the elderly, and for schools and hospitals. It does all this in the name of "letting the marketplace work its magic." Yet the administration is willing to endorse almost $15 billion in loan guarantees for wealthy corporations.

I supported the Energy Security Act of 1980, the legislation creating the Synthetic Fuels Corporation. I did so because the legislation offered a variety of energy initiatives, all too important to be sacrificed because of one bad provision. The bill was, in fact, a political package. It was designed to insure a broad response to the energy crisis, as well as insure its own passage. Provisions included:

Creation of the Solar and Conservation Bank, to provide money for individuals to make energy saving investments in their homes.

Support for alcohol fuels projects, to help create renewable sources of liquid fuels.

A municipal waste to energy program.

A requirement that 25 percent of the windfall profit tax be used to provide relief from high energy prices for low income and elderly Americans.

A variety of programs to increase the Nation's energy efficiency.

The Reagan administration has gutted every one of these initiatives, either by cutting their budgets or blithely refusing to administer the programs.

In the wake of the Reagan attack on what was once a balanced energy program, all that is left standing is a multibillion dollar Chrysler-type bailout of the nuclear industry, and billions in subsidies for oil and gas companies. The Synthetic Fuels Corporation is one of those subsidies, one of many.

We have not been able to stop the Reagan "Robin Hood in reverse" policy of taking from the poor and middle income and giving to the rich. The President proved that last year during votes on both the budget and the tax bill. But we can try to slow that massive, distorted redistribution of income just a bit.

If we cannot afford to feed all of our children properly, if we cannot afford to keep all of our people warm in winter, if we cannot afford to provide proper education and health care to all Americans, then we cannot afford to force the American taxpayer to bankroll our richest corporations.

We cannot afford the Synthetic Fuels Corporation.●

SPECIAL TAX DEDUCTION FOR CONGRESS—REPEAL

HON. ROBIN L. BEARD

OF TENNESSEE

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. BEARD. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to repeal, totally, the special tax deductions that Congress voted itself just before the Christmas holiday recess. I believe very strongly that this action was deceptive, self-serving, and unwise. It was an insult to the American people and a stain on the honor of this body; we would do well to repeal that action as soon as possible.

My complaint is with both the substance and the procedure of the special tax deduction action.

Substantively, the action was nothing less than a indirect pay raise. Under the regulations issued by the Treasury Department to implement the new law many of our colleagues may have little if any tax to pay. In other words, Congress has voted itself into virtually a tax-exempt status. That is an insult to every American who has to suffer under the burden of the Federal tax bite every year, a tax bite that I might emphasize is so burdensome because of the spending habits of this very body.

Rewarding this Congress with a pay raise at a time when the Nation's economy is reeling from the effects of literally years of reckless economic policy is arrogant and insensitive. It was the Congress that spent this country into fiscal ruin, with massive increases year after year in Federal spending. This uncontrolled spending has caused runaway inflation, sky-high interest rates, and now the inevitable result: high unemployment.

Procedurally, the action was done in ways that were confusing at best, downright deceptive at worst. When the tax break bill came through the House, it was not voted upon on the record but was passed without a recorded vote when many Members were away from the floor. The whole process took about 30 seconds.

The next day the Senate submerged the tax bill into a vitally needed piece of legislation to restore the black lung trust fund to solvency. When the new combined bill came back to the House we were not given the opportunity for a separate vote or a full debate, only one up-or-down, take-it-or-leave-it vote on the black lung and congressional tax deduction provisions together. Votes on bills as important as Members' own compensation should be taken separately and in the open.

Therefore, in addition to this bill to repeal the tax breaks, I am jointly introducing a separate piece of legislation along with my colleague, BILL GOODLING of Pennsylvania, that is designed to prevent this type of legislative chicanery in the future. This is a House resolution that will change the legislative rules of procedure of this body to require that from now on any bill that affects the pay or benefits of House members as a separate and distinct group must be voted upon separate from any other piece of legislation and that the vote on such a bill must be recorded. Under these new legislative procedure rules passing pay raises for Members, whether indirect or direct, must be done out in the open and on the record.

The people have a right to know what their Congress is doing. One of the greatest problems this democracy—or any democracy—faces is a loss of faith in the elected institutions that govern the Nation. We as an elected body have no greater duty than to keep faith with those who sent us here.

I have announced earlier and I reiterate today that should this body fail to pass the repeal legislation I am introducing, I will not accept the tax breaks that were passed last December.

I also include for the record the text of the bill to repeal the tax breaks and the text of the resolution to change the House rules to require a separate and recorded vote on any bill affecting Members' compensation.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE BILL

That the allowability of any deduction under the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 for living expenses of Members of Congress (including any Delegate and Resident Commissioner) shall be determined under the law as in effect on December 31, 1980, and without regard to any law enacted after such date.

THE RESOLUTION

That rule VIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new clauses:

"4. The yeas and nays shall be considered as ordered when the Speaker puts the question upon final passage or adoption, as the case may be, of any bill or resolution that would economically affect Members of Congress or Members of the House of Representatives as a separate and distinct class.

"5. It shall not be in order in the House to consider any bill or resolution which would be subject to clause 4 unless the bill or resolution is comprised solely of items which would economically affect Members of Congress or Members of the House of Representatives as a separate and distinct class.".●

TRIBUTE TO DICK BOLLING

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

Thursday, January 28, 1982

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join my colleagues in honoring one of our most illustrious colleagues, DICK BOLLING. When the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee retires to private life at the end of 1982, the House of Representatives will lose one of its most intelligent, knowledgeable, and courageous leaders.

I will personally miss his presence here as a friend, a confidant, and a colleague who always speaks his mind and never swerves from principle. When DICK BOLLING and I came to Congress together in 1949, he set out to learn the workings of the committees and House procedures, and in the process became a master legislative strategist. I knew right from the start that my classmate—this blunt Missourian with great intellect and integrity—would become an effective legislator, but I did not know then the tremendous impact he would have on this institution. For the past three decades, he has been the pulse of the House of Representatives, as a champion of programs which carried our country toward greater social justice and of reforms which set Congress on the road to greater accountability to the public.

Working tirelessly at the right hand of Speaker Sam Rayburn, DICK BOLLING started in the early 1950's building a congressional coalition that would yield the landmark civil rights legislation of the 1950's and 1960's as well as the Great Society programs of President Johnson's administration. He has always viewed his job as Congressman from Missouri as a way to transform dreams into reality for millions of Americans who lack equal job opportunities, decent housing, basic nutrition and health care, and old age security. It was my privilege to work with DICK BOLLING through many of the tough legislative battles, many of which we won because of his diligence and persistence.

In the early 1970's, his vision and expertise moved the Congress to become more responsive to the growing public pressure for fiscal restraint by the Federal Government. The 1974 Budget Reform Act, which he crafted, has done more than any other reform to shape the way the House addresses national policy today. DICK BOLLING knew the tremendous impact of this act when he stated: "Congress needed to balance its love of Federal spending with its distaste for levying taxes." Once again, my friend from Missouri was setting the tone for congressional action in the decade ahead.

DICK BOLLING'S ideas, as an author of two books about the House, as a Congressman and as a leader of his party, have become a part of the Congress and will remain so for decades to come. He has dedicated his professional life to improving this institution's service to the American people and its contributions to our democracy.

I'm certain that whatever he chooses to do in his return to private life, he will find fulfillment, because of his tremendous energy and enthusiasm.

He deserves our best wishes. He's given us his best effort for 33 years.●

DON AUSMUS, INVENTOR OF THE YEAR

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, I call to the Members' attention the fact that on Sunday, February 7, 1982, Donald L. Ausmus, from Independence, Mo., in my congressional district, will be honored by Intellectual Property Owners, Inc., as the Inventor of the Year for 1981.

This award has been given for the last 10 years as a reminder of the fact that good old American know-how is the envy of the world. It is further evidence that our system of intellectual freedom and risk and reward fosters the development of innovations in every field.

Mr. Ausmus has invented a device which he calls the "Moto-stand" and which permits much greater freedom of movement for handicapped individuals. Those who, in the past, were confined to a wheelchair can now pursue gainful employment or hobbies in areas which were formerly out of reach to them.

This is a remarkable invention, remarkable not just because it is an ingenious device but also because it is the product of a remarkable man. Don Ausmus was an outstanding mechanic and a promising and competitive racer in cars and boats as well as motorcycles. In 1975, however, this career was cut short by a motocross racing accident that left him paralyzed from the shoulders down. It is to his credit that this is not the end of his story.

Don combined his unique skills as an innovative mechanic together with his knowledge of the needs of similarly situated handicapped individuals and developed the idea for a stable, motorized, two-wheeled working stand that contained a rechargeable battery. He then proceeded to build working prototypes in his basement for which he has now obtained a patent. With the help of the Advanced Technology Corp. of Kansas City, the product has been produced and marketed and is now available to the world.

Don's outstanding achievement attracted the attention of the Intellectual Property Owners, Inc., a nonprofit group of technologists and innovators, and they chose his work over all others to be honored for 1981, making him their Inventor of the Year.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to represent my fellow Missourian, Don Ausmus. He may be physically handicapped, but his courage and determination in the face of this setback has enabled him to overcome seemingly insurmountable obstacles and make contributions which benefit us all.●

UKRAINE

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, there is an old saying about the uses of adversity. Nowhere is this more evident than in the current crisis in Poland. While the civilized world deplores the Soviet-inspired violence and denial of human rights in Poland, it is clear that these recent events have at least reopened the eyes of the world as to the true nature of Soviet imperialism.

What is happening in Poland is simply another chapter of a long and tragic story in Eastern Europe. Part of that story of captivity and denial of human rights has taken place in Ukraine.

Let me quote the distinguished Lev E. Dobriansky of Georgetown University, whose reputation as a student of Soviet imperialism is internationally recognized. Recently he wrote:

> The independent Ukrainian National Republic, established on January 22, 1918 following the collapse of the Tsarist Russian Empire, was one of the first victims of Soviet Russian imperialism, which in a long series of conquests stalks today in Afghanistan. Like Poland's, the history of Ukraine's resistance to a more immediate Soviet Russian rule has been a long and heroic one. A vital point overlooked in current discussion is Moscow's deep fear of Solidarity's overspill into the Baltic states and Ukraine. For strikes and workers' demands for free unionism have also emerged in Estonia, Ukraine, and federated Russia. As scholars in the field maintain, had Ukraine remained free, Poland and others would not be unfree.

I think we should keep Professor Dobriansky's words in mind in the weeks and months ahead. A spirit is haunting Soviet-dominated Eastern Europe—the spirit of freedom. We should remember that what is happening in Poland is influencing all the neighboring captive nations. We should make this fact a part of our foreign policy considerations.●

SOLIDARITY DAY

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, this past Saturday, an enormous number of Americans took to the streets and proclaimed their allegiance with the principles of Solidarity. Their enthusiasm, their sincerity, and their steadfast support sent a message to our brothers and sisters in Poland, that we are united behind their effort to end the cycle of repression they have faced for centuries.

Solidarnosc, the Polish free trade union movement, represents more than an effort to establish a labor union. Solidarnosc, and its 10 million members, represent a love and loyalty for a country on the brink of economic and political upheaval. It is this love and loyalty that has fortified the spirit of the Polish people and helped them to face the threat of invasion, imprisonment, and martial law. Every American, regardless of ethnic background, can take great pride and solace in the courage shown by the men and women in Poland. We share their pain as they wage their mortal battles, and we look to share their happiness when their efforts are successful.

Lech Walesa and his fellow members of Solidarnosc have become international symbols of the struggle for freedom and dignity. Their fight for self-determination is a battle that must be won. As a movement of peace and hope for Poles, we free men applaud its effort and embrace its cause and encourage its strength.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the millions of Poles who strive for national unity and the right to seek their own destinies. I know that my colleagues join with me in true solidarity with their cause.●

WEST POINT AND MURDER ABORTION A NATIONAL DISGRACE

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I think that it is high time that this body gives serious consideration to what is happening to the soul of this Nation. Just before this past Christmas, Phyllis Schlafly completed a column on the fact of outright murder abortion at the most prestigious military academy in the free world. The former rollcall of honor and courage at West Point has become a national disgrace.

People are constantly reminded of genocide by cold blooded atheistic murderers who today attempt to extinct the Hmong tribes of Laos, and the Afghan peoples, even to the point of using poison gas. But more genocide is taking place right here in the United States. It is a known fact that in the past few years alone, we have murdered more innocents by abortion than have been lost in combat in all our wars combined. That is heinous enough.

But now we see the policy instituted and practiced at West Point, the Military Academy for future combat leaders, where female cadets can leave for a weekend, have an abortion, and return to full duty status. Should they choose to have the child, they may take leave time, return to full duty status—so long as they relinquish custody or legal responsibility for the child. This is the most disgraceful episode in the annals of military history.

If this national disgrace is to cease, and we cannot call it anything but a national disgrace, then I earnestly entreat my colleagues to render serious consideration to H.R. 976 that would eliminate the entrance of women to all the military academies. In the name of Judeo-Christian Western civilization can we do no less?

Should one need any further encouragement, please read Phyllis Schlafly's column of December 22, 1981, which follows:

[From Copley News Service, Dec. 22, 1981]

ABORTIONS AT WEST POINT

(By Phyllis Schlafly)

The U.S. military academy at West Point has secretly put into effect a policy of encouraging abortions and of allowing the cadets who have them to remain in good standing.

The policy induces abortions rather than live births for cadets who have illegitimate pregnancies, and encourages promiscuity by promising confidentiality and no penalties.

The academy's honor code has been a cherished possession of cadets and graduates. It supposedly requires complete integrity in word and deed and is strictly enforced; violations are a cause for dismissal. But, under the new policy, the female cadets who have illegitimate pregnancies are protected against dismissal and are kept in good standing as though they were honorable cadets.

All the female cadet needs to do in order to cover up her fornication and be kept in good standing is to accept counseling and then take a three-day leave over the weekend to have her abortion. If she gets married or has her baby, she will be unceremoniously dismissed from the academy.

This policy is all set forth in a directive called "Counseling Procedures and Administrative Instructions in Cases of Cadet Pregnancies" issued on May 28, 1981, by Col. Harvey H. Perritt Jr., who signs himself chief of staff—deputy post commander. He obviously hoped that the American public would not discover his order because it was stamped "For Official Use Only" plus the warning that "dissemination is prohibited except as authorized" and "criminal statutes and regulations provide penalties for unauthorized removal or disclosure."

The new USMA policy states that pregnant cadets "will have the following options: (1) tender resignation, (2) request leave without pay, (3) take such measures as she determines appropriate, and remain a cadet in good standing unless medically disqualified."

The policy directive continues: "Cadets who wish to remain a cadet may do so provided they meet all medical qualifications. . . . Tactical officers may . . . grant up to three days of leave for cadets who so request in conjunction with pregnancy. . . . Unless circumstances prohibit, this one-time leave will be granted between Friday and Monday. . . ."

It is rather obvious that a "one-time leave" of "three days" is long enough to have an abortion but not long enough to have a baby. Other parts of the policy directive are also crafted to induce abortions.

In order to "meet all medical qualifications" necessary to remain a cadet, she must never be more than three months pregnant. "In the average pregnancy, the point of medical inability to perform duties usually will not be reached until the end of the first trimester, at approximately the 12th week as judged by the surgeon, USMA."

Once the cadet passes that point in her pregnancy, she has lost her chance to request leave without pay, because only "cadets not medically disqualified may request leave without pay for up to one year."

If she requests leave without pay prior to that point in time, she then is subject to another provision in the directive: "Cadets requesting leave may return to USMA, providing they meet the same requirements as for original admission, to include being medically fit, not married, and not having custody or legal responsibility for a child."

The cadet who finds she is pregnant is absolutely compelled to submit to the USMA counseling procedure.

"The cadet will further be advised that consultation, within 48 hours of verification of pregnancy, with the counseling coordinator or alternate, is a mandatory duty." Redundant paragraphs in the policy directive remind the cadet again and again of her "mandatory duty" and that she "must" accept USMA counseling.

The cadet is assured of absolute confidentiality so long as she has an abortion within the first trimester. She is reminded that her consultation is "administratively privileged" and can never be "used in any way by USMA officials against the cadet," and that "no formal report of the pregnancy will be made unless she becomes medically disqualified" (i.e., becomes more than three months pregnant). Her parents can be notified only "with the cadet's consent."

The U.S. military academy is a prestigious institution that provides a unique training to give officers the leadership and discipline to lead troops into battle for the defense of America. It looks as though West Point has lost sight of its mission.●

THE RIGHT REVEREND MITRED ARCHPRIEST JOHN C. DIAKON

HON. CARDISS COLLINS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mrs. COLLINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, after 30 years of unselfish service as pastor to Chicago's Saint George Cathedral of the Russian Orthodox Church, Father John Diakon is retiring.

I would like to share with my colleagues the accomplishments of this remarkable man and therefore submit a tribute to the lifelong commitment made by Father John to the service of God and his fellow man.

The Right Reverend Mitred Archpriest Father John Constantinvich Diakon was born on February 1, 1894 (old style), in the pious family of Constantine and Maria Diakon in the village of Siptena in the Russian Province of Bessarabia. Father John was the oldest of seven children. The Diakon family was a patriarchal family and adhered to all of the old customs in regard to bringing up the younger generation. Little Vanya, the diminutive for John, received a proper upbringing within a family devoted to the principle of love toward those who were near him, and in piety and respect toward his elders.

As a small boy he attended public grade school and thereafter received advance secondary education.

The boy manifested remarkable capabilities and a desire to learn. The local priest, Father Mikail Gorduze, recognized his talent, and recommended him for acceptance in the high school in the village of Bul'voki, where he successfully continued his education and won the hearts of all his teachers.

Three years of study in Bul'voki yielded splendid results. Father Diakon finished school brilliantly, and went on to enter St. Feodor Teachers' Seminary in the village of Derman in the Province of Volhynia.

The influences of the old monastery upon the life of the seminarians was enormous. The Derman seminary was removed from the noise of the town, and was situated among large branching trees and blooming gardens. Here it was possible to meditate on the greatness of creation and to enjoy the fragrant fruits of monastic inspiration. The rector of the Derman monastery at that time was Archbishop Pachomius, who soon turned his attention to the youth and granted him his gracious patronage.

The young man graduated from Derman seminary after 4 years with honors. He then attended the Pastoral-Missionary Seminary in Bizyukov in Kharkov Province on the lower Dnieper River where he spent 3 years in preparation for further missionary work.

The rector of the Bizyukov monastery was the prominent Archbishop Arseny, who was a missionary in the Khardov Eparchy. The monastery was wealthy to such an extent, that the funds allotted to the seminary were sufficient to establish an entire academy. The faculty was on such a high level, that graduates were well prepared to propagating Orthodoxy among persons of other faiths.

At that time Archbishop Arseny was already hopeful that Orthodox missionary activity would be established in America. Frequently he had said to the young seminarian: Let us go to America and work for the good of the Orthodox Church. Afterward Archbishop Arseny worked in the New World and his activities were well known to Russian settlers. He worked in many cities of the United States, including Chicago, and left American descendants for the beautiful Holy St. Tikhon Monastery.

In October of 1914, when Father John was a first-year student in the seminary, Bishop Procopius inspected the seminary and tonsured all the student readers.

Father John's stay at the Bizyukov monastery coincided with a terrible catastrophe in the history of the Russian—the Bolshevik Revolution, which altered the course of public and private life in that country.

As a result of the revolution, such splendid centers of spiritual education as the Bizyukov monastery and its seminary were liquidated, and all its monks were thrown into the icy currents of the Dnieper River.

The young, capable Father John, filled with a great store of knowledge and energy, moved at that time to the town of Tiraspol, where he taught in a local school for approximately 3 years.

When he was a student in the teachers' seminary in the village of Derman in Volhynia, he became acquainted with a young woman named Natalia Evdokinova Torlopovaya, a girl from a very pious patriarchal family. The friendship ended with marriage on July 2, 1917, in the town of Birzula. From that moment on, their joint life and wonderings began.

The work before Father John from that time on, was complex and demanding of energy, dedication wisdom and experience, and with the Lord's help he was able to meet the challenge.

In the 1940's Bishop Sepraphim of Berlin and all Germany appointed Father John, Pastor of St. Nicholas Church in a large refugee transit camp (Punk-Kaserne) in Munich.

He remained in that post until 1930 when he left for the United States. On December 20, 1959, Father John with his family stepped on the shores of the land Columbus. For the first few months he served in various churches of the New York area, but in March of 1951, through the efforts of the choir director Vasili Andreevsky and Professor Prokopov, he was called to St. George Parish in the city of Chicago.

When Father John arrived in Chicago, he found pictures of the Soviet leaders in the parish hall, and the Soviet red flag with its sickle and hammer in the church. It was necessary to begin by renewing the parish's spiritual values; it was necessary to explain to the people that Marxism and religion were not exactly compatable, and that a Marxist flag had no place in a church. Father John's work in this area eventually bore fruit.

Father John began the beautification of the church and the improvement of its financial base. When Father John first arrived, the liturgy was generally attended by 12 to 16 persons, and the parish was $10,000 in debt. The parish could not even pay for the priest's apartment and there was no money in the treasury. Thus Father John began his difficult work: Through the cold and snow of the Theophany season; he visited homes with holy water, and on Memorial Day he walked the cemetery the entire day. He never refused anyone in their requests for spiritual service. All income thus generated he donated to the church's treasury, and lived with his family on $175 per month in the apartment plus utilities provided by the parish. With that kind of effort, things soon began to improve. Debts were paid off, and the treasury acquired a surplus. Soon the church building itself was remodeled, a new iconostasis was acquired and new icons therefore purchased.

In Father John's tenure of 30 years, because of great admiration and respect for him, as well as a good example and influence on people, others have entered the ranks of the clergy to serve God, man, and his church.

Before retiring, Father John was determined to erect a landmark of faith for the zealous pioneers' children and grandchildren in the Russian Orthodox church. This, in 1978, a new $90,000 temple was erected at Griswold Lake, McHenry, Ill., as a monument to the mission of orthodoxy in America; and October 1979 saw another newly consecrated temple of God, dedicated to the great St. Prince Vladimir of Kiev, christianizer of the Russian people. The future has yet to see the completion and adornment of a new iconostasis for Father John's dream.

In the spring of 1980, through Father John's leadership and the efforts of the parish council of St. George, a $25,000 renovation fund drive was instituted for Chicago's St. George parish temple's interior face lift, along with a new converted heating system. Many fundraising projects were established to support the present drive; and through the donations of many devout people and groups this financial goal is near liquidation.

In the fall of 1981, Father John requested to be retired as pastor of St. George parish of Greater Chicago, a post he has held for the past 30 years.

The beginning of 1982 finds Father John appointed pastor emeritus by His Grace Bishop Boris of Chicago and the Diocese of the Midwest, the Orthodox Church in America.

Today, as we remember and comtemplate upon Father John's many and diverse accomplishments, we are grateful to the Lord God for his mercy sending Father John to live among us and we hope we can follow his example for therein only lies salvation.●

NEW FEDERALISM AND THE STATES

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply concerned about what "the New Federalism" is going to mean for the States. Last week, the President said, by giving the States some new functions and having the Federal Government take over others, that the costs would come out the same, it would be equal. However, the State of Oregon has indicated it stands to lose $236 million a year if it takes over AFDC and food stamps in exchange for the Federal Government handling medicaid costs.

Not only would the State lose Federal assistance but Oregonians would lose much needed assistance.

In this morning's Washington Post, Thomas Higgins, director of Multnomah County Department of Human Resources, writes of the necessity of keeping welfare responsibilities on the Federal level. I would like to share Mr. Higgins' letter to the editor with my colleagues:

EQUITY ON ITS HEAD

People of conscience should be deeply distressed by President Reagan's proposal to turn over the Aid to Families With Dependent Children and food stamp programs to the states. It stands equity on its head.

For almost 50 years, since the passage of the Social Security Act, it has been a settled principle that welfare should be federalized. Fairness depends on distributing income assistance, as much as possible, in like manner under like conditions throughout the nation.

Unlike various social service programs, which are best shaped at the local level, these programs of assistance should not depend upon the ability of a local economy to sustain them because they are fundamental to the survival of millions of destitute people.

WORKING TOGETHER TO PRESERVE THE ENVIRONMENT: THE OSHA/ENVIRONMENTAL NETWORK

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration is undertaking a systematic campaign to reduce the effectiveness of many of our Nation's environmental protection laws. During the last year, the administration has endorsed proposals to dismantle the Occupational Safety and Health Administration's enforcement program through exemptions, compliance relaxation, and staff reductions in its enforcement division.

The administration has badly damaged the effectiveness of the Environmental Protection Agency by severely cutting its budget. And the administration has endorsed a version of the Clean Air Act that threatens to ignore serious air pollution problems.

Because of these attacks by the Federal Government on our environmental protection legislation, new urgency has been placed on efforts to reverse the direction the administration is taking. One group that has risen to the occasion of educating the public and serving as an effective organ for the majority of Americans who favor a safe environment is the OSHA/Environmental Network.

The OSHA/Environmental Network is a coalition of labor unions and environmental groups dedicated to preserving OSHA and the Clean Air Act, as Harold D. Samuel explains. Samuel is the president of the Industrial Union Department of the AFL-CIO. In a well reasoned article which appeared in the January/February 1982 issue of Sierra, the Sierra Club bulletin, Samuel describes the work of the OSHA/Environmental Network. I hope my colleagues will take a moment to review Mr. Samuel's article.

The article follows:

THE OSHA/ENVIRONMENTAL NETWORK

(By Howard D. Samuel)

The OSHA/Environmental Network, a coalition of labor unions and environmental groups fighting to preserve the Occupational Safety and Health Act (OSHA) and the Clean Air Act, is barely ten months old, but rarely has a coalition achieved such instant success. One of the reasons is that our mutual concern is easily defined: the environment, whether in our workplaces or in our communities, is clearly important to all of us. Another reason is that our ten months of formal association were preceded by years of loose-knit association. Working together was not a new experience.

Finally, and perhaps most important, we are living in a time when all our goals are seriously threatened. We have become very aware that if we don't join hands, we may lose strong legislation supporting both occupational safety and clean air.

Labor's interest in the environment began decades ago. The air-pollution disaster in 1948 at Donora, Pennsylvania, was a special landmark for organized labor. Most of the residents of Donora worked in steel and zinc plants, and half the town fell ill when weather conditions trapped poisonous gases from Donora's factories in the atmosphere. Twenty people died. Clean air took on a special meaning for many trade unionists. Subsequently the United Steelworkers held the first major national conference on air pollution, and labor strengthened its ties with the American Lung Association.

Earth Day 1970 was another landmark; the conservation movement began to look at broader issues, including those related to urban and occupational environments. The Sierra Club took an active role in the boycott of Shell Oil Company called by the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers Union in an effort to gain access to workers' medical records (the struggle is still on through attempts to enforce OSHA regulations). That boycott developed into a joint legislative effort by the Industrial Union Department (IUD) of the AFL-CIO and the Sierra Club, which led to passage of the Toxic Substance Control Act.

So it was not much of a precedent for the IUD to call on the Sierra Club, the Lung Association and other environmental groups for help, when we were faced with the Schweiker bill in 1980. We thought then that the Schweiker bill was the most serious threat we had faced since OSHA became law in 1971. Little did we know. The environmentalists responded—and so did trade unionists, in greater numbers and with more enthusiasm than anyone had anticipated. We were energized, and Congress got the message. The Schweiker bill died.

We decided to convert that enthusiasm to a continuing presence on behalf of OSHA and the Clean Air Act, and to do it together. Thus was born the OSHA/Environmental Network.

The danger has never been greater. Environmental protection, in the community and in the workplace, appears to be a special target for attack by this administration and by its allies in Congress and the business world. OSHA's enforcement capability has been sharply reduced, with a resulting decline in inspections and penalties. There has been a systematic effort to roll back standards—on cotton dust, lead, carcinogens, medical access and labeling, for example—and to downgrade the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH). If the administration gets its way, clean air requirements would be relaxed and enforcement turned over to the states; those most sensitive to air pollution would lose their "margin of safety."

Under the mask of cost-benefit analysis, the administration and its allies have placed lives on the same scales as dollars, and high officials are twiddling with the weights to see which is heavier.

Environmentalists and union members don't see it that way. While we do not agree on every issue, what is more important is our dedication to a common conviction that lives and health have an absolute importance greater than dollars and profits. We are agreed that proper attention to environmental issues will benefit, not harm, our economy, because no economic system can survive in a hostile environment. Now, through the OSHA/Environmental Network, we pledge ourselves to carry on the struggle together and to keep the Clean Air Act and the Occupational Safety and Health Act effective, enforced and permanent.●

FARMERS OF THE YEAR

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, as we know, urban sprawl has overtaken much of the farmland of this country. Yet farming is uniquely tied to our heritage, and the men and women farmers of Prince Georges County continue to work hard to preserve their land and the farming tradition. But we have seen that the outward manifestations of farming have changed in the face of increased technology and complex marketing. The men and women who carry the agricultural burden today must be more than just tillers of the soil; they must be money managers, conservationists, marketers, and, in the end, survivalists in the face of urban encroachment.

Recently, the Prince Georges County Jaycees conducted their 26th annual "Farmer of the Year" competition in honor of these fine men and women. I am proud to pay tribute to these individuals for their outstanding contributions. William Addison, Jr., Donald Entzian, Henry P. Miller, Jr., and the runner-up of the competition, Christopher Parker, serve as excellent examples of the industrious farmer upon whose sweat and toil this country was built.

William Addison, Jr., 30, from Upper Marlboro, began work as a farmer upon graduating from college. He converted a neglected plot of land into a profitmaking farming establishment. Now he raises 400 acres of corn and soybeans with the aid of part-time help. He is a member of the Vansville Farmers Club which is the oldest existing farmers' organization in the Western Hemisphere and he has only recently helped organize a committee dedicated to protecting Prince Georges County from haphazard rural development.

David Entzian, 22, from Mitchellville, has been farming for 8 years. He raised his own tobacco crop when he was 14. He now is in a 50-50 partnership with his father and hopes to be able to buy his own farm to include in their operation.

Twenty-eight-year-old Henry P. Miller, Jr. tills 350 acres of farmland in Clinton, Md. He began as a tobacco farmer but switched to growing vegetables and now runs a pick-your-own operation. He is an outstanding young businessman as well as farmer.

Christopher Parker is a 32-year-old farm operator from Clinton. He also began farming on 350 acres in tobacco but switched to a multicrop; pick-your-own retail, wholesale outlet. He declares his greatest satisfaction comes from working the land despite graduating from Villanova University as a finance major. He enjoys the challenges and independence that a career in agriculture offers.

Because these farmers and others like them have produced record crops in Prince Georges County at a time when the total number of farms in the county has been decreasing, I find it fitting to extend to them, here today, the credit they deserve. The $8 million in annual income from farm products have helped to bolster the economy of the county during a time of frugal fiscal management.

As citizens of this country, we owe a great deal to the farmers; and as a citizen of Prince Georges County, I wish to express my gratitude and admiration to the four men in the "Farmer of the Year" competition and, indeed, to all the farmers throughout the county.●

OUTSTANDING DELAWARE FARMERS

HON. THOMAS B. EVANS, JR.

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize the accomplishments of two farming families from Delaware—the Eastburns of Clayburn and the Hamiltons of Kenton. Don Eastburn, along with his wife, Anna, and their son, Don, Jr., took an ordinary dairy herd and turned it into an extraordinary one. After only 3 years, they not only have the highest milk-producing herd in Delaware, but also the highest-producing cow the State has ever had. John Hamilton was recently named Delaware's all-American pork producer for 1982. With the help of his wife, Ellen, and his daughter, Leah Jo, Hamilton took only 3 years to buildup a breeding herd which produces 1,600 finished hogs a year.

These families exemplify the efficiency and excellency in farming which have made the U.S. agricultural system the greatest in the world. It is their dedication and self-sacrifice which enable the few farmers of this country to feed not only people at home, but also those abroad.

Because farms such as these are so productive, we often forget how dependent our economy is upon them. Agriculture remains the most important industry in Delaware and the entire country. The success story of agriculture in Delaware is due in large measure to the hard-work and initiative of families like the Eastburns and the Hamiltons.●

LUDWIG TORZEWSKI DONATES LAND

HON. BOB TRAXLER

OF MICHIGAN

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Speaker, Ludwig Torzewski recently provided a lasting gift to his fellow-residents of Lapeer County, Mich. A resident of Pero Lake near Elba Corners in my district for 49 years, Mr. Torzewski gave 75 acres of valuable waterfront property to the residents of Lapeer County for their enjoyment as a county park. County officials are delighted with his generosity and named it Torzewski Park in his honor.

Mr. Torzewski, who is an 88-year-old widower, was born near Wausau, Wis. He is the eldest of 11 children, whose parents were immigrants fleeing from an earlier era of repression in Poland. Mr. Torzewski is a World War I veteran who initially enlisted in the Canadian Army prior to this country's involvement in that war. He retired from the Buick Motor Division of General Motors in Flint after a variety of challenging assignments.

This unselfish consideration for the needs of present and future generations to have outdoor recreational opportunities is highly commendable.

Further information on Mr. Torzewski's generous act is contained in the following article from the Flint Journal.

[From the Flint Journal, Nov. 12, 1981]

LONGTIME LAKE RESIDENT DONATES LAND

(By Dan Shriner)

Lapeer County residents will be able to use their newest county park in late 1982 or early 1983.

The park, to be called Torzewski County Park, is a 75-acre waterfront areas on Pero Lake in Oregon Township.

The land for the park was donated by Ludwig Torzewski, 88, who has lived on the lake for 49 years. The Lapeer County Board of Commissioners recently honored Torzewski.

Torzewski said that he donated the land because he wanted to see that it was used by county residents.

"I wanted to do something for the county, and I didn't want to deprive the lake from the people," Torzewski said. "I wanted to leave something after I was gone. My wish is fulfilled."

Officials of the County Parks and Recreation Commission said that a master plan will be developed to determine park uses.

County Parks Director Robert Baird said that the park, which will have about 2,000 feet of lake frontage, will likely be developed for boating, fishing, swimming, ice skating, a nature area, picnicking, and possibly tennis and basketball courts. Baird said that restrooms and a bathhouse probably will be built also.

"This will be our only public beach," Baird said. "Lapeer County could never have afforded this. It's a blessing."

Because Pero Lake is only about 55 acres, Baird said, there will not be a public boat launch. He said that the county will maintain a private boat livery to control use of the lake.

The extent of the renovation will depend on what funds the county receives from the National Park Service, Baird said. The federal agency will allocate money from its land and water conservation fund if a local governmental unit adds matching funds.

Baird said that under the federal guidelines, the county may use the $200,000 estimated value of the property as its share of the matching funds.

Baird estimated that the only cost to the county would be $30,000 to $40,000. The money would pay for the construction of a fence around the property and for signs at the entrance to the park.

Baird said that the fence and signs were requirements set by Torzewski in donating the site.

Pero Lake was the site of Mott Camp, a summer haven for Flint area youth for nearly 50 years until it was closed in 1974 by the Mott Foundation.●

TRIBUTE TO RICHARD BOLLING

SPEECH OF

HON. RALPH REGULA

OF OHIO

Thursday, January 28, 1982

● Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to add my thoughts in honoring a truly distinguished Member of the House, RICHARD BOLLING of Missouri.

This body, and the other as well, will be diminished by the retirement of RICHARD BOLLING. I greatly admire my colleague for his intellect, his analytical skills, and his ability to translate these attributes into words, both spoken and written.

When the 97th Congress adjourns, RICHARD BOLLING will leave only as a Member. He has already provided this great institution with incisive analyses of how the Congress should and should not do its work. He has contributed mightily to creating and molding much of procedural framework within which we conduct our work, the congressional budget process being a prime example. It would be a loss to the Congress and the country should our colleague not continue to comment on and be critical of this great body and the affairs of state.

Mr. Speaker, the Nation should be grateful for the contributions our colleague RICHARD BOLLING has made to responsible government.●

THE STING OF SALVADOR

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, the Congress acted wisely in its consideration of the foreign aid bill last session when it mandated a certification from the President that "the Government of El Salvador is making a concerted and significant effort to comply with internationally recognized human rights" before the Congress would approve military or economic assistance to that country. In requiring such a certification, the Congress sought to insure that the intentions of the United States in providing assistance would not be subverted by an unduly harsh and violent regime.

However, as earnest as the administration may seem in its desire to promote democracy and land reform through the Duarte government, disturbing reports of the Salvadoran Army's unchecked terror indicate that Mr. Duarte has yet to reign in the brutal power of his own armed forces. Until Mr. Duarte can do so, and until he can bring to justice the murderers of six American citizens, increasing aid to El Salvador means taking a substantial risk: That instead of promoting true democracy and needed land reform, we will instead be assisting an uncontrolled army in its acts of terror. The following editorial from the January 31 edition of the New York Times warns that as American involvement in El Salvador increases, "so does American responsibility":

THE STING OF SALVADOR

One measure of America's painful predicament in El Salvador is the cynical humbug it inspires. With a straight face, the Reagan Administration now certifies that El Salvador's record on human rights justifies more American aid. Congress is assured that the junta is making good-faith efforts to negotiate with its insurgent opposition and promoting free elections and genuine land reform.

Why this strain? Because without certification that conditions in El Salvador are much better than they are, American aid would be automatically terminated. And without more aid, Marxist guerrillas might well rout the junta's repressive armies and install a regime the United States deems unacceptable.

To find a way out, the Administration has put all its chips on a right-center coalition nominally headed by an honorable Christian Democrat, President José Napoleón Duarte. But the armed forces, long a source of El Salvador's agony, are a state-within-a-state. It generals have repeatedly and contemptuously ignored elected civilian Governments, and once robbed even Mr. Duarte of the presidency.

It is therefore naive to expect a bloody confict to be ended by a series of elections beginning in March. The country has seen plenty of votes, most of them crooked. It could even happen that the armed forces will rig the outcome to rid themselves of Mr. Duarte and put the extreme right firmly in control—the same pattern now visible in Guatemala, where a similarly dubious election will also be held in March.

Truly free elections and land reform are the right objectives in El Salvador. But without an end to the butchery they cannot be attained. And the Reagan Administration has clearly failed to restrain the murderous armies. Congress tried to give it new leverage by tying American aid to respect for human rights. The leverage has not been well used.

Just when President Reagan was extolling the junta's record, eyewitnesses reported the massacre of about 700 peasants in a single village. According to a study for the American Civil Liberties Union, the Salvadoran military were responsible for 12,500 murders in 1981. There has, finally been progress in pressing charges against soldiers for the murder of four American churchwomen more than a year ago. But no officers have faced courts-martial for slaughtering civilians.

The junta's defenders complain that the excesses of the right are exaggerated while those by the left are ignored. But Washington has no influence over the guerrillas; the battalion accused of last month's massacre was trained by American officers and armed with American guns. As this involvement increases, so does American responsibility.

When it comes to strategically important regimes, Mr. Reagan's prefers "quiet" diplomacy to public protest. That has been his approach in Africa, where persistent pressure on South Africa has apparently opened the way for a settlement in Namibia, which could also get the Cubans out of Angola. Why is American influence so meager over a totally dependent junta much closer to home?

The crisis in Poland makes the question even more urgent. Secretary of State Haig found it "mind-boggling" that Europeans could condemn America's double-standard in reacting to martial law in Poland and El Salvador. The reproach plainly touched a nerve. Let the sting move him.●

IT'S TIME TO DECIDE: WHO SHOULD MAKE THE LAWS

HON. ELLIOTT H. LEVITAS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, last week the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia handed down a decision declaring that congressional veto of agency rules and regulations is unconstitutional. Previous court decisions have upheld the constitutionality of the legislative veto. Now with this contrary opinion, we can expect to get a final ruling from the Supreme Court on the issue. That is why we have a Supreme Court.

I welcome this opportunity to settle the constitutional issue once and for all. I believe that the Court will uphold the validity of the legislative veto of rules promulgated by unelected bureaucrats having the force of law. In the meantime, I believe it is our duty as elected Representatives to press on with our work; to enact legislative veto provisions to curb the bureaucrats and to exercise the vetoes when needed.

At this point I would like to share with my colleagues the following editorial from the Atlanta Journal which puts the decision of the court of appeals in its proper perspective.

CONTINUE THE FIGHT

The Federal appeals court decision declaring unconstitutional a congressional veto of a bureaucratic regulation has to cause concern to those of us who believe that unselected bureaucrats should not have a free hand in making rules that affect citizens with the force of law.

However, this case at least frames the issue in a proper manner to be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. Furthermore, even if the reasoning of the appeals court casts doubt on the one-house veto as an appropriate remedy, it in effect concedes that there is a real constitutional problem which needs to be dealt with some way.

This case involved a House veto of a regulation promulgated by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. Proponents of the legislative veto contend that since federal agencies operate under laws passed by Congress, the legislative branch has the right to overrule a regulation that goes beyond the intent of Congress in making the laws.

Opponents of the legislative veto either contend that administrative rulemaking is exclusively an executive function—a proposition we cannot accept—or they contend that a one-house veto is an improper shortcut, because it allows only one house of Congress to determine the law, bypassing both the other house and the President's veto power.

Significantly, the opinion of the appeals court took the latter course thus admitting that the regulations in question are laws—and once that is admitted it seems to follow that Congress should have some voice in the lawmaking process.

If a one-house veto is not the proper remedy, at least the right of Congress to participate in making the law has not been, and cannot be, denied. Rep. Elliott Levitas assures us that Congress intends to take this case to the U.S. Supreme Court, and if the one-house veto is finally rejected, then he will seek some other remedy for the problem. Surely the last word on this subject, from the constitutional point of view, cannot be that unelected bureaucrats are superior in their power to make laws over the people's elected representatives.

THE BUDGET PROCESS

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, February 3, 1982, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE BUDGET PROCESS

The eight-year-old congressional budget process is in danger of collapsing. The fiscal year is three months old, and there is still no final budget resolution which sets the amount of money Congress can spend. Several appropriations bills have not been passed by Congress nor sent to the President for his signature. The huge deficits expected during the next few years have darkened the fiscal outlook.

The principal purpose of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974 was to force Congress to take responsibility for the budget as a whole. It aimed to substitute a unified budget process for the piecemeal approach to taxing and spending which had been followed in previous years. As a result, Congress' fiscal plans and deliberations would be more orderly and exact. Several factors lay behind Congress' willingness to support the Act. From 1921 to 1974, the President dominated budget-making through his control of the sources of information. In the 1970's, the economy was not performing well; a large, growing, and seemingly uncontrollable budget was deeply distressing to members of Congress, who were inclined to blame it for the economy's poor performance. Congress was finally convinced that it was not doing all it should to exercise its constitutional power of the purse responsibly and effectively. The Act was the answer.

A new dimension of the Act was discovered in 1981 when President Reagan employed the budget process to push Congress into making sweeping changes in economic and governmental policies. By debating "omnibus" packages of bills and avoiding votes on particular issues, members of Congress were free to vote for frugality in government and then to claim that they had had no opportunity to protect popular programs such as student loans. The strategy gave the President a decisive victory. The procedure dictated the result.

Today, the budget process is in trouble for several reasons. First, Congress is trying to use it to do too much. In 1981, nearly all major legislative decisions were made on a few votes. Important budget bills contained so many provisions that members of Congress often did not know what they were voting for or against. They were aware of the total budget cut which the bills proposed, but little more. The dangers inherent in this manner of doing business should be apparent. Second, the budget process has become too cumbersome. Congress passes a first, a second, and frequenlty a third budget resolution, more than a dozen appropriations bills, fifty or more authorizing bills, reconciliation bills, and tax bills. At each stage, significant budget decisions are reached. The budget process must be simplified or it will not continue to serve its principal purpose. Third, as the budget committees have begun to wield more influence, tensions have increased between those committees and the authorizing and appropriating committees. Jurisdictional struggles spill over into deliberations on policy and make it harder to find consensus. Finally, the budget process is being used to divide up a smaller pie in a stagnant economy. This task is far more difficult than that of distributing the revenues produced by an expanding economy.

My view is that the budget process needs to be reformed and strengthened. I am not confident that Congress will be able to do much reforming this year, but it can start by trying to come to a better understanding of what the budget process is and what it means. We should not have exaggerated ideas of what the budget process can accomplish. It will not yield magical results which satisfy all people. It does not ordain larger or smaller budgets or deficits. It will not necessarily get us balanced budgets or surpluses in government accounts. It merely helps Congress be a responsible decisionmaker and user of information. The budget process is neutral; it is intended to produce the outcome favored by the majority. Also, we should think seriously about economic escapism in the budget process. Congress and the President try to avoid the dilemmas of budgeting by maintaining (despite evidence to the contrary) that the economy will surge forward, that employment will be high, that inflation and interest rates will fall, that revenues will rise, that outlays will hold firm, and that a balanced budget is just a year or two away. This wishful thinking produces fleeting political benefits, but it dooms the budget process to unreality.

As to changes in the substance of the budget process itself, I have several suggestions:

We need a simpler process: As things now stand, there are too many figures and stages. The blizzard of numbers obscures the decisions which must be made. Perhaps we should begin to use a single, binding budget resolution in place of the current non-binding resolution which only sets goals to be refined later. I have even concluded that we should probably consider eliminating the split between authorization and appropriation and should rely instead on single committees to perform both functions. In any case, the budget committees or a task force should propose simplifications.

We need a more comprehensive process: Everything should be brought together in the budget process so that Congress can see it in one place. For example, the credit budget should be included because it has a very important impact on fiscal policy.

We need a process whose focus is longerterm: Congress ought to be concerned about its activities over several years. As a step in that direction, I favor a two-year budget resolution. The first year would be used to dispose of significant questions of policy; during the second year, Congress would concentrate on the more detailed provisions.

We need a process which uses valid economic assumptions. Both Congress and the President must get away from the game of using unrealistic economic assumptions to produce favorable budget figures.

Despite the problems, the present budget process has made Congress better. Legislators have more data on the budget and more opportunity to act intelligently on budget issues. They have a stronger appreciation of the relation between the economy and the budget. They have a greater awareness of the long-term financial commitment created by the votes they cast. Reform of the budget process can preserve these benefits as it provides new ones.●

TITLE V ENJOYS BIPARTISAN SUPPORT IN MY COMMUNITY

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Speaker, to attest to the fact that title V of the Older Americans' Act enjoys bipartisan support in my community, I insert this letter into the RECORD:

TOWN OF BABYLON,
Lindenhurst, L.I., January 22, 1982.

Hon. THOMAS J. DOWNEY,
Cedar Street,
Amityville, N.Y.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN TOM: It has come to my attention that title V of the Older American's Act (senior community service employment programs) is proposed for phaseout as of 31 May 1982 by the Office of Management and Budget despite congressional approval of the act for a 3-year period.

Nationwide, title V provided 60,000 low-income post, 55 individuals with paid part-time employment in the human services field. In Suffolk County, 250 enrollees participate in the program and are paid an average $3.45 per hour from which Federal, State, and FICA deductions are made; this, contributing to the tax revenues.

Without this employment opportunity alternatives for these older workers would be limited for the vast majority and welfare rolls would be their only means of existence. The agencies of our community served by these enrollees (all not-for-profit agencies) would be greatly hindered in providing services to our community.

Because title V of the Older American's Act has enjoyed bipartisan support in both Houses of Congress, I am hopeful that you will convey your support of this program to the President for the upcoming budget.

Sincerely,

RAYMOND C. ALLMENDINGER,
Supervisor Town of Babylon.●

EXPERIMENTATION RESULTS IN MORE MINER DEATHS

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, new figures show that more coal miners died in 1981, the first year of the administration's experiments in deregulation, than in any year since 1975.

The Mine Safety and Health Administration in 1980, before the experimenting began, had reduced coal miner deaths to a near record low of 133.

Due to delays in the administration's appointing process, MSHA was without permanent leadership for much of 1981. An Assistant Secretary of Labor for the Mine Safety and Health Administration was not appointed until late in the year.

What happened at MSHA during 1981 is outlined in a story in today's Washington Post.

This report also highlights the potential for further damage, and administrative chaos, created by the ill-advised transfer of certain MSHA mining jurisdictions to the Occupational Safety and Health Administration, where they have no experience with mining.

And the point of it all is that a mine is not some computerized econometric model where you can change the program to accommodate somebody's bright new theory and then push a button to get a readout telling you what happens if the theory is put into use.

When you change things in the mines—when you experiment—men die.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Health and Safety, I have scheduled MSHA oversight hearings later this month as a result of the recent dramatic rise in coal miner deaths, and they should produce solid information on the direction of the agency.

But for the meantime, I offer the following excerpts of directly related information from the report in today's Post for those who are interested in miner safety and health:

ACCIDENTS UP, CITATIONS DOWN IN COAL FIELDS

(By Douglas B. Feaver)

Federal mine inspectors are issuing fewer violation notices, closing fewer mines for safety reasons and collecting less in fines at a time when fatalities from mine accidents appear to be on the rise.

Twenty miners have been killed in the coal fields since Jan. 1, compared with nine a year ago. A total of 153 miners were killed in 1981, the highest annual rate since 1975.

The Labor Department's Mine Safety and Health Administration (MSHA), which is required to inspect all underground coal mines four times a year, is being squeezed by budget problems just like other agencies.

Unlike everyone else, however, MSHA is also caught in a strange never-never land. A small part of its mission—inspection of sand and gravel and quarrying operations—was moved by Congress in the continuing resolution from MSHA to Labor's Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA). No one knows whether or when that mission will be returned, but OSHA has it until March 31, when the continuing resolution expires.

The result: 220 MSHA sand and gravel quarrying inspectors have been furloughed since Jan. 1. Since many of them are also qualified coal inspectors, they are now beginning to "bump" less senior coal inspectors under federal personnel rules.

"I certainly empathize with the employes who were impacted," said MSHA Administrator Ford B. Ford, an appointee of President Reagan. "That was not an administration-sponsored move."

Further, attrition and the federal hiring freeze combined to cut by 9 percent the number of coal inspectors actually on the job from 1,389 to 1,264 between the end of fiscal 1979 and fiscal 1981.

"We are losing our best inspectors to industry," according to a source in an MSHA field office. "Previously we could keep them because of the continuity of the work and the dignity of the job, but no longer.

"If you asked, 'Does that account for these disasters?' I would say I hope not, but it troubles me."

Ford said he could not be "definitive" on whether such uncertainties might have contributed to laxness in the field. "A great number of our inspectors come from coal mining and coal mining families. I would say they are doing a good job. I can't say how individuals react."

The statistical evidence is interesting, if not conclusive. It shows that MSHA coal inspectors issued 129,921 citations for violations in fiscal 1980, but only 108,914 in fiscal 1981, a drop of 16 percent.

Orders—where an inspector literally closes a mine or a section of a mine or prohibits use of a piece of equipment until a hazard is corrected—dropped from 5,270 to 4,787, or 9 percent, from one fiscal year to the next.

Assessments—civil penalties paid by mine operators—dropped from $19.5 million in calendar 1980 to $14.2 million in calendar 1981, or 27 percent.

The switch from MSHA to OSHA of sand, gravel and stone inspections has the immediate result of removing thousands of small operators from the burden of federal inspection because OSHA is not permitted to inspect firms with fewer than 10 employees unless there is a complaint or a reported accident.

While the resolution tranfers about 162,000 protected workers at 12,395 operations from MSHA to OSHA, the inspectors remain on furlough. About 86 percent of the sand and gravel and two-thirds of the quarry operators will be exempt from OSHA enforcement barring a reported accident or complaint, OSHA spokesman Jim Foster said.

The National Sand and Gravel Association was able to build enough support in Congress to win at least temporary freedom from MSHA in the continuing resolution. However, MSHA statistics show, sand, gravel and quarrying operations have accounted for about 50 percent of the fatalities in the non-coal mining industry. Deaths in the non-coal mining industry dropped steadily from 234 in 1972 to an all-time low of 83 last year.

Ford has reorganized MSHA to place education and training staffs under the direct supervision of district managers instead of under Washington. That has resulted in the closing of some MSHA offices in the field, Ford said, but does not mean that MSHA's presence is diminished in any way.

"There has been no message to us to lessen regulatory enforcement," Ford said.●

R. & D. NEEDED FOR ECONOMY

HON. DON FUQUA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, I submit today a thoughtful editorial contained in the Washington Post of February 3, 1982, which clearly articulates the need for continuing the Nations's commitment to basic scientific research and technological development.

Coming as it has on the second of 3 consecutive days of hearings by the Committee on Science and Technology into "Research and Development Under Budget Stress" the editorial underlines a growing public awareness of the role of science and technology as a mainstay of the Nation's future economic and military strength.

The issues with which Congress has been wrestling over the past year as we try to reinvigorate our economy are certainly important and of instant concern.

But as we work toward curing our immediate economic ills, we would be foolish to dismantle programs which are the underpinning of future economic health.

In short, while we must be concerned with immediate problems we would indeed be shortsighted to mortgage a secure future for an expedient present.

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 3, 1982]

HOW MUCH FOR SCIENCE?

As the annual struggle over the federal budget gets under way, it is worth pondering what will happen to money for science. American science and technology are still the best in the world. But there are enough signs of strain to suggest that our accustomed preeminence—on which a large part of U.S. security and economic power depends—is fragile, even endangered.

The trouble starts with education. For more than a decade, secondary school curriculum requirements and achievement have fallen sharply in science and mathematics, while an opposite trend has been present in most other developed countries. The result is already evident. A NASA official reported recently, for example, that the space agency's cost overruns come in part from delays that are, in turn, the result of a lack of technically skilled workers.

Federal support for graduate education is in doubt for the first time in 30 years. In many fields, engineers are in short supply, but engineering schools cannot take in more students because they cannot find trained faculty to teach them. Shortage of faculty means heavier teaching loads and therefore less research. Schools do not have enough money to pay more professors even if these could be found, nor can they replace badly obsolete laboratories. Troubles that now afflict engineering are beginning to be seen in the sciences as well.

Money for basic research in this country has been essentially constant for 10 years. To the extent that scientific advance is linked to money—there is a close, but not rigid relationship—that means a decade without real growth. Meanwhile increases in research funds in Japan, West Germany, France and elsewhere have paid off with growth in both scientific and industrial productivity. And now federal research budgets face severe cuts.

Basic research, a long-range investment for the benefit of all of society, is properly and necessarily the responsibility of the federal government. Industry can be asked to expand its support of applied research and of development projects, but it is not industry's role, nor is the industrial setting the best environment for basic research. Yet less than 15 percent of federal research and development funds currently goes to basic research. Too much federal money supports development projects that are the proper province of industry. Allen Bromley, president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, recently made the valuable suggestion that the ubiquitous but misleading term "R&D" be dropped, in order to separate the financing of these two very different activities.

If serious damage is to be avoided as the federal budget is cut, Congress and the administration should not only protect, but in some fields increase, basic research funds. Ways should also be explored to assure more continuity in the amount of support such research is given. It takes nine years to produce a PhD scientist, and years to assemble a research team and carry a project to fruition. When the money disappears for a few years, the people disappear too, and can seldom be brought back. Abrupt changes like those that took place during last year's budget cycle can therefore wipe out years of past investment and future productivity.●

THE CONSTABLE'S HERITAGE

HON. JAMES K. COYNE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. JAMES K. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to inform my colleagues of the historical importance and the present day need for the time-honored position of constable in the system of justice and law enforcement in the United States.

From colonial days, in which the common laws were the only laws of our land, the constable has been the people's elected law enforcement officer. Constables receive their income in most cases from the litigants they serve rather than the taxpayer.

Today an awareness of that heritage has led to a nationwide task force of constables, under the banner of the National Constables Association, incorporated in Pennsylvania, to the forefront of the movement to bring about a rebirth of the constable system in the United States.

May I urge my colleagues to give their support to the constables, in every State, as they continue their nationwide program to regain their historical position of service to the people who elect them.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to insert into the RECORD a copy of "The Constable's Heritage," a history of this fine public office.

THE CONSTABLE'S HERITAGE—A PROUD TRADITION OF SERVICE

The word "constable" comes to us from the Latin, "comes stabuli," the "head of the stables at the imperial court." The first men to perform the role of constable were special, trusted men who guarded the royal stable and armaments.

In ancient Rome order was kept by a select group of men chosen for their courage and good judgement. They were the first organized group to perform the functions that we have come to associate with the constable.

In feudal times the office of Constable was a high military rank. The Constable was the highest militia rank and decided on all questions of chivalry and honor.

The constable was introduced into British Common Law following the Norman invasion of 1066 A.D. Originally his job was to keep the militia and the kings armaments in a state of preparedness to defend the village communities throughout England. The Constable was the representative of the King in all military affairs. In France the Constable was one of the five great offices, taking precedence immediately after the King himself.

The Blackstone Commentaries on the Common Law provide for a broad range of Constable duties and powers. Only the most responsible and competent of men could be considered for the position of Constable. Constables were entrusted with collecting taxes, arresting lawbreakers, conducting searches, transporting prisoners and serving all criminal and civil papers. Even the local drugstore had to open its books and records to the Constable.

The Constable was the first law enforcement officer in the new American colonies. While he sprang from uniquely English roots, his American growth was far ranging and diverse. The Constable's duties varied from place to place according to the particular needs of the people he served. The Constable was the sealer of weights and measures. He surveyed lands, announced marriages, and executed all warrants. The constable meted out physical punishment and generally kept the peace.

The first American constable with these powers was Joshua Pratt in Plymouth colony in 1634. While many of the duties were delegated to other officials, in general the Constable was responsible for the "Watch and Ward," the Ward during the day, and the Watch during the night. The New England settlers went as far as to appoint Indian constables, each holding office for a year and responsible for overseeing the nine other Indians under his command.

Today the office of Constable has evolved in many forms. In some places he is appointed, in others he is elected. His powers vary from simply the service of process to those of policemen and sheriff.

Generally constables work on a fee plus mileage basis, with the fee paid by the wrongdoer, not the taxpayer. Constables are available for a variety of assignments for the judicial and executive branches of government. They serve criminal and civil process, transport prisoners, collect back taxes and debts owed the government, and provide a trained, professional manpower pool ready to serve in time of emergency on a twenty four hour a day basis, all at no cost to the taxpayer. All other law enforcement officers owe their status to the Constable and can trace their own history back to the heritage of the Constable.

It is this proud tradition of service and responsibility that makes today's professional constable a vital, much needed component of the delivery of justice system.●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. DENNIS M. HERTEL

OF MICHIGAN

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. HERTEL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the 64th anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence of the Ukraine National Republic. The brief moment of Ukrainian national freedom continues to live in the hearts of Ukrainians and free people everywhere. I would like to share with my colleagues the plight of the Ukrainian people as well as their great intellectual and cultural contributions to the world in the 20 century.

The Ukrainian people have suffered through centuries of political, cultural and intellectual repression. Aside from brief moments in the passage of time when the torch of freedom shown publicly in the Ukraine, the nation's history has been one of stifling dominance by foreign powers. For a short period from 1918 to 1920, Ukrainian nationhood was a reality. The Ukraine's failure to develop political autonomy from the Soviet Union draped a cloak of despair over all Eastern Europe, which had closely monitored the Ukrainian attempt.

Unable to defeat the Stalinist forces, the Ukrainian Government was annexed by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Stalin dangled the promise to retain their national independence while they participated in the federated U.S.S.R. It was Stalin's intent to squelch Ukrainian nationalism. Ukrainians accepted Stalin's conditions expecting to practice political, social, economic, cultural, intellectual, and religious freedoms; and a revival of vocal national Ukrainian pride.

This was not the case. The mass exodus of Ukrainians began when the lie was made clear—the subterfuge of Stalin's statements became the cornerstone of Ukrainian Soviet public policy. Unlike many emigrees from Eastern European nations, the Ukrainians were primarily intellectuals rather than blue collar. They established Ukrainian universities in Prague, Warsaw, and Berlin. They maintained the revival of Ukrainian nationalism with the help and encouragement of their neighbors, while at home their nationalism was suppressed.

The universities were well established but short-lived—with World War II came Russian dominance in Eastern Europe. The Ukrainian academic freedoms on foreign soil ended. Stalin destroyed their documents and abolished the institutions. Suddenly, Ukrainian intellectuals found themselves primarily in America and Canada as they stubbornly attempted to maintain the vestiges of their culture.

Today, Ukrainian intellectuals have established universities in Rome and Paris, and Ukrainians in the homeland rely heavily on the East European books and journals to gain access to information on the outside world. Though the political freedoms of countries behind the Iron Curtain, such as Poland and Czechoslovakia, seem meager to us, they have not suffered the ultimate humiliation of territorial acquisition that the Ukraine has suffered.

Ukrainian-Americans are more than 2 million strong. Their beautiful churches are all over America. In 1964, in commemoration of the national poet of the Ukrainian people, Ukrainian-Americans erected a statue in Washington, D.C. Other famous Ukrainian-Americans include: sculptor Alexander Architenko; former Archbishop Joseph Shmondiuk; and the Director of the U.S. Communication Satellite Corporation (Comsat), Joseph Charyk.

Here in the United States the cultural identity and intellectual fervor of the Ukrainian people is maintained in ethnic communities and on college campuses. In 1968, Harvard University established a Ukrainian Center which included the appointment of a permanent Ukrainian professorship. The Ukrainian library at Harvard hopes to one day have originals or copies of all basic Ukrainian periodicals and monographs.

The suppression of Ukrainian nationalism and the denial of many basic human rights by the Soviet Union continues and should not be forgotten. While these people struggle at home for the freedom to express their national pride, we must encourage Ukrainians abroad, and especially those in the United States, to maintain their national pride, cultural traditions and Ukrainian heritage for the day when all Ukrainians will be free again.●

IMPROVING FUEL EFFICIENCY OF NUCLEAR REACTORS

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, in October 1981, my Subcommittee on Energy Conservation and Power heard testimony on a method to save consumers billions by improving the fuel efficiency of the nuclear reactors used throughout the world. During the hearing, nuclear suppliers, utility executives, and Department of Energy officials attested to the impressive strides the United States is making in uranium efficiency improvements.

Recent DOE estimates point up the significance of these improvements: We can reduce uranium use by nearly 25 percent, saving consumers more than $12 billion by the turn of the century. We can extend our uranium stocks for years. We can sharply reduce the amount of nuclear waste produced. A recent report of the General Accounting Office, prepared at my request, confirms DOE's estimates of these financial benefits of fuel efficiency improvements.

The cost to taxpayers is modest: $33 million over the next few years. Yet incredibly, the Reagan administration seeks to end this remarkably promising project. It is now up to us to save it.

The January 23 issue of the Economist, a British journal, contains an excellent article on the process of improving fuel efficiency in reactors. The article follows:

STRETCHING THE LIFE OF NUCLEAR FUEL

Nuclear power-plant operators are finding a bit of economic cheer, despite skyrocketing reactor construction costs and burdensome regulations. They are discovering ways to cut the costs of operating their reactors. Today (according to the reactor-builder, Bechtel), up to four times as much power is harvested from each pound of reactor fuel than in the early 1960s, and further increases are on the way.

Increasing the operative lifetime of nuclear fuel can help cut reactor operating cost in two ways. With less fuel passing through their reactors, some utilities hope (government regulations permitting) to win savings on waste-disposal charges for their spent fuel. More important, they can lengthen the time for which a reactor can be operated between refuellings.

Each time a reactor is refuelled, it must be shut down for six to eight weeks, and often longer. During that time, the utility must provide electricity from other sources: typically, this replacement electricity costs between $250,000 and $1m a day. So big savings flow from fewer shutdowns. Already most American utilities have switched from refuelling their reactors once a year to refuelling them once every 18 months; some hope soon to refuel only once every two years.

The trick to winning such savings lies in building longer-lasting nuclear fuel rods. The first, and ultimately the most important, part of this task is to ensure that the rod does not stop producing the neutrons needed to power the heat-producing, atomic-chain reaction.

The laws of physics largely dictate the solution to this problem. To get a fuel rod to go on producing neutrons longer, one must put more neutron-producing materials into it in the first place: that is, one must "enrich" the fuel. Unfortunately, enrichment is very expensive.

One reason is that it requires using more uranium. For each increase in the amount of enrichment work done, the quantity of uranium needed as raw material increases dramatically. The pressurised-water reactor—the world's most popular reactor design and the one requiring the most enrichment for its fuel—uses 16 percent more uranium each year when operating with fuel rods that last 18 months than with ones that last 12. Just now, while uranium supplies are glutted and prices falling, this does not matter too much. By the end of the decade it may be another story.

There are other snags as well that chip away at the net savings to be gained from using longer-lasting fuel. One is the problem of controlling the enriched fuel when it is first put into the reactor. Initially, enriched-fuel rods shoot more neutrons into the reactor core than are needed. Left uncontrolled, the surplus neutrons are a hazard: they could increase the radiation exposure of plant operators or possibly overstimulate the atomic reaction. To control them, nuclear engineers use "burnable poisons". These chemicals absorb the excess neutrons.

A second problem in using longer-lasting fuels is that the rods which contain the fuel must be built stronger to survive longer periods in the reactor core. That means making the rods more resistant to corrosion and more able to resist the stresses put upon them by the fuel they contain. New materials are being developed which are less susceptible to corrosion but, to resist the stresses created by the fuel itself, some nuclear fuel makers are discovering that they must find new designs for their fuel rods.

Inside the reactor, the pellets of nuclear fuel expand. In some cases, this can crack the fuel rod containing them. It is no good simply leaving extra room inside a rod to allow for the pellet's expansion because doing so would insulate the pellet and so decrease the efficiency of the fuel, making it more difficult to draw heat from it. To overcome this problem one fuel maker, America's General Electric, has begun coating its fuel rods with a thin layer of relatively soft metal. This absorbs the pellet's expansion without putting too much stress on the structure of the rod.

As they solve such problems, fuel makers are having to extend the guaranteed life of their product. In the early 1960s, General Electric guaranteed fuel for its boiling-water reactors for a life of only one quarter of what it does today. And fuel makers for the pressurised-water reactor, which include Westinghouse, Combustion Engineering and Babcock and Wilcox, have increased the guaranteed life of their fuels by about two and one half times the relatively higher base they started from in the early 1960s.

Somewhat reluctantly, nuclear fuel makers expect to provide still greater guaranteed lifetimes for their fuels in future. As the reactor-building business winds down with the collapse of new orders, many companies in the nuclear industry are looking to fuel fabrication to provide greater income. To compete in the fabrication market, they have no choice but to move to the longer-lasting fuels utilities are now demanding.

The nightmare is the risk that fuel makers might have to pay up on their longer guarantees. Actual fabrication (and a fuel makers' income) accounts for only 15-20 percent of the $100m-200m cost of a complete reactor fuel load, but a fabricator's guarantee covers the lot—including the cost (80-85 percent of the total) of the fuel itself. Paying up can hurt.

Still, the push for longer fuel lifetimes will continue. Most fuel fabricators now calculate that the economically optimum fuel lifetime is at least 25 percent longer than today's—and fuel-buying utilities reckon it is even longer than that.●

IN CELEBRATION OF THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE LINCOLN MEMORIAL SHRINE

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, on February 12, 1982, the Golden Jubilee of the Lincoln Memorial Shrine will be celebrated in Redlands, Calif. The Lincoln Memorial Shrine was dedicated and presented to the city of Redlands, Calif., by Mr. and Mrs. Robert Watchorn on February 12, 1932, as a tribute to Abraham Lincoln and as a memorial to their son, Emory Ewart, who had died in 1920 at the age of 26.

Robert Watchorn was born in Alfreton, Derbyshire, England, in 1858 and died in Redlands in 1944. He came to the United States in 1880, having worked in the English coal mines since his 11th year for the sum of 27 cents a day. The benefits of extensive formal education were denied Watchorn, but in later years, with the counsel of his wife, Alma, and with his own thirst for knowledge, he became a highly respected and effective labor leader, government official, corporation officer, and philanthropist.

Watchorn's life in America closely paralleled that of a Horatio Alger novel. After naturalization, he was elected the first secretary of the United Mine Workers Union; appointed adviser to the Governor of Pennsylvania, 1891-5; served as Commissioner of Immigration on the Canadian frontier, 1898-1905; chosen as U.S. Commissioner of Immigration at Ellis Island, New York, 1905-9; appointed treasurer of the Union Oil Co., Los Angeles, Calif., 1909-15; and was president of the Watchorn Oil & Gas Co., 1916-44.

Early in his life, Watchorn became fascinated with Lincoln and the Civil War period. Reading as much as he could, he began to collect Lincolniana. Watchorn believed that people throughout the world as well as in the United States could benefit from a more complete knowledge of Lincoln's strength and character, as well as his life of service and principle. In the 1920's, the Watchorns began to formulate plans for the construction of a memorial to Lincoln and a repository for their Lincoln collection. Choosing their winter home of Redlands, Calif., the Watchorns presented to the city a memorial to Lincoln, the only one in existence west of the Mississippi River—monument, museum, library, and archives.

For the Lincoln Memorial Shrine, Watchorn secured the well-known southern California architect, Elmer Grey, to design the octagonal building. The central focus of the shrine is the magnificent carrara marble bust by George Grey Barnard (then owned by Watchorn). To adorn the ceilings with handsome symbolic murals, the noted artist, Dean Cornwell, was selected by Watchorn.

Over the years, the shrine library has grown to several thousand volumes on the Civil War and Lincoln. The manuscript collection contains letters and documents from an array of Civil War personalities ranging from Lincoln and Charles Sumner to Lee and Jefferson Davis. One of the larger manuscript collections is that of Gideon Welles, Lincoln's Secretary of the Navy. The shrine has extensive holdings of rare pamphlets. Additional collections include materials from newspapers, stamps, coins, photographs, and artifacts.

Visited by thousands of people each year, the Lincoln Memorial Shrine continues to add to its holdings through its endowment fund, the support of the Lincoln Memorial Association, grants from the city of Redlands and the Shrine's parent institution, the A. K. Smiley Public Library, as well as through the continued generosity of friends and donors.

It is my pleasure to commend the Lincoln Memorial Shrine to the House of Representatives for its service to the public as a memorial to Lincoln and the Civil War period, as a research center for scholars and students, and as a repository, museum, and library open to all people whose interest in American history and Abraham Lincoln beckons them to utilize the shrine's resources.●

"COP KILLER BULLETS"

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, earlier this Congress I introduced a bill, H.R. 2280, calling for a Federal study to identify all those handgun bullets that can penetrate the bulletproof vests worn by police. Although first introduced in 1980, no action has been taken on this legislation and no such study has been conducted.

Unfortunately for the law enforcement community, the problem has grown far worse. Evidence I have uncovered since introducing my original bill suggests the availability of armor-piercing handgun ammunition is more widespread than I ever anticipated. Due to the tremendous amount of public attention focused recently on these so-called "cop-killer bullets," a growing number of criminals are aware of their existence and the awesome powers they possess. Especially significant is the fact that more and more police officers are relying on bulletproof vests for protection against handgun ammunition. In fact, more than 50 percent of all U.S. law enforcement personnel wear bulletproof vests today.

Most of the vests police use are capable of stopping all standard handgun ammunition. However, these vests provide no protection at all against the handgun bullets currently being made specifically to pierce metal.

As a result, police officers face a grave danger and the law enforcement community is concerned that a study by itself is simply not enough.

That is why I am introducing a new bill today that would not only call for the same Federal study, but would also outlaw those handgun bullets that are determined to be capable of penetrating a bulletproof vest.

Under the provisions of my new bill, the Department of the Treasury would determine which handgun bullets can penetrate the equivalent of 18 layers of kevlar (composition of most widely used police vest); the Department would publish their findings in the Federal Register; and 60 days after publication, those bullets identified would be banned from further manufacture, import, sale, or use.

The specific penalties imposed by this measure are consistent with current firearms violation laws. Under the provisions of this act, the licensed importer, manufacturer, or dealer would be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000, imprisonment for not more than 10 years, and revocation of their Federal license. A person using or carrying a restricted bullet during the commission of a felony would be subject to a mandatory, minimum prison sentence of not less than 1 year nor more than 10 years for the first offense, and not less than 2 years nor more than 25 years for the second or subsequent offense.

This new bill offers an alternative approach that would provide more expeditious and stricter treatment of the problem.

The need for this stronger legislation is clear. Tests have shown that most powerful of the armor-piercing handgun bullets, the Teflon-coated KTW, can penetrate the equivalent of four bulletproof vests in a single shot. The KTW bullet is not the only one of its kind. We know of at least four other handgun bullets that have similarly awesome armor-piercing capability. Reports indicate there may be several more.

As one who was wounded 10 times during my 23 years as a New York City police officer, I was outraged to learn that there is no law at all restricting the manufacture or sale of this type of ammunition. My legislation seeks to establish just such a law.

Mr. Speaker, to date soft-body armor is credited with saving the lives of approximately 400 U.S. law enforcement officers since its creation in 1974. We must not allow this valuable protective device to outlive its effectiveness to save lives. With this in mind, I urge the prompt and favorable consideration of my new bill, entitled the "Law Enforcement Officers Protection Act of 1982."●

OBSOLETE JETS SENT TO RUSSIA GAVE MIGS EDGE OVER WEST

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of history that most of the great military and industrial advances that have taken place in the U.S.S.R. were aided by Western technology. The aircraft engines furnished by Great Britian just after World War II eventually provided the basis of the Mig-15 fighter plane. The Migs were a shock to our fliers in Korea, and the F-86 fighters had to be rushed into production to keep us from being swept out of the skies. Even the F-86's were inferior in some respects, but fortunately our pilots were still better and we prevailed in the air war.

Some of the background and details to the arrangements whereby the Soviets acquired these engines has now been released, and in my view it is important that we in the West learn from our previous mistakes. One can only wonder why our allies in Western Europe do not see beyond their trade with the Communists and support the President's efforts to diminish East-West trade. The item from the Daily Telegraph of London for January 2, 1982, follows:

"OBSOLETE" JETS SENT TO RUSSIA GAVE MIGS EDGE OVER WEST

Britain supplied 55 new jet engines to Russia in 1946, in the belief that they were obsolescent, to clinch a trade deal with Moscow.

But the engines cut the British lead in jet technology from five years to three over the Soviet Union, and the Russians used one of the engines to power its new MiG-15 fighter which was to be devastatingly effective against United Nations forces in Korea.

RAF chiefs opposed the sale, and Defense Ministers also decided that the engines, which had been taken off the secret list, should not be exported to Russia, say the Air Ministry files.

The head of the Soviet trade delegation in London then pointed out to the president of the Board of Trade (Sir Stafford Cripps) that Britain "appeared to be discriminating against Russia in our export trade policy," one minute says.

SECURITY OBJECTION

Another paper adds: "the matter . . . became of some importance to a trade agreement and the president of the Board of Trade represented to the Prime Minister (Mr. Attlee) that if the engines were exported he could get the agreement through.

"The Prime Minister sent for the Chiefs of Staff and asked them whether, bearing in mind that the Russians could obtain the engines from some other country, if we refused to sell them, they wished to press the security objection.

"The Chiefs replied . . . that as it seemed as if the harm was already done and there were already strong positive reasons for exporting them, they did not wish to press the security objection, provided the license to manufacture was withheld.

"The export license was signed the same day, and the trade agreement was concluded immediately."

Subsequently the Russians asked for further engines, and supply of the total 55 (30 Derwents and 25 Nenes) was completed in 1947.

Later, Moscow asked for more engines and also for three Meteor and three Vampire jets, but London said the request could only be met if the Russians allowed British experts to see their aircraft.

After the appearance of the Nene in the Mig-15 there was a row on both sides of the Atlantic.

A telegram from the British Embassy in Washington, faced with angry Congressmen, says: "It would be helpful if you could authorise us to add (to a statement) that the 55 engines which were supplied were obsolescent."

But a minute from a serving officer in the file points out: "The two engines sold to Russia were the Derwent Mark V and the Nene Mark I.

"The Derwent is the latest mark and will definitely not be obsolescent this year. The Nene-I has not been introduced into the RAF for general purposes. It has, however, been used for experimental purposes on the Lincoln (bomber)."

Senior Air Ministry officials, drafting replies to M Ps' letters on the matter in December 1950, point out: "Our present belief that the Nene is in the Mig-15 confirms our opinion that the acquisition of this engine has been of great value to them (the Russians).

"The state of Russian jet engine development has always been largely an unknown quantity to us, but in the light of our present information, it may well be that the sale of these engines has been of appreciable value to them.

"We must, however, remember that in 1946, when the decision was taken, there was still a chance that the Russians would adopt a reasonable course of conduct, and that the Government did not wish to give them grounds for complaint that we were withholding from them engines which had been sold to other countries."

Aviation experts believe the Mig-15 has had the biggest impact on the world scene of any combat fighter.

It could fly, climb and dive faster than any Western aircraft. Within eight months of the supply of the Nene engine, the Mig-15 prototype had flown and the engine was put into production in a slightly modified form without a licence. Eight thousand Mig-15s were built in Russia in five years.●

EL SALVADOR MUST MEET STIPULATIONS

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, as we are all aware, the President recently presented a certification to Congress that the regime of President Jose Napolean Duarte "has made a concerted, significant and good faith effort to deal with the complex political, social and human rights problems it is confronting and that progress is being made."

I see the insurance of "good faith" by the Salvadoran Government as totally inadequate in warranting that military aid be sent to the Government. Public Law 97-113 precisely stipulates that the Government of El Salvador must not engage in consistent patterns of human rights violations and must work toward the elimination of the murder of citizens by the Salvadoran forces in order to receive U.S. military aid.

Recently, I have heard a disturbing report of a military operation apparently directed against the civilian population in the northern region of El Salvador. Phillip Bourgois, a Stanford University graduate student and son of an assistant secretary of the United Nations, claimed to have witnessed a massive aerial and ground attack on a column of 1,000 refugees seeking to escape the scene of conflict. He saw death and destruction before his own eyes.

I have called upon President Reagan to investigate these allegations in order to determine whether the Government is complying with the provisions under which military aid may be sent.

We must not allow a single U.S. dollar to be used in support of deliberate attacks on an innocent population.●

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT NEEDS TO CURTAIL ITS CREDIT APPETITE

HON. ED BETHUNE

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Speaker, I recently came across an interesting article written by Philip Lawler of the Heritage Foundation. His paper is entitled "Improved Economy Poses Problem for Credit Junkies."

Mr. Lawler makes the excellent point as to how Federal fiscal, monetary, and lending policies create corporate "credit junkies" who continually borrow, fueled by high inflationary expectations.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw a conclusion from this paper—the Federal Government needs to curtail its credit appetite to help restore stability to credit markets. A good way to force the Federal Government to get off its credit kick is for this Congress to adopt H.R. 2372, which would bring Federal credit programs into the budget process so Congress would have a better control over the heretofore unbridled proliferation of these programs.

I commend this article to my colleagues and I also urge their support of H.R. 2372, the Federal Lending Oversight and Control Act.

IMPROVED ECONOMY POSES PROBLEM FOR CREDIT JUNKIES

(By Philip F. Lawler)

In the old whodunit mysteries, when the first corpse was discovered, the detective would immediately shout, "Cherchez la femme!" In murder cases, he would explain to his loyal sidekick, the most likely explanation involves a romantic involvement.

Politics, like crime, has its own internal logic. In Washington, when a program encounters unexpected opposition, the first rule of thumb should be: Cherchez la coin. More often than not, the people who oppose the program have some financial interests on the line.

These days, the leading political topic is President Reagan's economic program. And the unexpected opposition is coming from Wall Street, where the nation's financial markets are reacting coolly to Reaganomic remedies. So it should come as no surprise that the financial community does indeed have a special interest in the way the government combats inflation.

No one enjoys inflation. When the value of the dollar drops, the whole country suffers. But some people suffer more than others. Inflation, like any other economic situation, involves a whole set of conditions—conditions that can be either problems or opportunities. And during an inflationary episode, just as in any other economic climate, the people most likely to realize their opportunities are the people with the shrewdest financial judgment.

The most obvious opportunity provided by inflation comes from borrowing money. If you can secure a long-term loan at 10 percent interest, and hold onto that loan while inflation gallops up to 15 percent, you get, in effect, a 5 percent profit on your loan! So if you know that the dollar is going to shrink, you should borrow money from someone else, and let his dollars shrink. The lesson is straightforward: in times of inflation, debt is a good investment.

Whether they know it or not, most people who have bought homes in the United States recently have profited by this borrowing strategy. Until recently, mortgage rates were lagging behind the pace of inflation, while real estate values soared against the anemic dollar. As a result, thousands of homeowners have realized a tidy profit on their mortgages. Their real estate holdings are now increasing in value, while the borrowed dollars shrink. Mark Twain knew the situation years ago, when he counseled a young friend, "Buy land, son, they aren't making any more of it."

Twain was precisely right. Not even the government can manufacture land wholesale. But the government can manufacture dollar bills, and that's what it has been doing year after year, until no prudent investor wants to hold onto such a cheapened commodity. Instead, prudent investors pile up the opposite: debt.

Needless to say, this strategy is no mystery to the wizards of Wall Street. For years, major corporations have been borrowing heavily through the bond market, secure in the certainty that inflation would help write off the debts. In fact, some companies have been piling one debt on top of another, issuing short-term bonds to help meet the interest payments on long-term bonds. In several cases (such as Chrysler, Pan Am, and International Harvester), the immediate demand for debt financing has brought the company perilously close to bankruptcy. Ordinarily, corporations would be restrained from such heavy borrowing by the cost of interest payments. But while inflation raged, no such restraints were in place.

The result? The corporate community today includes a number of habitual borrowers: credit junkies. They need cash today to pay off the people whose bonds will mature tomorrow. So they must borrow again—probably by floating a new bond issue, at higher interest rates. These corporations must borrow, regardless of the interest rates; they have no choice.

Now what happens to these "credit junkies" when the government begins to rein in inflation? Slower inflation means tighter money, and tighter money usually means higher interest rates. So with interest rates going up, and inflation rates coming down, the habitual borrowers are caught in a squeeze. Borrowing is a winning proposition only as long as the benefits exceed the costs. If the corporation is paying 10 percent interest while inflation is running at 15 percent, the corporation has a good thing going. But if interest rates climb to 15 percent (as they have recently) while inflation drops under 10 percent, the mounting debt becomes a major concern.

In short, for credit junkies, tight money poses some very serious problems. If President Reagan is successful in curbing the erosion of the dollar, these corporate borrowers will feel the effects immediately. As a matter of fact, they have already begun to feel the effects, as the tightening of the money supply has driven their interest costs upward.

If borrowers could just stay out of the credit market for a while, the situation would resolve itself quickly. With fewer people seeking to borrow, the demand for credit would slacken, and—following the immutable laws of supply and demand—the price of credit would fall. Lower interest rates would bring those prudent borrowers back onto the market, and things would return to normal. But for many debtors—for credit junkies—there is no choice about whether or not to borrow. So the competition for credit continues unabated, and the interest rates climb.

How can we break out of this vicious circle? Unfortunately, there is no alternative to a tight money supply. Yes, of course the government could loosen up the money supply a bit to accommodate present needs. But that would only bring worse problems in the future, because without tight money it is impossible to stop inflation. Sooner or later, inflation must be brought under control. But since some people—borrowers—are currently making a profit on inflation, naturally those people will feel the brunt of the counter-inflationary policy. And just as naturally, they will object to the policy that is hurting their own financial interests. That's what Wall Street is doing right now when it complains about the Reagan plan.

But "Wall Street" is not a unified body; it is a huge composite of different investors with different interests. The credit junkies are only one of Wall Street's many voices. Other, more prudent voices are now worried that the government will accede to the demands of the inflation lobby. They worry that the money supply will be loosened again, and the nation will have to brace itself for another round of inflation. And to guard against this possibility, they are hedging their investments. How do they do this? By demanding high interest premiums. So yet another factor is added to the high cost of interest.

If and when Wall Street is fully convinced that the government is determined to keep money tight, that assurance in itself will help bring interest rates back toward normalcy.

The great Austrian economist, Friedrick von Hayek, once likened a government in an inflationary state to a man holding a tiger by the tail. We know how to stop inflation, just as the man knows how to release his grip. But we can't expect to escape without some scratches. The choice is clear: we can let go of the inflationary tiger now, and face the consequences. Or we can keep clinging to the tiger's tail, out of fear. But the tiger isn't getting any friendlier, and he's hungrier every day.●

LADY TECHSTERS

HON. JERRY HUCKABY

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I want to brag a little bit. Louisiana Tech University of Ruston, La., which is in my congressional district, has the best women's basketball team in America, and I want to give them some much-deserved credit.

The Lady Techsters, the name by which they are known, and the name which strikes fear in the hearts of women's basketball teams across this land, have compiled an enviable record.

Winning the national championship is an honor which any sports team would love to have in its trophy case. The Lady Techsters did this last year, going through the entire season undefeated.

But this band of talented young ladies did not stop there. They continued to win and win and win. Just recently, they broke the all-time winning streak for women's basketball when they captured their 51st straight victory.

The Lady Techsters went on to stretch the streak to 54 games before losing their first game in 2 years. Sports experts feel the 54-game record set by the Lady Techsters may stand for all time in women's basketball.

The reasoning is that women's basketball is an emerging sport, gaining in quality and popularity all the time. Competition is keen, and it is going to be harder and harder for one team to dominate the sport.

The Lady Techsters certainly dominate it now. They have been consistently ranked No. 1 in the country and held on to that ranking despite the recent loss. It shows that the sportswriters are convinced that this is a legendary team.

A great deal of credit must go to the outstanding coaching staff. Head Coach Sonja Hogg is the guiding force behind this winning machine, with the help of two outstanding assistant coaches, Leon Barmore and Gary Blair. Hogg and Barmore are Louisiana Tech graduates.

I had the pleasure of watching the Lady Techsters play the University of Maryland this past Monday night at Cole Field House. It was the first game following the loss which ended the 54-game win streak, and we were apprehensive about how the Lady Techsters would react. After all, Maryland was ranked fifth in the Nation and had a 12-game win streak of its own.

But the Lady Techsters proved to be true champions, beating Maryland 73–56, embarking on another win streak.

After the game, I had the opportunity of meeting the Lady Techsters at a reception. I was impressed. They are a group of intelligent young ladies who have exceptional athletic ability.

They have handled the pressure and acclaim exceptionally well, and I know that under the leadership of a fine coaching staff, they will go on to greater heights.

What makes me even prouder is that 6 of the 14 players on the roster are from Louisiana; 4 of them are my constituents.

Here are the names and home towns of the Lady Techsters: Angela Turner of Saline, La.; Julie Wilkerson of Tioga, La.; Jennifer White of Loretto, Tenn.; Kim Mulkey of Hammond, La.; Pam Gant of Joliet, Ill.; Sandra Felton of Cordele, Ga.; Lori Scott of Jackson, Miss.; Ann Pendergrass of Ruston, La.; Debbie Primeaux of Bell City, La.; Pam Kelly of Columbia, La.; Debra Rodman of Dallas, Tex.; Tia Sossamon of Raymore, Mo.; Janice Lawrence of Lucedale, Miss.; and Rita Rust of Shreveport, La.

These Lady Techsters have worn the red and blue of Louisiana Tech to national prominence, and I just want to say congratulations on a job well done.●

CAPITAL BUDGETING

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSLYVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment to the attention of the House a recent column which appeared in the New York Times. Authored by my friend and colleague from Pennsylvania, BILL CLINGER, the column urges that we at the Federal level explore the concept of a capital budget in order to get a handle on Federal capital expenditures.

Many Members are becoming familiar with the Federal capital budget idea. As BILL CLINGER points out, a primary use of a separate listing of capital projects would be "a conscious balancing of the Nation's operating costs and national infrastructure needs." The current piecemeal process of project authorization has led not only to pork-barreling but also to serious disinvestment in maintenance of our huge Federal assets in roads, bridges, transit systems, water systems, and all other items of the Government's physical plant.

I hope the House will carefully consider the comments of BILL CLINGER, a leading thinker on the national capital budget concept.

[From the New York Times, Feb. 2, 1982]

CAPITAL-BUDGETING

(By Willian F. Clinger, Jr.)

WASHINGTON.—The Government must turn its attention to the national infrastructure—highways, sewers, ports, bridges, water systems—if the economy is to expand.

So far, the providing of supply-side incentives to the private sector to promote national economic renewal has excluded attention to infrastructure problems, but that is a risky course. Indeed, "America in Ruins," a 1981 report by the National Governors Association, states that up to two-thirds of our towns and cities cannot accommodate new economic growth because local infrastructures are either worn out or undersized. The cost of reversing this decline is staggering. But the consequences of not doing so are even worse to contemplate.

The Federal Highway Administration estimates the cost of repairing or replacing America's deficient bridges at $41 billion. Aside from $7 billion worth of deferred maintenance that is needed, the outlay required to preserve the Interstate Highway System, which represents only 1 percent of the nation's roads, is estimated at $1.4 billion annually through 1991.

Unfortunately, these statistics, though somewhat known in Washington, nonetheless usually do not focus attention on infrastructure problems because of the more immediate demands placed on the Federal budget to meet the growing costs of current programs, especially entitlements. This is particularly true in a period of fiscal restraint. It may take a catastrophe to focus our attention on infrastructure problems.

Congressional efforts to evaluate spending priorities tend to ignore infrastructure needs, principally because the Federal budget does not distinguish between operating costs and capital expenditures. Past efforts to distinguish between these two categories have failed, largely because of criticism that doing so would result in large expenditures on public-works projects at the expense of more-immediate human needs.

In a new approach to capital-expenditures budgeting, the Government could neutralize this concern by mandating that national infrastructure needs be presented in the budget apart from operating expenses, while at the same time not requiring additional spending for them. Under this approach, infrastructure needs would be catalogued in the budget. This would enable Congress to set spending priorities with a clearer understanding of long-term ramifications, especially the consequences of failing to address crucial problems.

As part of its budget deliberations, Congress could attempt a conscious balancing of the Government's operating costs and national infrastructure needs. At present, projects are approved piecemeal, and this practice encourages the pork-barrel approach to decision-making.

The logical first step away from pork-barreling toward a more objective approach is to shift decisions about meeting infrastructure needs away from what has been a purely legislative process. Only the executive branch can provide a fully detailed analysis of infrastructure requirements nationwide so that an inventory of these needs can be juxtaposed against other budgetary requirements. At the same time, an assessment can be made of Federal, state, and local responsibility for various infrastructures.

At present, no single Federal agency is responsible for defining or monitoring capital investments. As a result, assets that are capital investments to some agencies may be considered current expenses to others—for example, Agency A may view new office furniture as a capital outlay, and Agency B may view it as a standard annual expense—despite the practice since 1951 of summarizing the investment, operating, and other outlays of the Government each fiscal year.

While the idea of writing a budget that incorporates capital expenditures has received a somewhat less than enthusiastic response in the past, largely because of the complexities involved, there is no reason why a more limited approach dealing specifically with infrastructure needs could not be used effectively.

Is is unfortunate that a large and growing number of communities find their economic revitalization efforts hamstrung because of the condition of their basic public facilities. This is a situation that cannot be overlooked by an economic plan dedicated to a "full investment" philosophy. It is difficult to foresee capital investment increasing rapidly unless the business community is convinced that a prosperous future is possible.●

INTRASTATE QUARANTINES OF ANIMALS AND POULTRY UNDER EXTRAORDINARY EMERGENCY CONDITIONS

HON. WILLIAM C. WAMPLER

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation, at the request of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, that would authorize intrastate quarantines of animals and poultry under extraordinary emergency conditions.

This bill would expand the powers of the Secretary of Agriculture after he has declared an extraordinary emergency due to the existence of any dangerous, communicable disease of livestock or poultry of the United States. Public Law 87-518, the act of July 2, 1962 (21 U.S.C. 134a(b)) authorizes the Secretary to declare such an extraordinary emergency and take specified actions when he finds that a State or other jurisdiction is not taking adequate measures to control any such disease. USDA presently does not have authority to prevent the intrastate movement of animals, animal carcasses, animal products, or articles in such an emergency situation, unless the Secretary finds that the animals are or have been affected by or exposed to such a disease and that the carcasses, products, and articles were so related to such animals as to be likely to be a means of disseminating such disease. Then he may seize, quarantine, and dispose of the particular animals, carcasses, products, or articles involved.

The Department of Agriculture feels that additional authority is needed to quarantine specific localities and control the intrastate movement of animals, their carcasses, and related products and articles which are not necessarily found to be affected with or exposed to any dangerous communicable disease of livestock and poultry. This additional authority would make it possible for USDA to implement the most effective quarantine controls to prevent the inadvertent intrastate spread of such a disease from affected localities. Uncontrolled movements of livestock and poultry into affected areas can hamper control and eradication efforts by increasing the population of exposed animals needing treatment. The outbreak of exotic Newcastle disease in southern California in 1971-73 and recent outbreaks in March and April of 1980 in California, Virginia, and Pennsylvania clearly demonstrate the need for this additional authority, according to the Department of Agriculture.●

NATIONAL NOTARY ASSOCIATION SILVER ANNIVERSARY

HON. BARRY M. GOLDWATER, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. Speaker, it was 25 years ago when Raymond C. Rothman originated the California Notary Association, which became the National Notary Association 8 years later.

Under Mr. Rothman's leadership for many years, and most recently, under the guidance of Deborah M. Thaw since 1979, the NNA has grown to 40,000 members nationwide. The NNA provides a number of valuable services to its membership, including the publication of "The National Notary" magazine, an information service telephone "hotline" to answer members questions, toll-free; numerous education conferences across the Nation; and international cooperation with the NNA French counterpart.

In a survey NNA conducted in 1975, they found 2.5 million notaries in the United States. The next year, the NNA developed the first ethical training program and ethical code for American notaries, and in that same year, Mr. Rothman was commended by the Department of Justice for participation on the Federal Advisory Committee on False Identification.

For this enormous contribution to the fine group of citizens who help us cope with the increasingly difficult flow of legal papers in our lives, I salute the National Notary Association, its officers and members, on their 25th anniversary.●

NURSING HOME BILL OF RIGHTS

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to submit a resolution expressing the sense of the House that we must preserve basic human dignity and rights for America's nursing home patients through strict enforcement of a nursing home patient's bill of rights.

The Department of Health and Human Services is reviewing regulations that guarantee these rights. As the Department has expressed some hesitation about the need to continue enforcing these regulations, I believe it is critical that Congress declare its intent that they be maintained.

The reasons are compelling. Prior to coming to Congress, I spent 7 years working with senior citizens, including a term as public member of the Oregon Board of Examiners of Nursing Home Administrators. During that time, I heard story after story about abuse of elderly nursing home patients.

Stories of elderly patients who were over drugged.

Stories of patients who were denied even the most basic rights of privacy.

Stories of patients afraid to tell anyone about their predicament for fear of retaliation.

Regrettably, these were not just stories. Too often, they were only too true.

These kinds of abuses first came to widespread national attention during the late 1960's and early 1970's, largely as a result of congressional investigations and hearings. Faced with the damning evidence, Congress required the Secretary of the then Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to issue regulations that would insure basic rights to nursing home patients.

As promulgated, these regulations protect patients from over drugging or other abuses of medication and guarantee them the right to privacy and the right to information about charges and services. The regulations have been in force since 1974 for skilled nursing facilities, and since 1976 for intermediate care facilities. They are needed today more than ever—both for the benefit of the patient—and for the benefit of the institution.

The benefits to the patient are obvious. It is enough that the institutionalized elderly must give up at least a measure of their physical freedom. They should not also be forced to give up their emotional freedom—their sense of dignity and individuality.

For the institution, the guarantee of patients' rights means a happier, more cooperative resident population. Patients who understand their condition, are able to participate in the planning for and implementation of their treatment and are guaranteed basic rights of privacy will feel more positive about the care they are receiving. As a result, they will also be more likely to respond well medically.

Many nursing homes provide quality, humane care—and would do so even without these regulations. We are not concerned about those homes. But the only way we can insure individual freedoms for all nursing home patients in all nursing homes throughout America is by maintaining the current regulations.

Remember, these regulations provide for only the most basic human rights. At the very least, we must guarantee their continued enforcement.

Support for enforcement of nursing home patients' rights has come from a broad spectrum of citizens groups as well as from the American Health Care Association. These groups agree America's nursing home patients have a right to decent care—and to the protection of their individual freedoms.

I hope my colleagues will join me in this very important effort. Senator WILLIAM COHEN and Senator JOHN HEINZ have introduced this resolution in the Senate and are spearheading efforts for its passage there.●

COOPERATION: THE NATION'S MOST EFFECTIVE WEAPON AGAINST CRIME

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I introduced legislation to correct what I view as a very serious breakdown in cooperation and communication between our Federal parole and prison authorities and local and State law enforcement officials.

Recent articles appearing in the Sacramento Union by K. W. Lee and Dave Miller have brought out into the open a policy of the U.S. Parole Commission which prevents local parole officials from fully cooperating with local law enforcement agencies. The policy of the Parole Commission keeps local officials in the dark about the presence of Federal parolees who have been released into their jurisdiction. Moreover, a related practice of the Federal Bureau of Prisons fails to notify local law enforcement officials of persons who remain under the Bureau's supervision but have been released to a community halfway house.

The Federal practice is rather ironic, particularly in light of the current emphasis on sharing law enforcement information between various authorities at all levels of government. For example, Judge Webster, the Director of the FBI, recently made an address to the International Association of Chiefs of Police entitled, "Cooperation: The Nation's Most Effective Weapon Against Crime."

As we have seen in Sacramento, the current parole and prison policies have created an unnecessary impediment to effective law enforcement, a potentially dangerous threat to local communities, and an unmanageable burden on those responsible for supervising Federal parolees and prisoners. My bill would correct this faulty policy by requiring the Parole Commission and the Bureau of Prisons to disclose certain identifying information on parolees and prisoners to local law enforcement agencies for legitimate law enforcement purposes, including crime prevention and surveillance.

My bill also seeks to bring Federal parole and prisoner release practices in line with those followed by the State of California and other States with regard to searches and seizures.

The bill would require the U.S. Parole Commission and the Federal Bureau of Prisons to promulgate regulations requiring all Federal prisoners released from halfway houses and certain parollees—particularly violent offenders and drug smugglers—to sign a waiver of their fourth-amendment rights against search and seizure as a condition of release. The provision would allow any Federal, State, or local law enforcement officer to conduct a legal search of a parolee's or prisoner's person or property without first obtaining a warrant. If the parolee or prisoner signed such a waiver and then failed to permit a search of his person or property, that alone would be grounds for revoking parole or the prisoner's permission to remain in a nonsecure facility.

Federal and State courts have long upheld the practice of depriving a parolee or prisoner of his fourth-amendment rights against search and seizure. A parolee or prisoner residing in a halfway house is still officially under the supervision of the correctional authorities even though he may be serving the remainder of his term outside of the prison walls. Therefore, his rights are limited in the same manner as a prisoner who remains in confinement.

Crime is regularly identified in national polls as one of the most important issues in the eyes of the American public. The local law enforcement officials in my district assure me that this modest bill will make important improvements in their ability to protect their communities, and at a minimal cost to the Federal or local governments. I believe this is a measure which will appeal to all of your local law enforcement officials and enable you to make a positive contribution to their efforts to reduce the levels of crime in your communities. I urge you to join me as a cosponsor.

I respectfully submit a letter I received from John Kearns, Chief of the Sacramento Police Department to be printed in the RECORD.

CITY OF SACRAMENTO,
DEPARTMENT OF POLICE,
Sacramento, Calif., January 22, 1982.

Hon. VIC FAZIO,
Congressman, Fourth District,
Sacramento, Calif.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FAZIO: The topics of crime, crime prevention and punishment are on the lips of the entire Sacramento community. Outraged citizens are not only demanding that police apprehend criminals, but become more proactive in their approaches to combating the crime wave that has invaded residential streets and the living rooms of their homes.

Faced with diminishing governmental resources, law enforcement agencies must turn to legislative and administrative remedies to provide assistance that will aid in the identification, apprehension and incarceration of criminals. We have identified prison parolees as one group which is responsible for a disproportinate amount of criminal offenses in comparison to their numbers in the general population of the Sacramento area. Indepth studies were conducted to provide information with which action plans could be made to resolve the problem.

Our studies revealed that the City of Sacramento had 12 State penal institutions within a 60 mile radius of our jurisdictional boundaries. The County of Sacramento also was receiving approximately three parolees for each two commitment made to a State institution. Not only were we receiving parolees directly from State institutions, but approximately one third of our parolee population transferred their parole here after initially being released to another county. This becomes even more alarming when you take into consideration that approximately 36% of inmates currently in State institutions have had one or more prior prison sentence.

The predicament caused by Federal parolees is even more frustrating due to the U.S. Parole Commission policy of not providing any information to local law enforcement agencies regarding the number, identity or conditions of parole. Information is only provided when a specific individual is being investigated for a specific crime. Several violent crimes have recently been committed by Federal parolees and/or inmates of Community Correctional Centers which have endangered the lives of citizens and the lives of local law enforcement officers investigating these offenses. In all of these cases local law enforcement did not have any knowledge of their presence in our community and in some cases thought they were presently serving sentences in the Federal Bureau of Prisons.

The parolee problems involving parolees from State institutions are being resolved through the enactment of legislation requiring State agencies to notify local law enforcement agencies within ten days of the release of any parolee that is residing or temporarily domiciled in our jurisdiction. In addition to this, information including photographs, fingerprints and a criminal history are provided with the notification. Administrative steps have also been taken to return parolees to the county of commitment and legislation is pending which will codify the administrative policy.

The same steps need to be taken to resolve parolee problems at the Federal level. Listed below are my recommendations for corrective legislation.

1. The name, residence, conditions of parole, photograph, fingerprints and criminal history of all Federal parolees should be provided within ten days of their release to local jurisdictions.

2. Provide the name, residence, photograph, fingerprints and criminal history of all Federal prisoners released to non secure facilities or half way houses in a community.

3. The conditions of parole should include a provision allowing a search of the parolee and any property under his control without a warrant for the term of parole.

4. Any violation of the conditions of parole should result in a parole hold being issued for the detention of the parolee. Parole holds are not issued in the Eastern District of California if it is felt they would interfere with the local bail process.

5. The safety of the community should be the primary factor in deciding whether or not to disclose parolee information to local law enforcement agencies.

6. Community Correctional Centers or Half Way Houses should be covered by the standards applicable to local detention facilities. If no standards exist at the Federal level, steps should be taken to develop some.

7. The criteria for placement in Community Correctional Centers should exclude career criminals and those with a history of violent crimes.

These legislative and/or administrative recommendations will provide needed assistance in combating our rising crime rate by improving the capability of local law enforcement to investigate crimes and apprehend criminals.

I also would like to state that it has been particularly gratifying to have local elected representatives of Federal and State Government respond so swiftly and in a positive manner to the needs of law enforcement and the community it serves.

Sincerely,

JOHN P. KEARNS,
Chief of Police.●

EXPORT-IMPORT BANK AND DEATH IN AFGHANISTAN

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, it was only a few days ago that the Committee for a Free Afghanistan passed the word to this office that a young man who had been in the United States working selflessly for his people in his native land met his untimely death on combat against Soviet troops and equipment on December 17, 1981.

It was on January 4, 1980, that the New York Times pointed out that equipment built at the Kama River plant in the Soviet Union with American money—and technology, is being used against the innocents of Afghanistan. Was it not back on March 5, 1973, that the first Export-Import Bank Credit to the tune of $153,950,000 was approved to finance this advance of Soviet military power that would end up promoting death and destruction world wide. As if to add insult to the death of innocents, the Soviets received the loan at 6 and 7 percent interest with no demand to begin paying off this loan before October 10, 1977. That is approximately 4½ years.

It is no small secret that Americans returning from Southeast Asia related the amount of U.S. technology being used against them. Should not the American taxpayer put a stop to this financing of murder by the Soviets? Would not it be wonderful if an American could buy a car these days at 6 to 7 percent interest with no downpayment for some 4½ years? It is high time that all of this nonsense cease.

On this date, for the benefit of my colleagues, I share the reality of only one Afghan named Hakim who met death as a result of U.S. technology. I pray that it will not be the death of the son of a businessman who sold his soul for a dollar to the Soviet Union, that will halt this monstrous practice. Let us put the Export-Import Bank out of business and save this Nation some money. It is money that most of us know from what is happening in Poland that will never be paid back.

We are lucky if we get the interest paid, let alone the principal. And in the final analysis let us remember that we cannot pay back the sin of the death of Hakim—nor the sin of future Americans killed with the fruits of American technical known-how—and money.

The release on Christmas Eve, 1981 from the Committee for a Free Afghanistan follows:

COMMITTEE FOR A FREE AFGHANISTAN,
Washington, D.C, December 24, 1981.

Many who have worked with us in the cause of a Free Afghanistan remember Hakim, the young man who worked selflessly as a volunteer for the Committee. For months he gave six to eight hours a day to us, his only reward being the satisfaction that he was working for the cause of his country and his people.

Hakim was an Afghan. He came to study in America at the age of 14. When his country was invaded by the Soviet Union, the fires of patriotism awakened in him. The Pathan warrior in him burned to fight for his country. After a while the work of the Committee was not enough for this son of Afghanistan.

We mourn his death now. Hakim was killed in combat in Afghanistan on December 17. Buried where he fell, with a proper Islamic burial, Hakim has, in accordance with Islam, gone to his reward as a martyr in a holy war. He has paid the ultimate price demanded for the freedom of man.

We sorrow with his parents, who only recently escaped with their lives from Afghanistan, and with his brothers and sisters. He was a noble youth, the future of Free Afghanistan, a young man of courage who did honor to his people and his cause. He was 21.●

COMMENDING ERIE COMMUNITY COLLEGE

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, it is with a special degree of pleasure that I draw the attention of my colleagues to the recent completion of the new city campus of the Erie Community College in Buffalo, N.Y. The official ceremonies for the new campus will take place on February 15, 1982.

Erie Community College, known to us in western New York as ECC, takes a bold step as it moves into its new facility. But that is nothing unusual for an academic institution which has always been at the forefront of new endeavors. The new city campus is located in the renovated former U.S. Post Office Building in Buffalo. This well-known historic landmark, in the heart of the community which ECC serves so faithfully, was built for the Pan-American Exposition of 1901.

The beautiful renovated building blends the old and the new—classic architectural style with modern classrooms, offices, and equipment. It is altogether fitting that the campus should blend the old and new because the institution itself has a rich heritage of past contributions to our community and a future marked by open horizons and opportunities.

The commitment of money and expertise to make the new campus a reality represents a cooperative effort by Erie County and New York State to encourage both the continued academic excellence of ECC and the revitalization of the downtown Buffalo area.

Already, classes are underway at the new campus. Each day 1,650 students are enriching their lives and opening new doors for the future. This vital undertaking is echoed at the college's other two campuses in Erie County.

For those of us who live in the Erie County area, ECC has always been synonymous with excellence in achievement and unsurpassed service to the local community. So, too, has New York State and the Nation benefited from the contributions of ECC's faculty, administration and, of course, its graduates. The Congress commends Erie Community College for these many contributions.

Mr. Speaker, I know that my colleagues join with me in extending our congratulations to ECC on its move to its new campus and we wish the school continued success.●

PITTWAY: A SHINING EXAMPLE OF CORPORATE SOCIAL RESPONSIBILITY

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, a Washington Post editorial asked recently whether corporations should be expected to fill the money gap for social programs that have been cut by the Federal Government. It cited a survey just completed by a New York based business research institute, the results of which imply that it is naive to count on corporations to take up the slack.

This survey of 427 major corporations indicated that only 6 percent planned to increase gifts in response to the President's request. The report suggested that increased donations would be essentially a function of higher profits and inflation. If, on the other hand, the corporations felt squeezed, these same contributions would be reduced.

Apparently the survey also highlighted what it calls an important flaw in the plan to shift responsibility to businesses. That is, the propensity of corporations to support only certain kinds of popular and relatively uncontroversial endeavors. Arts and education would be likely recipients of aid, not the social programs that have traditionally received Federal Government support and which are not considered to be the responsibility of corporations.

I am proud to say that I have a corporation headquartered in my district that defies this editorial's expectations as well as those of the survey that it cites. The Pittway Corp., based in Northbrook, Ill., is a business that obviously takes very seriously its role in picking up the slack in Government funding. In fact, Pittway recently announced that it is giving $400,000 to the State Department of Children and Family Services for a 3-year research project aimed at preventing child abuse and neglect. Their gift will be matched by DCFS to fund four or five community based programs statewide. The $150,000 to $200,000 grants for the fiscal year beginning July 1 will be awarded in a competition to select the most creative proposals. It is hoped that the project will prove that abuse and neglect can be curbed by addressing some of the causes—teenage pregnancies, low-birth-weight babies and adequate parenting skills—as well as providing support services for parents.

Pittway's gift is certainly unparalleled in Illinois history and provides a very hopeful sign of the willingness of the private sector boldly to assume a new and more socially responsible role—taking up where Government leaves off. I would encourage other businesses to follow Pittway's innovative and generous lead.●

NOT A PEEP ON CHILE

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I am including in today's RECORD an editorial which recently appeared in the New York Times, criticizing the blatant failure of the Reagan administration's "quiet diplomacy" in correcting human rights violations in Chile.

Wherever it has been applied, this quiet diplomacy has become a camouflage for U.S. complicity in the most brutal human rights violations. In the case of Chile, this quiet diplomacy has paved the way for the Pinochet regime to engage in massive repression without a peep of protest from our Government. As the editorial states:

Chile's military chiefs have evidently decided that the Reagan Administration will cause them no trouble on human rights.

I urge the Reagan administration to abandon this quiet diplomacy, which amounts to diplomacy by acquiescence, and pursue human rights as a fundamental component of U.S. foreign policy. I commend the editorial to the attention of my colleagues:

NOT A PEEP ON CHILE

Chile's military chiefs have evidently decided that the Reagan Administration will cause them no trouble on human rights. On Dec. 10, which Mr. Reagan had just joined in proclaiming as Human Rights day, they arrested at least seven dissidents, including three officers of Chile's Human Rights Commission.

Last August, the junta showed comparable brazenness. Jaime Castillo, the commission president, was banished immediately following a visit to Chile by Jeane Kirkpatrick, the United States delegate to the United Nations. Mrs. Kirkpatrick was thus repaid for her call for improved ties with Santiago. The more Chile persists in these jailings and expulsions, the more insulting the implied judgment about Mr. Reagan's backbone. At the United Nations, American delegates have persistently voted against any censure of Chile on grounds that Latin America has been invidiously singled out for censure.

But Latin democracies, in making the same point, abstain. And in regional forums like the Organization of American States, Washington has yet to utter a critical peep about Chile, where a return to civilian rule is not even promised before the end of the decade.

To be sure, "quiet" diplomacy is supposed to produce reforms in anti-Communist tyrannies like Chile. The arrests on Human Rights Day show just what the silent approach truly produces.●

THE CENTENNIAL YEAR OF FINDLAY COLLEGE

HON. MICHAEL G. OXLEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. OXLEY. Mr. Speaker, with these remarks, I would like to commemorate the "Centennial Year of Findlay College," in my hometown of Findlay, Ohio.

Findlay College has been educating young people in the liberal arts tradition for the past 100 years. My esteemed predecessor, Tennyson Guyer, was a 1934 graduate. My father is also an alumnus, so I have a special interest in the college's past and, more importantly, its future.

The articles of incorporation which established Findlay College were signed and sealed on January 28, 1882. Previous to this event, the Churches of God had endeavored for 25 years to begin an institution of higher learning. John Gable, one of the founders, described the nature of the college as follows:

We presume to assay that it will be one in which the spiritual functions of the body as well as the intellectual will become a power for the good to "The Body." (The Church)

A board of trustees was formed and a charter obtained. The city of Findlay donated 10 acres of land and $20,000. The Churches of God also made contributions, and the first building was completed in 1886. Then 10 faculty members began teaching the first 95 students. In June 1889, two degrees were conferred in the first annual commencement.

The main building was damaged by fire twice, in 1917 and 1938. Both times, it was rebuilt. Since then, many other structures have been added. Most recently, the college dedicated Shafer Library and the Croy Physical Education Center in the late 1960's.

William Harris Guyer, the late Congressman Guyer's father, attended Findlay College and served as its president from 1913 to 1926. Tenny apparently inherited his talent for public speaking from his father, who was well known as a preacher throughout Ohio and Pennsylvania. Under his guidance as president, the college experienced the largest enrollment increase in its history and the number of faculty grew to 25. Dr. Guyer died suddenly in 1926, and Findlay College lost an enthusiastic supporter.

As we are all aware, the times have not been easy for small liberal arts colleges. So, this 100th anniversary is indeed a cause for celebration. I congratulate Findlay College on this fine accomplishment.●

DENVER POST: THE NEW NONSENSE

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, the chief of the Denver Post Washington Bureau, Leonard Larsen, recently described President Reagan's state of the Union message as the "New Nonsense," which could very well lead to the balkanization of the States.

The article, from the January 31, 1982, Denver Post, follows:

THE NEW NONSENSE

WASHINGTON.—As President Reagan's chief aides explained prior to the State of the Union speech, his New Federalism proposal has been his "dream" since his days as governor of California.

The federalism the president offered, however, would appear more a plan for fragmentization or balkanization of the states.

The plan would reject the conviction that all Americans are in this together, that the fortunes of a Detroit auto worker are tied to those of a wheat farmer in eastern Colorado, that a New York stockbroker is tied to a Kentucky miner and an Alabama schoolteacher.

Reagan may or may not have deliberately timed announcement of his New Federalism to observations of the centennial of Franklin D. Roosevelt's birth.

It turns out that the balkanization of the states outlined by Reagan is a repudiation of Roosevelt's vision that national problems, whether or not their intensity is suffered equally in all states and cities, are national concerns demanding the national government's attention and resources.

It's easy enough for a former governor of California, who was and maybe still is fond of portraying that state with its immense resources and vitality as a separate nation, to suggest to other states:

"I've got mine. Take care of yourself."

But it's another thing for other states and cities poor in natural, industrial, educational, health and even human resources to be cut adrift and told that federal programs on which they depend are to be the states' responsibility.

On that point, there is a suggestion in the president's State of the Union speech and his "bold and innovative" plan that, aside from his stunned and angry wonder, at the growth of the federal government, he has not kept track of what's happened in this country in the past several decades.

Many of these federal programs grew out of the Roosevelt era and became gargantuan in the Great Society era through the realization of the Congress that national needs couldn't—or wouldn't—be met at the state and local levels.

Reagan acknowledged there are critics who will say, "Our states and local communities are not up to the challenge of a new and creative partnership." But, he continued in an outburst of happy patter, reforms "like reapportionment and the Voting Rights Act" had removed any such doubts and he had "faith in state and local governments" to meet obligations they previously wouldn't or couldn't.

That may cheer the president, but it can't be a cheerful outlook for minorities and the poor and uneducated and the skilled in states whose political leaders still smolder with resentment that federal law inflicted on them the fairness of one man-one vote and universal voting rights.

To suggest, as Reagan did in that sophistry, that forcing federal voting requirements onto many reluctant states cured generations of oppression and indifference and had also produced financial ability independent of federal aid is simply nonsense.

To insist again, as Reagan did in his speech, that voluntarism can pick up the slack when more than 40 programs—social and welfare, highway construction, mass transit, sewer and domestic water supply and others—become total state obligations is soaring nonsense.

There's the rub in the New Federalism—the provision that the federal government will be shed of its obligations for these programs by 1991 and the states can then "preserve, lower or raise taxes on their own and fund and manage these programs as they see fit."

Perhaps as it's been suggested, the Reagan New Federalism is a display item, not meant for sale but intended to divert attention from the economic woes confronting his administration here and now.

But if he's serious, can the president seriously believe that the generation of elected officials in 1991 is going to rush into a round of increased taxes to help folks and functions the federal government has abandoned as no longer necessary and not a national responsibility?●

ELIMINATION OF PUBLIC HEARING REQUIREMENTS OF THE PLANT QUARANTINE ACT

HON. WILLIAM C. WAMPLER

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Speaker, today I am joined by Chairman DE LA GARZA in introducing legislation that would eliminate an unnecessary regulatory requirement of the U.S. Department of Agriculture Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service, commonly referred to as APHIS.

APHIS is responsible for promulgating regulations under the Plant Quarantine Act to restrict the importation into the United States of certain articles in order to prevent the introduction of injurious plant diseases or insect pests; and for quarantining States, territories, or districts of the United States or portions thereof with respect to certain movements of specified articles to prevent the spread of these plant diseases or insect infestations. The Plant Quarantine Act requires that a public hearing be held before a regulation may be promulgated for any of these purposes.

The public hearing requirements of the Plant Quarantine Act of 1912 are outmoded. These requirements were established in order to encourage public participation in rulemaking procedures. However, the public hearing requirements were promulgated prior to the enactment of the Administrative Procedures Act, which contains provisions with respect to public participation in rulemaking proceedings which are considerably more comprehensive.

Based on experience, it has been ascertained that benefits derived from public hearings based on the Plant Quarantine Act are minimal. These same goals can be achieved more efficiently by publication in the Federal Register in accordance with the requirements of the Administrative Procedures Act, as set forth in sections 552 and 553 of title 5 of the United States Code. By utilizing the opportunities for written public comments, in most instances, expenditure of funds would be minimal and primarily employed for review of the comments submitted. In addition, direct contact would be possible with affected industries and governments to obtain additional views. The cost of conducting public hearings under the present requirements on average has been estimated at $4,000 for a public hearing. The Department of Agriculture has provided statistics which would indicate that this proposed legislation to eliminate the public hearing requirement under the Plant Quarantine Act would not deny the public opportunities for participation in the rulemaking proceedings, but would eliminate an unnecessary regulatory requirement. At the same time, a small savings in money would be noted and the time of Federal officials and State officials participating in these hearings should also be considered, as it has been estimated that the public participation has amounted to only about 47 percent of the total attendance at such hearings.

In these days of seeking ways to effect budget savings, it seems only reasonable to enact this legislation into law.●

FUTURES TRADING ACT OF 1982

HON. ED JONES

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, today Congressman JEFFORDS and I are introducing a bill entitled the Futures Trading Act of 1982 which has been submitted to Congress by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. The bill is being introduced by request.

As chairman and ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Conservation, Credit and Rural Development, which has legislative jurisdiction over the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, we have scheduled hearings on this bill for February 23, 24, and 25.

Any Members having views on this bill or the general area of reauthorization of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission are invited to testify at the hearing or submit written testimony to the subcommittee.●

UNFAIR TRADING

HON. PAUL FINDLEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday February 3, 1982

● Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am increasingly concerned that our present market orientation in farm policy is being undermined by unfair trading practices among our overseas competitors.

I do not fault the present administration. Surely, the President has done more to confront this problem than any administration in recent history. At the same time, more work is needed.

During the past year we have seen increasing European Economic Community interest in limiting European imports of corn gluten feed and other feed grain substitutes. Our shipments of these commodities, including grain byproducts, sugar beet pulp, brewers and distillers' grains, and citrus pulp, are running ahead of previous years' levels.

Naturally, our European friends are concerned that these increased imports are forcing the EC to export wheat and barley. However, this is not the case. The EC's own internal policies of encouraging surplus production through artificially high price supports are the cause of their current problems.

In recent months we have seen the European Community discuss an import duty or variable levy on feed grain substitutes. We have seen them negotiate an informal voluntary restraint agreement with Thailand over manioc, another imported feed grain substitute of concern to them. Now, the Europeans apparently are interested in negotiating a voluntary restraint agreement with the United States. I think this would be ill advised.

Similarly, I am concerned about recent EC efforts to impose a tax on vegetable fats and oils. Imposition of such a tax would cut into our exports of soybeans; exports we now value at about $3.6 billion each year.

Given the present cost-price squeeze in our agricultural sector, and given the very modest farm program we passed in the closing days of the first session of this Congress, there is no way that we, as representatives of the people, can sanction unfair trading practices abroad.

Mr. Speaker, I urge all of my colleagues to support this administration's efforts to reduce the trade barriers which are undermining our efforts to improve economic conditions for everyone.●

TO RESTORE HUMAN RIGHTS AND ECONOMIC HEALTH TO NORTHERN IRELAND

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, today I am cosponsoring H.R. 5163, a bill to provide $50 million in first-time economic assistance to Northern Ireland. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this vital legislation, and I commend the bill's author, my colleague from New York, MARIO BIAGGI, for his continuing leadership in this issue.

H.R. 5163 provides $50 million in rehabilitation, construction, humanitarian, and other economic and revitalization assistance. The aid would be administered by the Agency for International Development (AID) which would work in consultation with all entities who have a vested economic interest in Northern Ireland.

This bill conditions the award of any aid to a declaration of intent by the British Government to withdraw their presence from Northern Ireland in a phased and orderly fashion. (If this declaration includes intent to promote reunification of the two Irelands, aid may also be awarded to areas in the Republic which have been economically affected by the conflict in the North.)

I believe this measure represents a positive, innovative approach to the economic devastation which has befallen Northern Ireland as a result of the conflict there. At the same time, it directly addresses the causes of that conflict by providing an incentive for the British Government to withdraw its presence. The bill seeks to restore both human rights and economic health to Northern Ireland.

I am including in today's RECORD a copy of this important legislation, which I commend to the attention of my colleagues:

H.R. 5163

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new chapter:

"CHAPTER 11—ECONOMIC RELIEF AND REHABILITATION ASSISTANCE FOR NORTHERN IRELAND

"SEC. 498. AUTHORIZATION AND LIMITATIONS.—(a) The President is authorized to furnish assistance, on such terms and conditions as the President may determine, for use in providing economic relief and rehabilitation—

"(1) for the citizens of Northern Ireland, subject to the requirements of subsections (d) and (e)(1) of this section; and

"(2) for the citizens of the Republic of Ireland, subject to the requirements of subsections (d), (e)(1), and (e)(2) of this section.

Such assistance shall be used solely for humanitarian, rehabilitation, construction, and other economic relief purposes.

"(b) There are authorized to be appropriated to the President to carry out this chapter $50,000,000. Amounts appropriated under this subsection are authorized to remain available until expended.

"(c) Assistance under this chapter shall be administered by the Administrator of the Agency for International Development, in consultation with an advisory board appointed by the President after consultation with the Congress. The advisory board shall be responsible for overseeing the use of such assistance and for advising the Administrator with respect to who should receive the funds made available under this chapter. Before making its recommendations to the Administrator with respect to the use of such funds, the advisory board shall engage in full and complete consultation with the Government of Great Britain, the Government of the Republic of Ireland, units of local government and elected representatives in Northern Ireland, and all other segments of the community in Northern Ireland. Members of the advisory board shall serve without compensation, but shall be reimbursed for travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, in accordance with section 5703 of title 5, United States Code, while engaged in their duties as members of the advisory board.

"(d) Funds made available to carry out this chapter may be obligated only if—

"(1) at least thirty calendar days prior to such obligation, the Administrator of the Agency for International Development submits to the Congress a report which describes how the funds will be used and who will be responsible for dispersing the funds; and

"(2) the Congress does not adopt, within thirty calendar days after receiving such report, a concurrent resolution stating that the Congress objects to the proposed use of funds as described in the report.

"(e)(1) The assistance authorized by this chapter may be furnished only if the Government of Great Britain declares its intention to initiate a phased and orderly withdrawal of the British presence from Northern Ireland.

"(2) If the declaration required by paragraph (1) of this subsection includes a declaration by the Government of Great Britain that it intends to seek or promote a reunification of Northern Ireland with the Republic of Ireland, then assistance may be provided for the citizens of the Republic of Ireland under subsection (a)(2) of this section."●

TERRORISM BILL

HON. JOSEPH M. McDADE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, the kidnaping and recent release of Gen. James Dozier has once again made us painfully aware of the plague of terrorism. Terrorist attacks, especially those on diplomats and other government officials, have been increasing rapidly. In 1980 alone, there were 280 terrorist attacks on U.S. embassies, resulting in 10 people being killed and 94 injured. Clearly the security of our diplomats is a serious problem.

There have been far too many Americans participating in international terrorism overseas. The most notorious example of this has been the case of Edmund Wilson and Frank Terpil. Wilson and Terpil have been paid millions of dollars by Libya's tyrant dictator Muammer el-Qadhafi to supply sophisticated weapons and their own expertise to support Libya's campaign of international terrorism. This international terrorist support ring has been active for at least 5 years, with clients such as Idi Amin, the Palestine Liberation Organization, and other international terrorist groups.

Activities of this type are an embarrassment to our Nation. There is a general international expectation that countries will take the appropriate steps to reduce terrorism and prevent its export to other states. We are quick to criticize Cuba, Libya and other nations of exporting terrorism, yet we are embarrassed when Wilson, Terpil and other Americans participate in the same types of activity. The only difference seems to be that Wilson, Terpil and others are acting for personal gain and not for nationalistic goals.

International terrorism is directed against the existing system of international order. It is a crime against the state, and it is intended to break down the relationships between nations. Terrorists work to create a general feeling of official powerlessness. Just a microscopic percentage of the population can tie up an entire country. This results from the overriding indifference of terrorists to their impact on innocent bystanders. They are motivated solely by money or by political conviction.

Terrorists tend to operate in countries which take a less firm stand against terrorism. I am deeply concerned that this country is becoming vulnerable to terrorist attacks. Although we have developed sophisticated security systems to protect individuals and property, we have not adopted tough laws prohibiting our citizens from hiring themselves out as terrorists. I was shocked to learn that there is no Federal law which prohibits persons such as Edmund Wilson and Frank Terpil from selling their services to foreign governments and terrorist groups. Although these two notorious terrorists have been indicted on various charges, there is no way to indict them for the act of selling their services to Libya.

Today I am introducing a bill which will close this gap in the law. My bill simply makes it unlawful for any citizen to provide arms, ammunition, or related supplies to any group with the likelihood that they will be used for terrist purposes. Further, the legislation I am introducing will prohibit the financing, planning, training, or other assistance for any act of international terrorism. Violators will be subject to fines and imprisonment.

Enactment of this legislation will further American foreign and domestic policy goals. A large portion of terrorism has an anti-American goal and is intended to subvert activities of the American Government. Terrorist attacks on American embassies and diplomats have reached the level that they are affecting the operations of American personnel overseas. Further, Americans are using the channels of interstate and foreign commerce to provide support for foreign terrorists. Terrorist attacks cause disruption to American commerce by destroying goods and materials and by creating a need for greater security measures to protect the channels of commerce.

Mr. Speaker, Congress needs to take decisive action to show that this Nation does not tolerate its citizens' participation and support of terrorist activities. Therefore, I urge prompt action on the bill which I am introducing today.●

ACHIEVEMENTS AND FAILURES OF THE 97TH CONGRESS: AN OVERVIEW

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, as we look back over the 1st session of the 97th Congress, efforts to balance the budget, cut taxes, and ease our economic problems are major successes which come to the fore.

Over the past 4 weeks, in a letter to my constituents, I outlined these major achievements as well as other substantive legislation my fellow colleagues and I have dealt with over the past year. These reports are included as follows:

ACHIEVEMENTS AND FAILURES OF THE 97TH CONGRESS: AN OVERVIEW

When we look back over the accomplishments of the first session of the 97th Congress, surely the most important one was the action taken to solve the economic problems facing the nation: high interest rates, federal deficits, inflation, low productivity and unemployment.

This grim list of problems was addressed by President Reagan in his tough budget proposals that were translated into action by the 97th Congress. This action holds the promise of long-term economic growth for the nation; steering it back onto the correct course leading to fiscal stability.

President Reagan's campaign commitment to restructure the priorities of the federal government was strengthened by the electoral landslide with which he won the Presidency. His victory must be interpreted as a mandate from the people to gain control of federal spending and to ease the ever-increasing tax burden borne by the American public.

The President's program for economic growth was based on proposals that I helped to develop in the Joint Economic Committee. These proposals emphasized: spending cuts to reduce government borrowing; reduction in the money supply; tax cuts to provide incentives to work, save and invest, and the elimination of costly and excessive regulation.

Reduction in federal spending is essential if the government is to reduce its deficit. Financing of the federal deficit contributes to high interest rates because federal borrowing crowds out private borrowing from the available supply of loanable funds. The law of supply and demand pushes interest rates up.

Growth of the money supply must be curbed if the federal government is to get a handle on inflation. For most of the past decade, the federal government helped to finance the deficit by printing money. This increase in the money supply adversely affected the inflation rate, driving up the prices of a fixed amount of goods.

President Reagan's strong powers of persuasion helped to push tax cuts through the 97th Congress. These cuts, to be phased in over a three-year period, provide incentives to work, save and invest. This is done by increasing the rate of return on investment. In turn, this will add to the amount of loanable funds, lower interest rates, finance capital investment and create employment opportunities.

Finally, the Reagan Administration worked hard to return decision-making to the hands of state and local authorities. This was accomplished through the creation of block grants, which replaced many of the categorical grants. This action helped to reduce the administrative costs of federal programs as well as the associated red tape and regulation. I have long supported the concept of block grants because they allow states and localities to deal more effectively with the unique problems facing them. And who knows how to handle state and local problems better than those closest to them?

The hard times that we are experiencing now were created, in large part, by the misguided policies of past administrations and Congresses. We cannot expect to undo years of mishandling the economy overnight. We must not view the policies enacted by the 97th Congress as a panacea, but rather as a sound program to help the nation regain economic health. Overall, I believe that, given time, the actions of the 97th Congress will help to mend the nation's fiscal ills and set it back onto the road to economic recovery.

The 97th Congress convened last January to hear President Carter's final State of the Union address and to receive his final budget submission.

For fiscal year 1982, President Carter proposed a 12-percent increase, bringing federal spending to $739 billion. It had been just $366 billion in 1976, President Ford's last year in office.

Within a matter of weeks, President Reagan took office and proposed significant reductions in the Carter budget for 1982. Congressmen, long accustomed to seeing new Chief Executives conveniently forget their campaign rhetoric after Inauguration Day, were stunned to find that this new leader was not prepared to conduct business as usual.

Many legislators were even more surprised to find that President Reagan, unlike his predecessor, was able to generate the kind of public support for his program that translates directly to congressional cooperation.

In a dramatic vote last spring, even the Democrat-controlled House voted to go along with the Republican majority in the Senate in adopting a budget resolution embodying President Reagan's proposal to cut in half the rate of growth in federal spending suggested by President Carter.

Then, skillfully using a little-known process called reconciliation, President Reagan was able to make the budget targets stick by forcing congressional committees to modify programs under their jurisdiction. It was a sharp break from past practice, which saw budget targets ignored by committees voting to increase their favorite projects.

Unfortunately, before the new austere budget could take effect, economic indicators governed by past budget-busting deficits began to slip out of control. High interest rates and rising unemployment sent projections for the 1982 deficit above acceptable levels.

President Reagan responded with a new round of budget cuts which were met with less enthusiasm by a Congress weary of paring back favored programs. When Congress sent him a continuing resolution for fiscal 1982 that exceeded his new targets, President Reagan responded with a veto which was quickly upheld.

At the end of this remarkable year, a Congress previously considered incorrigible had given the President $41 billion of the $48 billion he proposed in reductions of anticipated spending. Over a three-year period, the cuts amount to $130 billion of the $135 billion requested.

Why is it so crucial to bring the federal budget under control and to lower the budget deficit? The answer is obvious when we look at the negative impact that skyrocketing deficits have on the economy. First of all, financing the federal deficit sharply cuts into the amount of loanable funds. With the federal government's increased demand in the credit markets, interest rates are forced up. Secondly, if the federal government helps to finance the deficit through increasing the money supply, as it did through most of the seventies, high inflation rates occur with more money chasing a fixed amount of goods.

Slowly the nation is beginning to feel the positive effects of these budget provisions. It will take time to pull ourselves out of the current recession, but the signs of recovery are clear: The inflation rate has fallen below 10 percent for 1981 and the prime interest rate hovers near 15 percent. Both of these economic indicators continue to fall.

With this, I feel confident that the 1982 budget will be considered a great achievement of the first session of the 97th Congress—an achievement that signaled the end of increasing government involvement in our lives.

The dramatic economic recovery program proposed by President Reagan and enacted by the 97th Congress represents a significant departure from the economic policies which have dominated federal actions for the past 50 years.

The central act which makes this the most revolutionary change in economic policy since Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal is the across-the-board cut in personal income tax rates. Other tax cuts in the seventies differed from the Reagan tax cut in two important ways.

First, the earlier tax cuts merely offset part of the effect of bracket creep, a term which describes the phenomenon which forces taxpayers into higher tax brackets as they receive wage increases designed to keep their earnings up with the inflation rate. Typically, taxpayers still paid more taxes even after these cuts. The Reagan tax cut, on the other hand, will result in all taxpayers paying less taxes after it is phased in over three years. After that, an indexing provision will kick in to prevent bracket creep from reoccurring.

Second, the earlier cuts focused predominately on such gimmicks as rebates and changes in the standard deduction, which gave taxpayers a few additional dollars to spend, but which do nothing to change economic behavior. The Reagan tax cut, by reducing marginal tax rates, will provide incentives which will provide additional work effort, saving and investment. These elements are vital to robust economic growth, which will fuel new job opportunities and rising living standards.

As the ranking Republican on the Joint Economic Committee, I helped forge a bipartisan coalition in 1979 behind the new theories on which the Reagan tax cut was based. I worked diligently in 1981 to ensure that the Reagan program was enacted.

The fight for passage was a tough one. While the Democratic Congress seemed willing to pass an accelerated depreciation bill to stimulate industrial expansion, an across the board personal tax rate reduction caused more friction.

Opponents argued that upper-income earners would receive more money from the tax cut than would lower-income earners.

The fear of uneven individual tax distribution was unfounded. The across the board tax cut was aimed at reducing the tax burden for all taxpayers by the same percentage. The percentage of the tax burden borne by each major income group was exactly the same before or after the tax rate reduction.

The major difference between the President's tax cut bill and the proposal offered by the House democrats was that the Democratic proposal would provide less tax relief for individuals because it would limit tax relief to two instead of three years, totalling only a 15 percent reduction in individual tax rates instead of a 25 percent reduction.

In another of his stunning Congressional victories in 1981, President Reagan's proposal prevailed. The tax cut will stimulate incentives to work, save and invest by affecting rates of return on capital and labor. The additional private savings will increase economic growth, expand the tax base and increase employment.

New private savings will help increase economic growth by financing private investment. This will mean new job opportunities. It will also mean an expanded tax base which will help lower the deficit. Increased industrial output will place new goods on the shelves which will in turn hold prices down.

Increased private savings is the critical factor. For this reason, I urged President Reagan to concentrate more of the tax cut on the marginal tax rate applied to income from savings and investment. The final version of the tax plan was a modified version of the savings incentive plan I originated in the House. I believe this will help assure strong economic growth in the later years of the tax cut.

It is important to remember that, as revolutionary as these changes are, we must not expect the economy to turn around overnight. However, I have confidence in the new policies we have implemented this year. We can expect a much brighter future, characterized by healthy economic growth, rising living standards for workers and new job opportunities for the unemployed—all in a less inflationary climate.

For those of us who have fought for the principles of limited government, strong foreign policy and the pursuit of world peace through military strength, this session of the 97th Congress has been an unquestionable success.

Following the lead of a powerful and popular president, Congress slashed government spending, cut taxes, increased defense spending and basically sought to bring an overregulated federal bureaucracy under control.

The most successful attempt to curtail federal government intervention was achieved under the reconciliation legislation passed last July. Domestic aid programs in the fields of health, education and social services were transformed into block grants shifting power from the federal government to states and localities. The final bill grouped 19 programs into four block grants replacing existing categorical programs.

I have always supported the concept of block grants because they return decisionmaking to state and local authorities who are better able to address problems using first hand knowledge.

Congress also proved that it shares President Reagan's belief in American security through military strength by passing a $200 billion appropriations bill for defense. In addition, Congress approved plans for the production of the MX missile and the B-1 bomber, actions designed to enhance the nation's defense capabilities.

The B-1 bomber is an essential replacement for the aging B-52 in overall strategic planning. The B-1 will correct the arms imbalance with the Soviet Union, tipping the scales in our favor and assuring peace through strength.

The MX missile is another strategic weapon that will strengthen our national arsenal. Both the MX and the B-1 bomber stand as a symbol of support for the president's nuclear arms reduction proposal to the Soviet Union and yet serve as a bargaining point when dealing with Moscow.

Foreign affairs were highlighted as Congress passed the first foreign assistance legislation since 1979. Among its major provisions, U.S. military aid was increased while some contributions to international development banks were spread out to reduce federal spending.

On the domestic front, Congress enacted a comprehensive agriculture re-authorization bill which struck a compromise between agricultural business interests and the Administration's budget restrictions. Although the bill was not particularly popular, the alternative would have been to revert back to an antiquated and expensive permanent farm law which was out of touch with farmers needs. The final version of the bill continued major price supports, pruned existing support rates for dairy products and maintained previous sugar and peanut programs.

In the energy area, Congress dealt with two major issues that affected Ohioans: the Alaskan pipeline waivers and the takeover of domestic oil companies.

I opposed the Alaskan pipeline waivers requested by the President because they forced consumers to incur the cost of the pipeline construction before its completion, without assurances that the project would ultimately benefit those who had to foot the bill. Over my protests and after considerable debate, Congress approved the waiver package.

I introduced legislation to impose a moratorium on the takeover of medium-sized domestic oil companies by major international oil concerns. The bill was intended to remove the takeover threat of Marathon Oil by the Mobil Corporation and to provide time for the Congress to study the implications of such a takeover. The House approved my bill in an eleventh hour victory before its December adjournment. The legislation will have a chilling affect on all large oil company mergers.

Overall, Ohioans have benefitted from the actions of the first session of the 97th Congress. I hope Congress will continue to follow the President's lead to mend the economy, strengthen foreign policy and defense and return the government to the people.●

THE SMALL BUSINESS LITMUS PAPER TEST

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, I want to call your and my colleagues' attention to a fascinating and timely article in the latest issue of Inc. magazine. Inc. is the small business magazine which is edited by Milton D. Stewart, the former Chief Counsel for Advocacy at the Small Business Administration. Over the years, Mr. Stewart has been a vigorous and forward-looking spokesman for small business and the role it can and should play in reinvigorating our Nation's economy. Mr. Stewart is one of the foremost proponents of the Small Business Innovation Development Act (H.R. 4326), the landmark piece of small business and innovation legislation that awaits House action. A companion bill, S. 881, was passed by the Senate last December by a 90-to-0 vote.

H.R. 4326 is an important initiative to reverse the decline of innovation in the United States and the deterioration of our economic base. It would achieve that by tapping the innovative capabilities of the small science and high-technology firms that have been the primary generator of the new ideas and new jobs in our economy. The bill would do that by establishing small business innovation research programs in Federal agencies with large R. & D. budgets. These programs would provide seed money needed to develop high-quality, promising innovative ideas and attract the follow-on private capital essential for commercialization. The SBIR programs would be funded by earmarking a small percentage of the $40 billion Federal R. & D. budget.

H.R. 4326 is a must legislative item for the small business and high-technology communities. As Mr. Stewart has noted, "This is a small business litmus paper bill." Mr. Stewart's column and editorial in the February issue of Inc. presents the case for the Small Business Innovation Development Act in a thorough and cogent manner. I think Members would agree that it would be difficult to oppose H.R. 4326 after reading these pieces.

Following are Mr. Stewart's articles:

SMALL BUSINESS, CONGRESS, AND A LITMUS PAPER BILL

(By Milton D. Stewart)

Never has the small business community had so clear a chance to serve its country as it has in the new congressional session. The Small Business Innovation Research Act, a bill vital to the nation's future competitive capacity, awaits action by the House of Representatives (see The Buck Stops Here, page 132).

The Senate, voting 90-0, enacted its version of the bill (S. 881) on December 8, 1981. On October 22, 1981, the House Small Business Committee, after years of study, unanimously reported out its version (H.R. 4326) 40-0.

But the bill has now been referred to four additional House committees. The Committees on Science and Technology, Armed Services, Energy and Commerce, and Veterans Affairs have all asked to consider it. Death by delay or dismemberment is often what such wholesale referral means. Is this what Speaker Thomas P. ("Tip") O'Neill and his colleagues in the House Democratic leadership intend with their referral rigmarole?

More than 160 of the 435 members of the House have, at this writing, joined in sponsoring the bill. More are joining every day. As noted, both the whole Senate and the House committee with primary jurisdiction have unanimously supported it.

But the bill has its opponents. A small group of bureaucratic zealots, centered largely in the Health and Human Services agencies, fought the bill in the White House.

They lost. The President came out four-square in favor of the Senate version of the bill. In an October 6, 1981, letter to Sen. Warren Rudman (R.-N.H.), he predicted that "all sectors of the economy are likely to benefit from the increased competition and research incentives your legislation would provide."

This statement came after the opposition bureaucrats had roused their academic constituents in the universities, hospitals, and medical schools. "You'd better holler now," they urged, "or we're going to lose some of our ability to feed you money." A barrage of hysterical phone calls and letters resulted.

When they lost the White House battle, they turned the heat on the Senate. Not a single senator was swayed by the scare tactics.

The opposition lost the second round.

The third round takes place in the House. There, the opposition faces more than a remarkably large number of representatives coming forward to sponsor the bill. It faces a 3½-year history on the issue. This bill is now a matter of honor and honesty between the Democratic leadership and the small business community.

It's important that the bill reach the House floor when it ordinarily would—by mid-March. Let your representative know now that this is a small business "litmus paper" bill. You can find out whether he or she is already a sponsor from the honor roll on page 131. If you know your representative is a member of one of the four "extra" committees, ask his or her help in speeding favorable action.

The thunderous 90-0 support the bill received in the Senate is precisely what it deserves in the House. Five committees or 50, Mr. Speaker, just get it to the floor by March 15. Then we can see how close to 435-0 we can come.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ON SMALL BUSINESS INNOVATION

1. Why do its supporters call the Small Business Innovation Act "an urgent national need?"

Sen. Warren Rudman (R-N.H.) led a brilliantly successful fight for this bill in the United States Senate. In his words, "the problem, simply stated, is that of the present decline of the United States from its traditional position of prominence in the field of technology advancements."

We're paying for this decline every day in lost jobs and lost markets. One reason for the decline is an imbalance in the support given to the four parts of our national science base. Large-scale research by big companies, big government laboratories, and big universities has been strongly supported. Small business research has not. The small business sector receives only 3½ percent to 4 percent of federal research-and-development money.

We lead the world in basic science and have for many decades. We spend far more on large-scale technology defense and development than the other free-world nations. Relying on us, these nations can—and do—put more of their public and private research budgets into commercial applications. That's one reason they've been clobbering us competitively.

Small business has proven to be our most efficient industrial application innovator; it's also our best and fastest job creator. Government-sponsored studies have shown small firms are between 1.8 and 2.8 times as innovative as large firms per employee. We need to beef up the support small business receives for research, and we need to do it fast.

Many of the aches and pains of our lagging industries go back a long way. The longer we delay, the longer it will take to recover lost ground. This bill charts a safe and sane program for curing the imbalance that has made us vulnerable. And it does so without allocating additional funds.

2. What exactly will the bill do?

Every federal agency that now spends more than $100 million a year in R&D will have a small business innovation program, modeled on the successful one now run by the National Science Foundation. A tiny share of each agency's budget will be used for the program. The share will very gradually increase over a five-year period. The increase ends when the share reaches 1 percent of the agency's total R&D budget (in the Senate's version of the bill) or 3 percent in the House Committee's version). Small as these percentages are, they could mean as much as $1 billion to $3 billion for small firms over the next five years.

Small high-technology firms will compete for grants to do priority research for the government. Simplified procedures will encourage firms to bid. Competition will be open to all small firms, and experts, in and out of government, will impartially review the proposals. Today, many of the very best small companies won't even bother chasing government contracts. The procedure is too complicated; besides, the rules are stacked against small business.

The government will promote research projects that have potential commercial uses. But the small firms will have to be smart enough to figure out how to use them. Obtaining private venture financing will be the job of the small firm.

We know this approach pays off for the taxpayer. Private industry has already spent 4½ times what the government invested in the first National Science Foundation grants. The Department of Defense has begun to use the same procedures.

3. Who is against the bill, and why?

Several universities and medical schools have expressed opposition. A number of career federal-procurement officials have dug in against the bill. They say they're afraid it will take needed funds from basic science. And they're lobbying representatives and congressional committees with whom they have long-standing relationships.

But, supporters point out, the Senate has adopted amendments to assure that the new program will not disproportionately tap that percentage of an agency's budget earmarked for basic research. Another amendment requires a report in two years by the comptroller general on the program's impact on basic research.

There are enough safeguards to satisfy reasonable people legitimately concerned about basic science. But some in the basic science community and in government want to use this bill to cry the blues generally about Reagan Administration budget cuts. Wrong place, wrong time, wrong target.

Of course, we must maintain a proper level of basic research. But our first and most urgent need is for the kind of applied-research program proposed in this bill. Without such a program, there is less and less justification for taxpayer supported, basic-science expenditures. It is irresponsible and grotesque for a community that receives more than $5.5 billion a year in federal grants to fight this bill.

4. What do the opponents expect to accomplish in the House by having four additional committees chew over the same legislation?

First, they would love to keep the bill from coming to a vote early in the second session of this new congress. They know the odds are overwhelmingly against them in an open vote. If they can stall, debate will have to start all over again next year. Presidential and Senate support may lessen. Small business may get tired.

Second, they can try to load the bill with troublemaking amendments. Four committees are more likely to produce these than one. Maybe they can smuggle a legislative stink bomb into the bill, something the House or Senate or the President can't accept. Again, that might kill the bill for this year. Or maybe they can load the House members in a House-Senate conference committee with opponents, making it impossible for the two houses to agree.

5. Can the opponents of the bill succeed?

The House leaders have the muscle, the votes, and the rules to get the bill through. It will die only under three conditions: (1) if the Speaker and House Democratic leadership connive with the opposition and do nothing, (2) if too many members of Congress either don't know what's going on or think the only folks back home who care are the opponents and their friends, (3) if you and your small business organizations don't speak up. Both your representatives and the House leaders must hear from you. If your representative isn't a sponsor, find out why.

6. Why is this bill a matter of honor and honesty between the House Democratic leadership and the small business community?

I never heard "Tip" O'Neill, Jim Wright, Dick Bolling, or any other House Democratic leader take a sacred oath to bring this bill to the floor by March 15, 1982.

But a Democratic President called a White House Conference on Small Business in January 1980 after a Democratic Congress (including Mr. O'Neill's House) asked him to do so in a piece of legislation. The 1979 version of this bill was introduced in the House by Neil Smith (D-Iowa), then chairman of the House Small Business Committee.

The delegates to the White House Conference voted Mr. Smith's bill—much the same as the present H.R. 4326, introduced by John LaFalce (D-N.Y.)—one of their 15 highest priorities. Very few of these people owned small high-technology firms. But they had come from 57 meetings with more than 25,000 small businesspeople all over the country. They had heard men and women from every kind of industry talk about the problems of overseas technology competition.

Late in 1980, the Speaker named a task force, made up entirely of Democratic representatives, to speed action on the White House Conference recommendations. He chose Neil Smith to chair this task force.

If this five-committee fandango is proof of the House leadership's fairness—OK, if it doesn't last too long. If it is anything else, and this bill doesn't reach the floor early in the second session—well let's just hope in the good name of the nation's oldest surviving political party that it doesn't happen.

7. Why should you care about this bill if your business isn't in high technology? Or if you aren't even a small businessperson?

This bill will benefit the whole country. We are all helped by productivity improvement, by cuts in the cost of capital equipment, by more competitive, cheaper, and better products and processes.

The President and every member of the United States Senate have clearly said the country needs this bill. You and your representative can make it happen now.

EVANSTON HOSPITAL, AETNA, AND "CHOICE": FREE ENTERPRISE MODEL FOR QUALITY, COST-EFFECTIVE HEALTH CARE

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, at a time when we are desperately trying to cut back on our costs, one sector of our economy has effectively evaded our control. Health care costs continue to rise at a rate greater than inflation. Recent statistics show that just last year, health care expenditures rose at the highest rate since World War II.

Numerous proposals have been offered to address this problem. Nevertheless, in attempting to come up with a viable solution, we have been faced with a real dilemma: In an area as essential to the well-being of the American people as health care, is it possible to reduce costs without sacrificing the quality of care we have worked so tirelessly to achieve?

I am proud to report that a hospital in my district is involved in a venture that aspires to meet this challenge. Aetna Life & Casualty has chosen Evanston Hospital in Evanston, Ill., to be the first participant in the formation of an innovative employee medical care program called CHOICE.

Unlike prepaid group practice HMO's, CHOICE would provide individuals with freedom to choose their own personal private physician for primary care. Unlike traditional insurance and Blue Cross/Blue Shield, it would also assure specialty and referral care by physicians and hospitals who are recognized for their excellence. Since at least two-thirds of present claim costs are associated with referral and specialty care, providing these services through specialists and hospitals chosen for their cost effectiveness—such as Evanston Hospital, should cut costs.

In the traditional health care system—the system that has led to drastically high health care costs—physicians who practice wasteful medicine unfortunately are often rewarded with more income. Similarly, hospitals that encourage wasteful physicians derive more income. Responsible physicians and hospitals may well be the ones who actually lose revenue.

Under the proposed CHOICE program, cost-effective clinical decisionmaking and good hospital utilization review are expected to lead to lower program costs. This should attract more patients who require care and, in turn, mean more revenue to the contracting physicians and hospitals. This concept, along with the strengthened primary care physician role and relationship with a strong emphasis on preventative services, are intended to make CHOICE a program designed for cost effectiveness. It is a model that both Aetna and Evanston Hospital expect and encourage competitors to establish elsewhere.

The proposals at the Federal level which seek to restructure radically the health care system have been largely fostered by the inability or nonexistence of other methods to control cost inflation. While structural changes may well have to be made in order to hold down these costs, it is essential that these changes appear in a free economic model rather than in one that is centrally controlled.

I applaud and am intrigued by Aetna and Evanston Hospital's efforts in this area as a most encouraging step by the private sector toward stimulating competition in health care delivery and financing. Those who believe in free economic choice, look forward to CHOICE's success.●

NEW YORK STUDENT SURVEY TO HIGHLIGHT FINANCIAL AID PROGRAMS

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, without any attention to what the last round of budget cuts has done to college students seeking to finance their education, the Reagan administration is proposing—once again—to cut student assistance programs at massive levels. Today's Washington Post states that Pell grants are slated to be slashed from $2.3 billion to $1.4 billion and guaranteed student loans from $3 billion to $2.4 billion.

As a member of the House Education and Labor Committee from New York, a State which represents 10 percent of the national student population, I am deeply concerned about the impact of these cuts without any attention to their effect by sector, by institutional cost, or by student. The New York State Higher Education Services Corporation, which administers the guraranteed student loan program, is conducting a survey on this very issue. For the benefit of my colleagues, I would like to place the testimony of Dr. Dolores Cross, President of the corporation, in the RECORD so that Members might encourage similar efforts in their own States in order to learn just exactly what these budget reductions mean for students and the institutions they attend.

THE STUDENT SURVEY

New York State students receive more financial aid than students in any other state, either per capita or in absolute dollars. The New York State Higher Education Services Corporation administers New York's financial aid and loan programs. Additionally the Corporation coordinates the State's programs with those of other levels of local state and federal government. Thus, the Corporation is deeply involved in New York State's commitment to higher education as a growth and service industry for its citizens.

The State's postsecondary enrollment is about 10 percent of the national enrollment of 11,000,000. The State's students receive about 14–15 percent of the federal financial aid dollar. New York itself will grant almost $277,000,000 in aid to resident students, representing over 30 percent of the national total for all states. Nearly one quarter of the nation's accredited post secondary institutions are in New York State. And New York's tax levy contribution to public and private higher education is first in the nation.

In sum, the higher education industry is of profound importance to the State—and that importance is most easily measured in terms of enrollments and financial aid to students.

As a result of the unprecedented volume of students and dollars represented by this, the Corporation initiated an ambitious survey to determine how all New York State college students finance their education; that is, how they package personal and external resources to meet their educational costs. At a time when the Federal Government proposes changes in financial aid that will alter the very nature and philosophy of higher education, this survey will enable the State to plan effectively to meet these challenges. To date, New York is the only state to attempt such a survey.

Among the questions to which we hope to find answers are:

How do students from various backgrounds and at various institutions pay their college costs?

How will students be affected by changes in financial aid policies?

Will some students be affected more than others?

How will affected students "react" to changes in financial aid policies?

How can the State move to deal with "pockets" of unmet, present or future financial need among the college-going citizens?

The survey was constructed to randomly sample from the population of all post-secondary students in New York State. It was designed to elicit appropriate financial, demographic and attitudinal data from students, with corroboration from the institutions they attend. A Pilot Test was conducted to refine the process. As a result, the sample selection procedures were simplified to dramatically increase participation. Thus, findings will be well within accepted tolerances.

It must be noted that all other State surveys have used financial aid recipients as the population; that is, they have ignored those who pay their own way from family and personal resources only. This survey will enable the Corporation to compare aid recipients to non aid recipients. Thus, the Corporation will be better able to assess the impact of reduced financial aid on aid recipients.

Preliminary findings from the Pilot indicate that graduate students and enrollees at proprietary institutions, such as nursing and business schools are very concerned about possible financial aid reductions since the major portions of their aid are provided by Guaranteed Student Loans and Pell Grants, both Federal programs.

The Corporation's preliminary analysis anticipates the following aid distributions as percents of total New York enrollment (830,000).

Award type:	Percent
TAP only	9
TAP + Pell only	27
TAP + Pell + GSL only	7
TAP + GSL only	3
All GSL (estimate)	30
All TAP (estimate)	46
All Pell (estimate)	32

The Survey will sharpen these distributions to include those students who receive only Guaranteed Loans or Pell Grants (a first), and will analyze these distributions against income levels and types of institutions attended. Thus, the Survey will tell us who in the state may be affected by various Federal program cuts. Moreover that effect can be focused by income level and institutional type. By factoring in student attitudinal data, the Survey may give indications of aid shortfalls and of consequent student behaviors over various income levels and institution types.

For example, initial data seems to show that while more TAP awards go to the public sector, more TAP dollars go to the private sector college students. Again, upper income private sector students utilize Guaranteed Loans more than lower income public sector students. It also seems that Pell Grants are more utilized at Community Colleges regardless of sector. From another viewpoint, if Pell grants were cut by 50 percent and Guaranteed Student Loans eliminated, the cost in lost financial aid to SUNY operated four-year colleges would be 62 million dollars. Thus, the inter-relation of the various aid types is complex. The Corporation sees the Survey as the crucial instrument to produce a consistent and coherent picture of the impact of financial aid on State higher education.

The Corporation assists both the State of New York and the Federal Government. It believes this data will enable both entities to plan more effectively to meet student financial aid needs at the post-secondary level in New York State and the nation.●

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S ROYALTY COLLECTIONS

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, there has been during the last few years considerable attention focused on the deplorable condition of royalty collections by the Federal Government. In a recent congressional hearing, the Chairman of the Commission on Fiscal Accountability for the Nation's Energy Resources estimated the loss to the Federal Government to be 13 to 16 percent with 3 to 6 percent due to actual theft. This means a loss of somewhere between $½ billion to $1 billion annually, an amount we cannot afford to lose in our current budget situation.

On December 7, 1981, after several hearings and much investigation and study, Mr. SANTINI and I introduced H.R. 5121, a bill designed to improve the Government's track record in collecting royalties. Since much of the money collected is returned to the States, the States have a financial interest as well. Recently the Western States Land Commissioners Association, meeting in Washington, D.C., adopted the following resolution in support of this legislation:

RESOLUTION NO. 3—MINERAL ROYALTY LEGISLATION (HR. 5121)

Whereas, in 1920 Congress determined that the public mineral lands in the western states should be retained and leased rather than transferred to those states and their people; and

Whereas, to compensate for the impact of federal leasing and the state revenue losses from such federal retention of lands, the Congress has determined that 50 percent of the federal revenues from mineral leases or public lands should go to the state from which such revenues originated; and

Whereas, for over 20 years, audits and studies by the Department of the Interior, the General Accounting Office, and Congress have shown serious inefficiencies in the collection of such mineral revenues by the U.S. Geological Survey; and

Whereas, many states with mineral lands have in place, or are developing, efficient systems for the collection and audit of mineral revenues for purposes of state taxation and leasing programs; and

Whereas, payments to the states of their share of mineral royalties is made only twice a year, and often later than the dates set forth in the Mineral Leasing Act; and

Whereas, Representatives Markey and Santini have, after investigation and study, proposed legislation (HR 5121) authorizing states to collect mineral royalties on behalf of the federal government, and to pay the federal share of such revenues biennially to the federal government after deducting costs of administration and the 50 percent due to the states; and

Whereas, the proposed legislation would result in improved efficiencies in the collection of royalties and help redress the imbalances in western states' revenues resulting from the federal retention of the public lands and inefficiencies and delay in royalty collections; now therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Western States Land Commissioners Association approves the Markey-Santini plan, and urge the Secretary of the Interior to support the principles set forth therein.●

MAYOR THOMAS COOKE AND EAST ORANGE'S STRUGGLE

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, the impact of the Reagan administration's budget cuts certainly will affect, to varying degrees, all local communities in America. A recent article in the Washington Post described in stark contrast the choices facing two communities, one well off and one struggling to survive, as they deal with the massive reductions in Federal assistance. Post reporter Lynn Darling sensitively reveals the trials of Mayor Thomas Cooke of East Orange, N.J., who is a friend and constituent of mine. Tom Cooke is a man of courage and perseverance, who is desperately working to maintain essential services in his city. There are many Tom Cookes in city halls all across America struggling with the effects of Reaganomics, and this article is poignant portrayal of their viewpoint. I recommend it to my colleagues and submit it to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 30, 1982]

THE TALES OF TWO CITIES—PURSUING DREAMS IN BEVERLY HILLS; STRUGGLING TO SURVIVE IN EAST ORANGE

(By Lynn Darling)

"We all want a place that fulfills all our dreams. And it's my job to keep Beverly a place where dreams can be fulfilled. It is a continuing struggle to maintain the quality of life."—Mayor Donna Ellman, Beverly Hills, Calif.

"The quality of life? For crying out loud, we're just trying to survive."—Mayor Thomas H. Cooke, Jr., East Orange, N.J.

It was the annual midwinter conference of the U.S. Conference of Mayors, two days of meetings and workshops at the L'Enfant Plaza Hotel, where the participants discussed everything from "Public/Private Partnerships" in the Degas Salon to "Tax Policy and Leasing" in the Monet Room. This year the big subjects were the New Federalism and the prospect of more budget cuts, and yesterday the conference president expressed the prevailing opinion. "The president's State of the Union address on Tuesday night did not include the current state of the cities," said Mayor Helen Boosalis of Lincoln, Neb., at a press conference. Reagan's long-term approach to problem-solving, she said, "failed to address the problems that mayors must face today."

Still, the problems vary, and they don't conjugate the urban verb the same way in Beverly Hills as they do in East Orange. The question of what is important finds different answers depending on whether the constituents are worrying about losing a job or finding a good gardener. Yet, the notion that a community celebrated for its affluence is somehow without problems is one that annoys the mayor of Beverly Hills.

"Despite its great social image, Beverly is really a microcosm of the rest of the country," says Donna Ellman, 56, of her town of 32,000 nesting on 5½ square miles in the middle of Los Angeles. "We're just trying to maintain ourselves as a low-profile, small-town residential area in the heart of a big metropolis. There's such a great deal of pressure from the outside world wanting to move in. I like to think of Beverly as an anachronistic Camelot surrounded by a world of Clockwork Orange. We're trying to maintain a heavenly, idyllic place in a world that is constantly trying to impinge on it."

It is not that Ellman is oblivious to the differences between Beverly Hills and the real world. With a $40 million operating budget and an investment portfolio which yields between $9 million and $10 million, Ellman likes to describe the city's financial situation as one of "transient solvency," pointing out that $10 million is hardly going to buy Beverly Hills the new police and fire stations it needs. Still, Ellman recognizes that solvency is a word most mayors would have to look up in a dictionary these days.

"We are different from other cities," she says. While other cities are actively seeking foreign investments and banks and that sort of thing, "we try to selectively accept." Banks, for instance, often try to come into the city, according to Ellman, but often there's "no sense of loyalty, no appreciation of us as a community. All they want is the address."

One begins to understand. Forget the mansions, the Mercedes Benzes, the swimming pools, forget for that matter, Rodeo Drive and the Rolls-Royces double-parked in front of stores that will take your money by appointment only—Beverly Hills is not just another pretty place.

Ellman, whose brisk efficiency and easy smile collide with the image of languid luxury so often associated with Beverly Hills, likes her town best on Sundays, when the stores are closed and the tourists are gone "and the streets are quiet and the Little League games are going and the parents are walking their kids in strollers. It's little America, it really is."

OTHER SIDE OF THE TRACKS

East Orange, N.J.: Population, 90,000. Twelve miles from New York City, next door to Newark, a bedroom community with a budget that is currently about $3 million over the amount the state legislature says it can legally spend. Mayor Thomas Cooke, a former high school teacher with close-cropped graying hair and an air of grim determination, figures that this year East Orange has lost over half a milion in revenue-sharing funds, about the same in block grants, and over a million in CETA funds. Meanwhile it picked up about 1,500 more welfare recipients after they were dropped from the federal rolls, and the unemployment continues to rise. "Problems?" says the mayor of East Orange. "Yeah, you could say we've got some problems."

The cost of school lunches had to go up. So did the cost of public transportation. More than 200 city workers will have to be laid off. For the first time, the layoffs may have to include public safety employes. The emergency fund for residents too poor to pay for heat and hot water is nearly gone, and it isn't even February.

Young couples are losing their first homes, unable to meet the payments. The real property taxes on which the city depends for its revenues have already been stretched to the limit. "How much can you tax people?" asks the mayor of East Orange. "For crying out loud," he says. He says that a lot.

LITTLE AMERICA'S PROBLEMS

There are also problems in little America. Commercial rents in the city are sky high and while it's no problem finding a fur-trimmed anything in Beverly Hills, Ellman says it's getting increasingly difficult to find a decent dry-cleaner or cobbler, or any of the other mundane businesses that can't pay the kinds of rents that stores which cater to gilded fantasies can afford.

But although there are, without question, what Ellman calls "the Gucci-ites" inhabiting Beverly Hills, the idle rich who "run from beauty shop to beauty shop and massage to massage," there are also celebrities who care.

People like Monty Hall, for instance—"whenever you need him, he's there"—and Doris Day—"she used to live up the street and she was an absolute collector of stray dogs, you always knew where to look if one was lost"—and Debbie Reynolds—"she was a Girl Scout leader, and no matter what she was doing, she was always back for her meetings." The spirit of volunteerism is not dead, says Ellman. "I would guess that more money is raised out of Beverly Hills than anywhere else in the country. We're really pushovers for charitable causes."

THE NEW FEDERALISM

The mayor of East Orange says he has tried to make ends meet. In his first term, he went after the delinquent taxes owed by the big businesses in town by threatening foreclosure. He tried to cut down on the number of public employes. He says he has even tried to take the president's advice on volunteerism and the private sector. He tried to get volunteers for an auxiliary police force but only 12 people offered to help. He doesn't blame those who didn't volunteer. Most of them, he says, are looking for paying jobs. What about contributions from the business community? The mayor just laughs. "You're kidding."

Cooke is not pleased with the solution that the Reagan administration has proposed for his problems. "I'm very warm, you're perfectly right. This whole thing on federalism is based on the idea that the states will deliver to the cities. Let me tell you about states' legislatures. For crying out loud, what makes them think that the urban areas are going to get a fair shake from the rural areas and the sprawling suburban areas that dominate the legislatures?"

"You just get fed up to here," he says, the anger simmering in his voice. "We're the people on the firing line. Whatever the effect is, whether it's a cutback or an elimination of a service, it's not the president who did it, it's the mayor who did it. The mayor," says Thomas Cooke. "Me."

"You tell me where the justice is," says the mayor. "People think welfare is the biggest rip-off, but they're not the ones who are against farm subsidies or subsidies for corporations. They complain about a measly $3,000 per pupil education cost, and then they're willing to spend $10,000 to $20,000 keeping a person incarcerated. Tell me where the justice is in that."

It is not, the mayor says, that he is insensitive to what the president is trying to do. "We're all sympathetic to the need to cut back government spending and cut through the government regulations that affect service delivery. But it is inhuman to tell the people to freeze to death now and starve to death now and that it will all be justified in 1991."

Ellman, though, a Democrat like Cooke, thinks the president's plan is "interesting as long as it's phased in properly." She thinks cities will have to get increased taxing authority to go along with the increased responsibility for social services.

The mayor of Beverly Hills will soon be passing these troubles on to someone else. Her term ends in April, and she has decided not to run for the City Council again. It is time now, she says, to devote herself to more personal goals. Ellman has lived in Beverly Hills for the last 25 years, having come to California from Chicago. "I always dreamed of living there," she said. "It was something to aspire to, like something in a Horatio Alger story. If there weren't a Beverly Hills, we would have to invent one."

Last fall, the mayor of East Orange won a second term. He is asked about the future. "What do I think is going to happen?" says Thomas Cooke, sitting ramrod-straight in his black, three-piece suit and staring ahead. "I've given a lot of thought to that." He looks down for a moment, then looks up. "What with the number of people who want to work and who can't work, and the escalating crime wave," he says, "the only thing I foresee is insurrection in the streets."●

REAGAN ADMINISTRATION DISMANTLING ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION EFFORT

HON. STEPHEN L. NEAL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, despite overwhelming support by the American public for continued Federal protection of the environment, the administration has been systematically destroying the one agency charged with that responsibiltiy. The Environmental Protection Agency under Ms. Anne Gorsuch is not being trimmed for the sake of efficiency, but, as former administrator of EPA under two Republican administrations, Russell E. Train, documents in a column, which appeared in the February 2, 1982, Washington Post, it is being dismantled. At the current rate of dismemberment, according to Mr. Train, the agency will soon be unable to respond to future Love Canals and other industrial mishaps that threaten human life and commerce. Nor will it be able to effectively administer the many programs still on the books, according to Train, who is apparently horrified and bewildered by the course the administration he supported is taking.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that Mr. Train's credentials will allow my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to fully consider how misguided is the administration's policy on protecting the environment, and take action during consideration of the budget to reverse that policy. The column by Mr. Train follows:

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 2, 1982]

THE DESTRUCTION OF EPA

(By Russell E. Train)

The Environmental Protection Agency is rapidly being destroyed as an effective institution in the federal government. Current and planned budget and personnel cuts, if continued, will inevitably reduce the agency to a state of ineffectualness and demoralization from which it is unlikely to recover for at least 10 years, if ever. While some may greet this situation with enthusiasm, I am convinced that the business community, among others, has very little to gain and a great deal to lose.

I see EPA's mission as a critically important one. I am convinced that, in the long run, our free enterprise system can only prosper and grow within the context of adequately protected public health and environment. I am also convinced that responsible business leadership knows this and asks only that regulatory requirements be reasonable, cost-effective, have an adequate scientific basis, and be fairly and uniformly enforced.

Corrected for inflation since 1981, President Reagan's expected 1983 budget request for EPA will represent a reduction of approximately 45 percent. Administrator Anne Gorsuch has reportedly been working on 1984 numbers of $700 million, or a cut of 61 percent. EPA's research branch would be cut by two-thirds, far more than any other basic research program.

In the personnel area, the cuts are equally drastic. If Gorsuch is allowed to carry out plans that have been circulating within the agency for some time, by this coming June—one year and four months after the Reagan administration took office—80 percent of EPA's headquarters staff will have quit or been fired, demoted or downgraded.

It is hard to imagine any business manager consciously undertaking such a personnel policy unless its purpose was to destroy the enterprise. Predictably, the result at EPA has been and will continue to be demoralization and institutional paralysis. Attrition within the agency is running at an extraordinary 2.7 percent per month or 32 percent a year.

From an administration that quite rightly emphasizes the need for good management, what we are seeing at EPA is its very antithesis. Permits that businesses need do not get issued. Required rules and regulations do not get promulgated. Enforcement has ground practically to a halt. The most competent, technically proficient, professional staff have either already left or are looking for jobs. If one believes that effective environmental protection is essential it is tragic. If one is not necessarily an environmentalist but believes that our environmental programs need to be managed efficiently, scientifically and less burdensomely, the current situation is equally disastrous.

Congress and the courts will effectively impede the ability of the administrator to bring about substantial change by administrative action alone. But they will provoke an upsurge in lawsuits and more decision-making by confrontation. While adversarial approaches to conflict resolution seem to be deeply ingrained in American society, there have been encouraging signs lately of growing appreciation of economic realities within the environmental community and a greater environmental sensitivity on the part of the business community. A return to the early days of polarization benefits no one.

Many of EPA's difficulties over the years can be traced to the fact that Congress loaded the agency with far more statutory responsibilities within a brief period of time than perhaps any agency could effectively perform. Surely, those problems can only be compounded by drastically reducing its resources while its responsibilities remain the same or grow. When EPA came into being in 1970, it took over the air pollution, water pollution, solid waste, pesticide and radiation programs scattered around the federal government. Since then those programs have been broadened and improved, and Congress has added major new responsibilities—including the Toxic Substances Act, the Safe Drinking Water Act, the Noise Control Act, the hazardous waste control program and Superfund. These are not hangovers from the concerns of prior generations. EPA has been on the frontier of today's concerns, and there is every indication in the polls that environmental protection remains high on the public agenda.

Environmental protection needs are not going to lessen if EPA becomes ineffectual. The kepone problems and the Love Canals will continue to crop up from time to time. Unless the public has reasonable confidence in the public institutions charged with responsibility for handling such problems, there is real danger of a backlash developing against business. The pendulum will swing once more and in even more violent oscillations. EPA will be forced to react and will do so without adequate staffing and with a reduced research base. Business needs greater stability and predictability of policy, and for that it needs a credible EPA. The tendency of our political system to ignore the need for reasonable continuity in institutions and policies is one of its most serious failings.

As one who served two Republican administrations from 1969 to 1977 and who voted for President Reagan, I must record my profound concern over what is happening at EPA today. The budget and personnel cuts, unless reversed, will destroy the agency as an effective institution for many years to come. Environmental protection statutes may remain in full force on the books, but the agency charged with their implementation will be a paper tiger.●

A PUBLIC OPINION SURVEY

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, this Sunday's Denver Post contained a public opinion survey taken in early January in the Denver metropolitan area. There were some surprising results.

Incumbent Democratic Gov. Richard Lamm was judged good/excellent by 59 percent of the people polled. Even in the rating among Republican respondents Lamm was judged more favorable than Republican Senator WILLIAM ARMSTRONG.

The question, has Reaganomics helped or hurt, produced a surprising answer, considering that Colorado has been relatively sheltered from the full force of the Reagan recession: A total of 82 percent said either they have felt no effect or have been hurt. Only 18 percent answered that Reaganomics has helped them.

[From the Denver (Colo.) Post, Jan. 31, 1982]

LAMM ENJOYS BIPARTISAN SUPPORT

(By Sharon Sherman)

Gov. Dick Lamm is doing a good job of running the state, in the opinion of 58.7 percent of the people in five Denver metropolitan area counties who were questioned in a poll conducted for The Denver Post.

Lamm came in well ahead of both of the state's senators in the job performance rating, which was one of the questions in a telephone survey conducted by the Denver Consulting Group during early January.

The governor, a Democrat, even was slightly ahead of U.S. Sen. Bill Armstrong, R-Colo., in the rating of his job performance by Republicans.

U.S. Sen. Gary Hart, D-Colo., was behind Lamm in the overall ratings but ahead of Armstrong.

The survey of 500 people was taken in Denver, Jefferson, Boulder, Arapahoe and Adams counties in such a manner, pollsters said, that its results could be interpreted as accurately reflecting the views of all the people in those counties.

One surprising result was the high number of people—nearly 30 percent of those questioned—who said they didn't know what kind of job was being done by Armstrong, Colorado's junior senator for the last three years.

The overall ratings of the three elected officials were:

	Percent of those polled
	Lamm	Hart	Armstrong
Opinion:
Excellent	13.0	11.6	5.2
Good	45.7	30.6	27.8
Fair	27.9	28.6	30.2
Poor	7.8	12.8	7.2
Do not know	5.6	16.4	29.6

Lamm generally did best in the ratings from those between the ages of 35 and 64, those who have lived in Colorado longest and those who either hold top-level white collar jobs or do not work at all.

The governor fared better in Arapahoe, Boulder and Jefferson counties than in Adams and Denver.

Lamm, a Democrat, was rated good to excellent by a higher percentage of those in his own party—65.1 percent—than by Republicans—58.8 percent. But his good to excellent rating among Republicans was a percentage point higher than Armstrong's.

Unaffiliated voters fell between the two, with 59.1 percent calling Lamm good to excellent at his job.

Hart was favored more by females than males, by those with a higher level of education, and by those who had lived in Colorado from 5 to 25 years. He did best with the age groups of 55–64 and 25–44 and was rated higher by those who either worked at white collar jobs or weren't working, than with those holding blue collar jobs.

Democrats and unaffiliated voters gave Hart the highest ratings, with 61.2 percent of his Democratic colleagues and 45.5 percent of the independents saying he was doing a good to excellent job, while 32.8 percent of the area's Republicans put him in the top performance categories.

Armstrong was rated best by those who were married or in the divorced/separated category, those in the 45 to 64 age groups, people in high-level white collar jobs, and those who have lived in Colorado 5-10 years or more than 25 years.

His performance was called good to excellent most often by those in higher income groups and people living in Jefferson, Arapahoe and Adams counties.

Armstrong did a little less well among his own Republican Party than did Lamm. About 57.9 percent of Republicans rated his job performance good to excellent, while he was given that designation by 29.1 percent of the Democrats and 25.6 percent of unaffiliated voters.

Asked their opinion of whether the political and social climate in Colorado had become more conservative or more liberal, a majority saw the state as moving to the right of the political spectrum.

Of those polled, 51 percent said it was more conservative, 27.1 percent said more liberal, 4.2 said neither, and 17.7 percent didn't know.

About the same number of Democrats and Republicans expressed the view that the state was moving toward conservatism, while a few more Democrats and unaffiliated voters than Republicans believe Colorado is becoming more liberal.

REAGAN RECEIVES HIGH POLL RATING

(By Sharon Sherman)

About half the people in five counties in the Denver metropolitan area think President Reagan is doing a good to excellent job, they said in a recent poll.

But when they were asked whether the President's economic program had helped or hurt them, a majority of those questioned said the program has had "no effect," while 29 percent said they have been hurt.

The President's rating looked like this:

Opinion:	Percent of those polled
Excellent	12.8
Good	37.6
Fair	31.0
Don't know	1.6

Reagan received better ratings from men than from women, from married people than from single people and from those with the highest level education, jobs and incomes.

He was given his best ratings by the 35-44 age group.

The responses to the question about whether Reaganomics has helped or hurt followed a similar trend, with the better educated and those with higher paying jobs saying they had benefited.

Most of those saying they were hurt were in the 45-64 age group, were blue collar workers or those without jobs and were spread evenly among the five counties.

The poll results looked like this:

Opinion:	Percent of those polled
Helped	18
Hurt	29
No effect	53

Results of both the job performance and economic policy questions broke along party lines when the respondents were asked their party affiliation.

About 80.6 percent of Republicans called Reagan's performance good to excellent. That was almost twice the 42.1 percent of unaffiliated voters giving him those ratings and far higher than the 28.1 percent of the Democrats who like the president's work.

Those who said they were helped by the Reagan economic policies included 13.7 percent of the Democrats responding, 28.6 percent of the Republicans and 12.5 percent of the unaffiliated voters.

Those saying they have been hurt were 50 percent of the Democrats questioned, 12.6 percent of the Republicans and 29.2 percent of the unaffiliated voters. In answer to the question of what things they and their families were doing to cope with the increased cost of living, 26.7 percent of those answering the poll said they were trying to conserve energy while 21.8 percent said they had tightened their family budgets. About 16 percent said they go out less often and nearly 12 percent said they drive less.

POLLSTERS CONTACTED 500 ADULTS BY PHONE

Metropoll measured the opinion of 500 adults who live in the greater Denver area.

The telephone survey, sponsored by The Denver Post, was conducted by The Denver Consulting Group as a part of Metropoll, a quarterly survey of public attitudes toward political figures and issues.

A random digit telephone technique was used to select homes in Denver, Adams, Arap- ahoe, Boulder and Jefferson counties. One adult, age 18 or older, was interviewed in each household.

Interviews were conducted from January 6 through 18, 1982, excluding Sundays.

Any survey is a sample of the population. Even with a sample of only 500, a scientific survey such as Metropoll accurately reflects the attitudes and composition of the Denver market within 4.5 percent. Thus, if 50 percent of the people surveyed answered "yes" to a particular question, the true value in the population would be between 45.5 percent and 54.5 percent.●

PROTECTING OLDER AMERICANS AGAINST OVERPAYMENT OF INCOME TAXES

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, the Senate Special Committee on Aging with the help of the IRS has prepared a summary of income tax deductions most often missed by older taxpayers. Several changes are reflected in 1981 tax returns. To help assure that older Americans take advantage of the legal tax reduction provisions available to them, I am inserting this important information into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

CHECKLIST OF ITEMIZED DEDUCTIONS FOR SCHEDULE A (FORM 1040)

MEDICAL AND DENTAL EXPENSES

Medical and dental expenses are payments you make for the diagnosis, cure, relief, treatment, or prevention of disease. They also include payments for treatment affecting any part or function of the body. Expenses for transportation for needed medical care are included in medical expenses. Payments for insurance that provides medical care for you, your spouse, and dependents are included in medical expenses. Unreimbursed expenses are deductible to the extent they are more than 3 percent of your adjusted gross income (line 31, Form 1040). Expenses may be deducted only in the year you paid them. If you charge medical expenses on your credit card, the expenses are deducted in the year the charge is made regardless of when the bill is paid.

Insurance premiums

One-half of medical, hospital, or health insurance premiums are deductible (up to $150) without regard to the 3 percent limitation for other medical expenses. The remainder of these premiums can be deducted subject to the 3 percent rule.

Drugs and medicines

Medicines and drugs legally obtained and generally recognized as medicines and drugs are deductible. They do not have to be prescribed. These items are included in medical expenses (subject to the 3 percent rule) but only to the extent they exceed 1 percent of adjusted gross income (line 31, Form 1040).

Examples of unreimbursed medical and dental expenses

You can deduct the costs of :

Medicine, drugs, vaccines, and vitamins your doctor recommends.

Doctors, surgeons, dentists, eye doctors, gynecologists, chiropractors, osteopaths, podiatrists, chiropodists, psychiatrists, psychologists, physical therapists, acupuncturists, Christian Science practitioners, and psychoanalysts.

Medical examination, X-rays and laboratory services, insulin treatments, and whirlpool baths the doctor orders.

Nursing help. However, if you pay some one to do both nursing and housework, you can deduct only the cost of the nursing help.

Hospital care (including meals and lodging), clinic costs, lab fees.

Medical treatment at a center for drug addicts or alcoholics.

Medical aids such as hearing aids (and batteries), false teeth, eyeglasses, contact lenses, braces, orthopedic shoes, crutches, wheelchairs, guide dogs and the cost of maintaining them if you are blind or deaf.

Ambulance service and other travel costs to get medical care. If you used you own car, you can claim what you spent for gas and oil to go to and from the place you received medical care, or you can claim 9 cents a mile. Add parking fees and tolls to the amount you claim under either method.

Cosmetic surgery.

Cost and repair of special telephone equipment for the deaf.

Capital expenditures for medical purposes, such as air conditioning or elevators. If these expenses are for permanent improvements that increase the value of the property, you may include them as medical expenses only to the extent that they are more than the increase in the value of the property.

Cost of a nursing home (including meals and lodging) if the availability of medical care is a principal reason for being in the nursing home.

Medical care included in the "life-care fee" or "founders fee" of a retirement home which is paid monthly or as a lump sum under an agreement with the home. The deductible amount must be set apart for medical care.

Cost of special equipment, such as a motorized wheelchair or autoette, special hand controls and other special equipment installed in a car specifically for the use of a physically handicapped person.

TAXES

Real estate; general sales; State, local, or foreign income; personal property

If the sales tax tables are used in arriving at your deduction, generally the only additional sales taxes you may add to the table amount are those you paid to purchase the following items: Automobiles, trucks, motorcycles, airplanes, boats, mobile homes, and material used to build a new home if the sales tax on the materials is imposed on you.

When using the sales tax tables, add to your adjusted gross income any nontaxable income such as social security, veterans and railroad retirement benefits, workmen's compensation, untaxed part of long-term capital gains, interest and dividend untaxed under the exclusion, interest on municipal bonds, untaxed part of unemployment compensation and public assistance.

INTEREST

Personal loan; home mortgage; auto loan; loans on life insurance; installment purchases

Bank and Other General Purposes Credit Cards

Deduct the finance charge added to your monthly statement if no part of the charge was for investigation fees, membership fees, loan fees, service charge, or similar charges.

Points

When buying a residence, "points" are interest paid in advance. You may deduct the amount you pay as points in the year of the payment—if the loan is used to buy or improve your principal residence and is secured by that residence. In addition, the payment of points must be an established business practice in the area where the loan was made, and the points must not exceed the number generally charged in this area.

If the residence you purchase is not your principal residence, you may not deduct the full amount for points in the year paid. Instead, the prepaid interest paid as points must be spread over the life of the mortgage, and it is considered "paid" and is deductible over that period.

Points are not deductible if they represent charges for services rendered by the lending institution (e.g., VA or FHA points are not deductible as interest). Also, points are not deductible if paid by the seller. These are selling expenses that reduce the amount realized.

Penalty for Prepayment of a Mortgage

This is deductible as interest.

Revolving Charge Accounts

These finance charges may be deducted if separately stated on your bill.

CONTRIBUTIONS

In general, contributions to religious, charitable, educational, scientifc, or literary organizations may be deducted up to 50 percent of your adjusted gross income (line 31, Form 1040). Contributions to certain private nonoperating foundations, veterans organizations, fraternal societies, or nonprofit cemetery companies are limited to 20 percent of adjusted gross income (line 31, Form 1040). There is a limit of 30 percent of adjusted gross income for contributions of certain capital gain property. Special rules also apply to contributions of appreciated property. To deduct your contributions, you must make them in cash or other property before the close of your tax year. Other property (clothing, books, furniture, etc.) is deducted at the fair market value. You may deduct contributions you charge to your bank credit card in the year the charge is made.

Examples of other charitable contributions include:

The cost and upkeep of uniforms that you must wear while performing charitable activities.

Out-of-pocket expenses (postage, phone calls, stationery) while providing services without pay to a charitable organization.

Payment of more than the fair market value to an organization for goods, merchandise, services, banquets, shows, sporting events, etc.

You may also deduct unreimbursed out-of-pocket expenses directly related to services you give to a charitable organization, such as gas and oil for your car. If you want to deduct actual expenses, you may use a standard rate of 9 cents a mile. In either case you may deduct parking fees and tolls.

CASUALTY OR THEFT LOSSES

You may deduct casualty losses, such as tornado, flood, storm, fire, auto accident (provided not caused by a willful act or willful negligence), or theft losses. The amount of your casualty loss deduction is generally the lesser of (1) the decrease in fair market value of the property as a result of the casualty, or (2) your adjusted basis in the property. This amount must be further reduced by any insurance or other recovery, and, in the case of property held for personal use, by the $100 limitation. Report your casualty or theft loss on Schedule A. If more than one item was involved in a single casualty or theft, or if you had more than one casualty or theft during the year, use Form 4684 for computing your personal casualty loss.

MISCELLANEOUS DEDUCTIONS

In addition to the other itemized deductions, you may deduct certain miscellaneous expenses on Schedule A, Form 1040. A list of the most common expenses follows. For more information, see Publication 529, Miscellaneous Deductions.

Educational expenses

Amounts you paid for education that is: (1) Required by your employer to maintain your position, or (2) for maintaining or improving skills you must have in your present position.

Business use of your home

You can deduct expenses for business use of part of your home only if you use that part exclusively and continuously in your work and for the convenience of your employer.

Employee expenses

Examples of expenses you can deduct if you were not reimbursed for them are:

Union dues.

Safety equipment, small tools, and supplies you need for your job.

Protective clothing, such as hard hats and safety shoes.

Uniforms required by your employer which you cannot usually wear away from work.

Maintenance of uniforms required by your employer.

Costs of bond, if required for employment.

Physical examinations required by your employer.

Dues to professional organizations and chambers of commerce.

Fees to employment agencies and other costs to get a new job in your present trade or profession.

Expenses of producing income

You can deduct what you paid to produce or collect taxable income or to manage or protect property held for producing income.

Examples of these expenses are:

Tax return preparation fees.

Safe deposit box rental.

Custodial (e.g., trust accounts) fees.

Fees paid to investment counselors.

Fees to collect interest or dividends.

Gambling losses, but not more than gambling winnings.

CREDITS

Tax credits are used to reduce the amount of tax you owe. All credits must be taken on Form 1040, with the exception of the credit for contributions to candidates for public office and the earned income credit.

The most common credits are:

Credit for the elderly

You may be able to claim this credit and reduce taxes by as much as $375 (if single) or $562.50 (if married filing jointly) if you are: (1) Age 65 or over, or (2) under age 65 and retired under a public retirement system.

For more information see the instructions for Schedule R & RP.

Earned income credit

If you have a dependent child who shares your principal residence in the United States, you may be entitled to a special payment or credit of up to $500. This is called the earned income credit. It may come as a refund check or be applied against any taxes owed. Generally, if you reported earned income and had adjusted gross income (line 32a, Form 1040 or line 10, Form 1040A) of less than $10,000, you may be able to claim the credit.

Earned income means wages, salaries, tips, strike benefits, other employee compensation, disability pensions, and net earnings from self-employment (generally the amount shown on Schedule SE (Form 1040) line 13). A married couple must file a joint return to be eligible for the credit. Certain married persons living apart with a dependent child may also be eligible to claim the credit.

For more information, see instructions for Form 1040 or 1040A.

Credit for child and dependent care expenses

A portion of certain payments made for child and dependent care may be claimed as a credit against tax.

If you maintained a household that included your dependent under age 15 or a dependent or spouse incapable of self-care, you may be allowed a 20 percent credit for employment related child and dependent care expenses. These expenses must have been paid during the taxable year in order to enable you to work either full or part time.

The maximum amount of the credit is $400 for one qualifying individual and $800 for two or more qualifying individuals.

See Form 2441 for more information, including a special rule for divorced or separated taxpayers.

RESIDENTIAL ENERGY CREDIT

The residential energy credit was designed to encourage energy saving and the development of renewable energy sources. There are two energy credits, each with its own conditions and limits. These credits are based on: (1) Costs for home energy conservation, and (2) costs for renewable energy source property.

A credit of up to $300 may be claimed for expenditures for energy conservation property installed in or on your principal residence, whether you own or rent it. The residence must have been substantially completed by April 20, 1977. Items eligible for the credit are limited to the following: Insulation (fiberglass, cellulose, etc.) for ceilings, walls, floors, roofs, water heaters, etc.; exterior storm (or thermal) windows or doors; calking or weatherstripping for exterior windows or doors; a furnace replacement burner that reduces the amount of fuel used; a device to make fuel openings (for a heating system) more efficient; an electrical or mechanical furnace ignition system that replaces a gas pilot light; an automatic energy-saving setback thermostat; and a meter that displays the cost of energy usage.

For years beginning after 1979, the maximum credit for renewable energy source property is $4,000. Equipment used in the production or distribution of heat or electricity from solar, geothermal, or wind energy sources for residential heating, cooling, or other purposes may qualify for this credit.

Examples of items which do not qualify for energy credit are the following: Carpeting, drapes, awnings, shades, wood paneling, fire screens, new or replacement walls (except for insulation inside the walls), exterior siding, heat pump, wood or peat burning stoves, fluorescent lights, hydrogen fueled residential equipment, equipment using wind energy for transportation, expenditures for a swimming pool used as an energy storage medium, and greenhouses.

For further information, consult the instructions for Form 5695, "Residential Energy Credits," and IRS Publication 903, Energy Credits for Individuals.

SALE OF YOUR PERSONAL RESIDENCE

You may exclude from your gross income some or all of your gain from the sale or exchange of your principal residence, if you meet certain age, ownership, and occupancy requirements at the time of the sale or exchange. If you were age 55 or older on the date of sale or exchange you may elect to exclude up to $100,000 of gain provided you owned and occupied the residence for 3 of the 5 years ending on the date of sale (or 5 of 8 years if you were 65 or older on the date of the sale or exchange and the sale took place before July 26, 1981). For sales or exchanges after July 20, 1981, the excludable amount is increased to $125,000.

In addition, payment of the tax on the gain from the sale or exchange of your personal residence in excess of the excluded amount will be deferred if, within 18 months before or 18 months after the sale or exchange, you buy and occupy another residence, the cost of which equals or exceeds the adjusted sales price of the old residence. For sales or exchanges after July 20, 1981, the replacement period is extended to 2 years before and after the sale. This 2-year period also applies to sales and exchanges of principal residences before July 20, 1981, if the replacement period expires after that date.

Taxable gains from the sale of your residence should be reported on Schedule D, line 2a or 9a. Losses from such a sale are not deductible. Form 2119, Sale or Exchange of Principal Residence, is used to report the sale of your principal residence whether or not you bought another one.

Publication 523, Tax Information on Selling Your Home, is available at most IRS offices.●

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH ON: WAR, WEAPONS, AND MILITARY SERVICE

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I should state at the outset of this entry for my colleagues, that I do not profess the Catholic faith. However, there has been some consternation among many of my Catholic friends, with regard to the true position of the Catholic Church on the matter of military service, and yes, even the matter of nuclear weapons.

Ironically, on December 7, 1981, the anniversary of Pearl Harbor, the Military Vicar of the Catholic Church, His Eminence, Terence Cardinal Cooke, of New York, wrote in no uncertain terms, on the subject: of military service, of the use of nuclear weapons, and of the absolute necessity of defense against unjust aggression. Cardinal Cooke does not preach situation ethics. The same principles apply today against the international socialism of the Soviet Union, Communist China, and all her allies behind the Iron and Bamboo Curtains, as it did against the national socialism of Adolph Hitler. Perhaps it is no accident that Cardinal Cooke reiterated the traditional stand of the Catholic Church on such matters, on the anniversary of that heinous act, that would commit the American soldier to war and eventual victory over the forces of fascism.

I have always known that the stand of the Catholic Church with regard to communism has been that there can be no collaboration with such satanic evil in any manner whatsoever. In these days of very questionable activity of some Catholic clergy, in support of Marxist terrorism, it is a welcome blessing to note that Military Vicar, His Eminence, Cardinal Cooke, setting the record straight against any unjust aggressor. Cardinal Cooke's position for all Catholic military follows:

MILITARY VICARIATE,
New York, N.Y., December 7, 1981.

MEMORANDUM FROM ARCHBISHOP RYAN

Subject: Enclosed letter from His Eminence.

You will find the enclosed letter exceedingly helpful in answering the inquiries of your people concerning the questions being raised about matters of war, weapons and military service.

The Cardinal's letter is very straightforward. In plain language it addresses the two major questions raised: (1) What does the Church have to say about military service; (2) What does the Church have to say about nuclear weapons?

His Eminence makes it clear that the Church, he, himself, and all of us here continue to honor and express our gratitude for all who carry out their military duties responsibly. There can be no question about our nation's right and duty to defend our people. The letter provides guidance also in the matter of involvement with nuclear weapons. The Church sees a policy of deterrence as less than ideal, but recognizes that in the real world it is providing at least some measure of security while we try to achieve better approaches to peace with justice. In the meanwhile, the Church warns that all nations must seek multilateral, not unilateral disarmament, gradually and prudently, with careful safeguards and while maintaining adequate defense.

You will be pleased, too, by the Cardinal's announcement that he is establishing a House of Prayer and Study for Peace, as a contribution to both keeping the dialogue on these matters in balanced perspective and advancing the cause of true peace through a combination of continuing prayer, study and discussion.

With warmest regards and Faithfully in Christ,

JOSEPH T. RYAN,
Coadjutor Archbishop.

MILITARY VICARIATE,
New York, N.Y., December 7, 1981.

DEAR FATHER: As we prepare to celebrate the birth of the Prince of Peace, you and the people you serve in the United States Military Vicariate are very much in my thoughts and my prayers.

I am writing to you for two purposes. The first is to respond to inquiries I have received from a number of you; the other is to tell you of a new and important project I am undertaking.

First, the inquiries. These have generally sought further guidance for our Catholic men and women in uniform concerning issues that have been raised here and abroad involving the broad areas of war and peace, with special emphasis on nuclear weapons. I want you to know that I share the widespread concern over these issues. There is a pressing need to pursue peace with justice and to work for the elimination of war. Clearly, the upward spiral in armaments and what it implies must be ended. All reasonable people know that the alternative could be the complete collapse of society, economic disaster, and even, conceivably, the destruction of civilization as we know it. It is encouraging that there are government officials, church leaders and men and women of every walk of life who share a growing sense of urgency and common concern over these matters.

Bishops have a special obligation to present the moral teaching of the Church and to help form the consciences of those people whom they serve. This is always a demanding challenge, and can be, at times, an agonizing task. As Military Vicar, of course, I have a special responsibility for the pastoral care of all Catholics in military service. As you know, Archbishop Joseph T. Ryan, our Coadjutor, and Bishop John J. O'Connor, our Vicar General, are directly associated with me in carrying out that responsibility. They join with me in this letter.

Obviously, at this time, this letter can address only very briefly, and in very simple terms, the main questions that are raised. A much fuller treatment is found in Bishop

O'Connor's book, In Defense of Life, which I recommend for the guidance of our people.

The key questions we are most frequently asked can be summarized in these two: (1) Has the Church changed its position on military service? (2) Must a Catholic refuse to have anything at all to do with nuclear weapons?

(1) The Church and Military Service. This can be answered very directly: The Popes, the Second Vatican Council and the Bishops of the United States speaking as a body, have all been very clear on this matter. The position is perhaps best summarized in the words of Vatican Council II: "All those who enter the military service in loyalty to their country should look upon themselves as the custodians of the security and freedom of their fellow countrymen: and when they carry out their duty properly, they are contributing to the maintenance of peace." (The Church in the Modern World.) I do not feel that anything need be added to this. The Church has not changed its position. I am personally proud of the dedication of our military men and women and consider them to be true guardians of peace. They and their families deserve the gratitude of our own nation and the world at large for the sacrifices they make to try to preserve peace with justice under very demanding circumstances.

(2) Catholics and Nuclear Weapons. To answer this question is more complicated. It requires understanding of several fundamental principles and continuing study.

The Church has traditionally taught and continues to teach that a government has both the right and the duty to protect its people against unjust aggression. This means that it is legitimate to develop and maintain weapons systems to try to prevent war by "deterring" another nation from attacking. Very simply put, police carry guns for the same reason. Under no circumstances may a nation start a war, any more than police could decide to go out and shoot people to keep them from committing crimes! Popes have also pointed out that a nation may have the obligation to protect other nations, just as we have the obligation to go to the defense of a neighbor, even though a stranger, being attacked.

Although the Church urges nations to design better ways—ideally, non-violent ways—of maintaining peace, it recognizes that as long as we have good reason to believe that another nation would be tempted to attack us if we could not retaliate, we have the right to deter attack by making it clear that we could retaliate. In very simple terms, this is the "strategy of deterrence" we hear so much about. It is not a desirable strategy. It can be terribly dangerous. Government leaders and peoples of all nations have a grave moral obligation to come up with alternatives. But as long as our nation is sincerely trying to work with other nations to find a better way, the Church considers the strategy of nuclear deterrence morally tolerable; not satisfactory, but tolerable. As a matter of fact, millions of people may be alive in the world today precisely because government leaders in various nations know that if they attacked other nations, at least on a large scale, they, themselves, could suffer tremendous losses of human life or even be destroyed.

It follows clearly that if a strategy of nuclear deterrence can be morally tolerated while a nation is sincerely trying to come up with a rational alternative, those who produce or are assigned to handle the weapons that make the strategy possible and workable can do so in good conscience. The Church does condemn the use of any weapons, nuclear or conventional, that would indiscriminately destroy huge numbers of innocent people, such as an entire city, or weapons that would "blow up the world". Every nation has a grave moral obligation to reduce and finally to get rid of such weapons altogether, but the Church points out that this must be done gradually, with all nations cooperating, and with prudence. The Church does not require, nor have the Popes of the nuclear age or the Second Vatican Council recommended, unilateral disarmament.

In its "Pastoral on the Church in the Modern World," the Second Vatican Council expressed the Church's position on these matters very clearly, and I believe it would be useful for you to have the following quotations from that Pastoral available.

"War has not ceased to be part of the human scene. As long as danger of war persists and there is no international authority with the necessary competence and power, governments cannot be denied the right of lawful self-defense, once all peace efforts have failed. State leaders and all who share the burdens of public administration have the duty to defend the interests of their people and to conduct such grave matters with a deep sense of responsibility. However, it is one thing to wage a war of self-defense; it is quite another to seek to impose domination on another nation. The possession of war potential does not justify the use of force for political or military objectives. Nor does the mere fact that war has unfortunately broken out mean that all is fair between the warring parties . . .

"The development of armaments by modern science had immeasurably magnified the horrors and wickedness of war. Warfare conducted with these weapons can inflict immense and indiscriminate havoc which goes far beyond the bounds of legitimate defense. Indeed if the kind of weapons now stocked in the arsenals of the great powers were to be employed to the fullest, the result would only be the almost complete reciprocal slaughter of one side by the other, not to speak of the widespread devastation that would follow in the world and the deadly after effects resulting from the use of such arms . . .

Since peace must be born of mutual trust between peoples instead of being forced on nations through dread of arms, all must work to put an end to the arms race and make a real beginning of disarmament, not unilaterally indeed but at an equal rate on all sides, on the basis of agreements and backed up by genuine and effective guarantees."

A nation must ask itself every day: "How much defense is enough? How much is too much?" It is a matter of balance. All life must be considered precious, because every human being is made in God's Image. A nation must use resources to protect the unborn, the weak, the old, the helpless, the sick, the imprisoned, the homeless, the poor—those who most need the nation's protection and support. The question of how much the United States spends on military defense involves a number of technical issues about which I have no special expertise. The people at large and their elected representatives have the right and duty to question all aspects of the national budget, including allocations for defense. This is one of the great values and obligations of living in a democracy. We must be gravely concerned at all times about the needs of the poor and assure that appropriate provision is made for those needs.

At the same time, we must be very careful about assuming that reductions in defense spending would automatically or completely solve such problems as poverty, hunger and disease in our nation or the world. These issues are tremendously complex and require many other changes in society before they can be adequately resolved. We must do everything we can to effect such changes and to resolve such problems, but even while engaged in efforts to do so, a nation must simultaneously defend all its people, the poor as well as the rich, against unjust aggression. There would be little point in a nation's spending all its resources on feeding, clothing, housing and educating the poor, and on other needs, only to leave all its people defenseless if attacked. We must remember, also, that these concerns are not the responsibilities of senior government officials alone. Every individual in uniform and every civilian directly involved in national defense, and particularly in defense industry, must be conscious of the many needs of the nation, especially the needs of the poor, and use the nation's resources responsibly, with meticulous honesty and care.

I know that you and our people may be faced with difficult decisions in the future, and I will try to keep you appraised of the Church's position in each problem situation. I am well aware that a wide variety of opinions have been expressed by some people concerning the directions in which they think the Church should be moving. My responsibility as I see it, as your bishop, is to advise you of the official teaching of the Catholic Church.

Archbishop Ryan, Bishop O'Connor and I sincerely hope that these comments will provide at least modest assistance to all those in uniform trying to serve honorably in the cause of peace with justice for all. Should specific questions or problems arise which you feel require further comment, please do not hesitate to advise us.

Now to the second part of this letter and to the new and important venture on which we are embarking, and for which we need the support of your prayers and moral encouragement.

Almost 10 years ago I issued a "Pastoral Message for Peace" in which I urged that all of us together face the problem of war and begin to develop an instrumentality to prevent future wars. In that Pastoral I asserted what I believe just as strongly today, "that if we do not, with deliberate speed, develop the means of war-prevention and make impossible the waging of war by any nation on this earth, we run the risk of witnessing, in our own time, the very end of human history".

Therefore, as Military Vicar for Catholics and their families in the Armed Forces of the United States and Veterans Administration I am preparing to establish a House of Prayer and Study for Peace. It is absolutely imperative that we beg God's help in continuing prayer, if we are to solve problems beyond our mere human powers and mitigate or end the sufferings of war. At the same time, it is essential that we utilize our finest human resources of spirit and intellect, bringing together scientists, scholars and others to study and plan and pray to help the world achieve peace with justice.

It is anticipated that The House of Prayer and Study for Peace will open early in the New Year under the immediate supervision of the Vicar General of the Military Vicariate, Bishop John J. O'Connor who will also serve as Chairman of the Board. The Board of Advisors will include men and women representing a broad spectrum of occupations and disciplines. The daily activities of prayer and study will be supported and carried out by a small staff of religious and lay persons in residence in the House itself. Staff members will communicate with individuals and agencies in the United States and abroad, in an effort to pool resources and share findings, and will simultaneously try to encourage individuals and institutions everywhere to join in prayer that peace with justice will become a reality for all humanity in our lifetime. With our Holy Father, Pope John Paul II, we believe that peace is possible. This belief must guide and permeate all our efforts.

As Military Vicar, I must emphasize that the activities of The House of Prayer and Study for Peace will be carried out with respect for all who are dedicated to the same objective, whatever be the approach they follow in accord with their own convictions in conscience, including the maintenance of sufficient armed force to deter aggression and the exploration of strategies of non-violence.

Finally, the hallmark of the House of Prayer and Study for Peace will be the maxim of Pope Paul VI: If You Wish Peace, Defend Life. I am convinced that if we are to expect God's help in ending war and achieving peace with justice, we must root our efforts in a recognition of the worth and dignity of all human life, the unborn, the aged, the poverty stricken, the oppressed, the sick, the diseased, the imprisoned, the helpless of both sexes, of all ages, races, creeds and ethnic origins.

More detailed informat on on the House of Prayer and Study will be forthcoming in the near future. I am pleased to be able to announce this initiative during the holy season of Advent, the period of prayerful preparation for the great feast of the Birth of the Prince of Peace. During Advent I myself will be praying each day that this venture will advance the cause of peace with justice for the world at large, and to this end will be asking the very special help of the Mother of Jesus, Mary the Queen of Peace.

On Christmas Day, after Midnight Mass in Saint Patrick's Cathedral, I shall fly directly to Korea, to spend the Christmas season with our military families there, in Japan and Okinawa, stopping in Pearl Harbor on the return trip to participate in a regional conference with our priests in that area. I embark on this trip with the same joy of anticipation I have experienced during the past thirteen Christmas seasons of visiting with the wonderful people who do so much for our own country and for the world at large, and do it so quietly and gracefully, in the true sense of the term. They and their brothers and sisters all over the world will share in my Christmas Masses together with you, and I ask the kindness of a remembrance in yours for all of us here.

Faithfully yours in Christ,

TERENCE CARDINAL COOKE,
Military Vicar.●

TRIBUTE TO ELLIS M. IVEY, JR.

HON. BOB TRAXLER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 3, 1982

● Mr. TRAXLER. Mr Speaker, I rise today to pay special tribute to a remarkable man who resides in my district, Mr. Ellis M. Ivey, Jr. Mr. Ivey is a native of Atlanta, Ga., but since his move to Saginaw, Mich., in 1941, he has risen to a stature within our community of which few people can boast.

Today, as Ellis Evey prepares to retire as general manager of the Saginaw Steering Gear Division of General Motors Corp., he is respected as a captain of industry and a champion of the free enterprise system.

In January of 1942 Ellis Ivey began his career as a foreman at Saginaw Steering Gear. Shortly thereafter he joined the U.S. Army and served for nearly 3 years in the South Pacific theater.

Upon his return from military duty in 1945, Ivey was named time study engineer and soon promoted to tool supervisor. Recognizing his managerial genius, General Motors promoted his to supervisor of work standards in June 1956. In 1957 he was promoted again to plant manager, then to divisonal works manager in 1964, and finally to general manager in March 1970.

In the years that I have known Ellis, he has always been a can do man. He has asserted his effective and aggressive leadership not only in America's industrial realm, but in civic matters as well.

Ellis Ivey's accomplishments are impressive and many. Let me list a few of them. He is a member of the Society of Automotive Engineers, the Greater Saginaw Chamber of Commerce, the YMCA Industrial Management Club, the Torch Club, and the Saginaw Club. He has also devoted hours of his time to the betterment of our community by serving as a member of the board of regents of the General Motors Institute. He served two terms as chairman of the board of trustees of Saginaw General Hospital, and two terms as president of the United Way of Saginaw County.

Ellis also served as the first president of the Lake Huron Area Council, Boy Scouts of America, for 4 years, and is presently vice president. He is the Saginaw County chairman for the Savings Bond Division of the U.S. Treasury, a member of the advisory committee of the Michigan National Molecular Institute, a member of the business advisory council of Central Michigan University, a member of the advisory board of the School of Mechanical Engineering at Clemson University, S.C., and a member of the board of fellows of the Saginaw Valley State College, where he was awarded an honorary doctor of laws degree. He is also the corporation's key executive for Virginia Polytechnic Institute.

Mr. Speaker, having heard this list of outstanding contributions and accomplishments, I am sure that you and the Members of this distinguished body will agree that it will be a sad occasion when Ellis Ivey retires as general manager of Saginaw Steering Gear. I know that all those who he worked with, and all those who worked for him, will miss his leadership.

Yet, the vast energies he has devoted to our community organizations and charitable activities have made Ellis Ivey a pillar of strength within these organizations and have won him friends throughout the community. His retirement from Saginaw Steering Gear will only open the door to many new and ongoing successful endeavors.

Ellis Ivey is a truly outstanding man and a special friend. As his Congressman, I am proud to have this opportunity to pay him this special tribute. On behalf of the Saginaw Community, I wish to extend our heartiest thanks and every best wish to Ellis Ivey and his family on his retirement.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, February 4, 1982, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, February 4, 1982

The House met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

We are grateful, O God, for good and gracious people whose lives are filled with such joy and whose actions are full of devoted service that we benefit by their presence. We thank You that the radiant spirits of others encourage us and help give meaning to our lives. In spite of the worries and concerns of our time, grant to all of us the perspective of Your kingdom where peace and good will will reign among people and love will be the measure of our relationships. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

SHAME ON RONALD W. REAGAN

(Mr. JOHN L. BURTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I am appalled that President Reagan is giving $55 million of American taxpayers' money to the nun-killers in the Government of El Salvador. I am equally appalled by General Haig's statement that America will do whatever it takes to win the war in El Salvador.

I did not know that the Congress of the United States had declared war in El Salvador. I do know, however, that the President has declared war on the elderly and the poor and the working people of this country. He cannot find money to help our own citizens but he can find $55 million of taxpayers' money to go to the nun-killers of the Government of El Salvador.

I say, shame, Ronald W. Reagan—shame.

NATURAL GAS PRICES: SPEEDING UP DEREGULATION MAKES NO SENSE

(Mr. GLICKMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, over the past several weeks, consumers in my part of the country have been hit by dramatically increased natural gas bills. Many have found themselves with bills that more than doubled in just 1 month even in spite of real efforts to conserve. There is no question about what that does to the plans of budget-conscious families and businesses. It makes them wonder just what they can do to keep their own budgets balanced.

But while this is going on, the administration is still sending out mixed signals about what it plans to do with regard to natural gas pricing policy. There is still talk from the administration about going ahead with plans to speedup the phased-in deregulation that was written into law several years ago. When we are supposedly trying to get inflation rates down, that makes absolutely no sense at all.

It is evident to me, from listening to a good number of Kansans, that we cannot and should not even consider expediting the further decontrol of natural gas prices. To do so would be a slap in the face to the people of this country we are supposed to be working to protect from inflation. I would hope that the President will reconsider his position, or else he will suffer a major defeat in Congress.

AS WENT TELEVISION MANUFACTURING, SO WILL GO COMPUTERS

(Mr. SCHULZE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, whatever happened to the once dominant U.S. color television manufacturing industry? Some of us remember when there was one, making products the world wanted, employing men and women, and generating profits that resulted from American innovation.

But those days are gone. Today, our manufacturers are reduced to the final stages of manufacturing only. If they have survived at all, they are putting subassemblies together in cabinets, and marketing what, for all intents and purposes, is a foreign-made product.

Color televisions, or their subassemblies are now made in Japan because the Japanese found a way to destroy the ability of American manufacturers to compete.

I am not talking about fair competition by the Japanese. I am talking about predatory practices.

In 1976, color televisions were selling here for half of the price charged by Japanese companies in their own country. U.S. products could have competed and won a significant market share in Japan. But the Japanese closed their markets to us, so we could not get the benefits of the new product we had developed.

The Japanese companies, with assistance from their Government, had their domestic market all to themselves. After selling millions of units to their own people and building up a home-based industry free from American competition, the Japanese undercut the American price and flooded us with color televisions.

The result was predictable. American producers were driven out of business, leaving the markets open for the Japanese to exploit. If Americans had been allowed into the Japanese markets as rightfully they should have been, there would have been fair competition, and I would not be remarking on the subject today.

Let me point out one thing to my colleagues: As went color televisions, soon will go computers and commercial aircraft.

Will the Japanese play fair in those markets? When was the last time they played fair?

Are we going to sit here and let it happen? I for one, will not.

Shortly, I will introduce legislation to provide appropriate response to the way Japan has done business all these years.

THE SEARCH FOR PEACE IN EL SALVADOR

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to express my admiration for remarks made yesterday by the distinguished majority leader, Mr. WRIGHT.

His plea for patience and understanding in the case of the El Salvador Government is in the great bipartisan tradition of American foreign policy.

□ This symbol represents the time of day during the House proceedings, e.g., □ 1407 is 2:07 p.m.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

Mr. WRIGHT got to the heart of the matter. He reminded us that President Duarte of El Salvador is the only hope of democratic values and human rights in that country.

The choice is not between Duarte and democracy as some say. The choice is between Duarte and terrorism of the left and right. The electoral process will go forward under Duarte's leadership.

To those who, in Mr. WRIGHT'S words, have been seduced by the "siren song" of leftist propaganda, I can only ask: Can you tell me of any country that has ever fallen to Marxist-Leninist terrorists and had free elections?

The distinguished majority leader has brought reason and logic and good sense to bear on a difficult problem. We owe him a vote of thanks.

MAKING IN ORDER ON TOMORROW OR ANY DAY THEREAFTER CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 389, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, 1982

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order on tomorrow or any day thereafter to consider in the House the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 389) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. CONTE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the gentleman is asking unanimous consent merely on the Commodity Credit Corporation, or on the entire urgent supplemental?

Mr. WHITTEN. That is right, CCC to be considered in the House. May I point out what is involved here?

Mr. CONTE. This only means the CCC?

Mr. WHITTEN. There are three other items.

Mr. CONTE. The gentleman will take those separately?

Mr. WHITTEN. Yes; take them separately. They were introduced separately and will be taken up separately.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL).

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding. Under his reservation of objection, I might inquire of the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee in the request to bring up this supplemental for Commodity Credit Corporation, is it next week sometime, a date certain?

Mr. WHITTEN. I said tomorrow or any other date. Of course, it is up to the leadership to make that determination. I did not know what they might say.

Mr. MICHEL. I might say that my concern or reservation would have to do with taking it up in the House where there is no opportunity for amendment, although there is reserved for the minority a motion to recommit. Would the gentleman give us some assurance that maybe some of our fears could be allayed and we might withdraw the reservation?

Mr. WHITTEN. Certainly, I think it should be, and may I describe why. This has to do with a direct appropriation. As we all know, the Commodity Credit Corporation has a legal responsibility to support prices through loans, payments, and otherwise.

It is against the law for them to fail to do that. On the other hand, there is another law that says that if they do it without having the money, that that is in violation of the law.

Our committee, in view of the urgency of this matter, and as I understand it, the money will run out perhaps in a week, under this request. In view of the urgency, I have heard of several things that have developed since, but at that time the reason we did this was so that we could get this on through and prevent a stalemate and violation of the law either way. If they do support the prices, they are in violation of law. If they do not, they are in violation. So, what we do here, and the gentleman from Illinois, the distinguished minority leader, is familiar with this, is to restore prior losses, which limits it to that and all of these other things of which I was aware, and one of them I had not heard of at the time. I suggested this approach. I did talk to Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska on the committee and my friend from Massachusetts.

We restored capital impairment that occurred prior to that so we could keep this from becoming a Christmas tree from our colleagues on the other side and get on with our business, because it is a real emergency. So, by doing it this way we tried to avoid any amendments that would change it and delay its progress. The losses have been incurred. There is authority for the appropriation. If you open it up to all sorts of amendments, you invite dangerous delay. We thought it better to do it this way.

There is one other secondary benefit. It does not make us reach the top limit, which could cause us some trouble in the authorization if we had not done it this way. So, I think if we recognize the absolute emergency, it is wise for us to do it in such a way that it will not pick up barnacles that it would if we handled it in another manner.

Mr. MICHEL. Might I inquire of the distinguished chairman what effect this might have with respect to what has become a rather controversial item in the restoration of Commodity Credit, having to do with those loans or foodstuffs shipped to Poland?

Mr. WHITTEN. This money that we have restored—the capital impairment—would not touch that side, top, or bottom. It would not affect that in any way.

Mr. MICHEL. It is quite conceivable that either the gentleman from California or the gentleman from Massachusetts would want a followup question on that.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the gentleman's unanimous-consent request, it would bring this, the CCC bill or appropriation, into the House, and therefore, will be not subject to amendments, but the motion to recommit will be preserved.

Mr. WHITTEN. That would always be in order. That is my understanding.

Mr. CONTE. I will yield to my friend from California (Mr. LEWIS).

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend.

First, let me say that I apologize for not being in the committee last Friday.

Mr. WHITTEN. We met Friday because it was the only chance we had. I recognize that the gentleman is a valuable member of the committee, but it came up quickly and we had to do it.

Mr. LEWIS. My concern goes to the point raised by the minority leader, Mr. MICHEL. That is the question of CCC credit moneys going to relieve the pressure in Poland.

□ 1115

Let me speak briefly to my concern. If the gentleman's bill does not allow the $5 billion that might be available to serve that purpose, it nonetheless does relieve pressure elsewhere. Something occurred just recently that should be of concern to our committee which is so concerned about the American farmer; that is that it is apparent that banks indicated they were going to need $71 million. Under normal circumstances, when a creditor so requests, if it is a formal request, then suddenly the person who received the loan in the first place is in default.

My concern is to make certain that if in the future CCC is going to give out that money, there be a formal request from the creditors. I suggest that might be a technical amendment to the bill that could be handled in committee.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, may I say to my colleague, the gentleman from California (Mr. LEWIS), that I have the same concern he has, but I have concern about other situations in our 50 States. That is the reason we restore capital impairment so as not to get into that, because at the end of the week all the folks dealing with CCC may be violating the law in one way or another. They will be violating the law if they do not make these loans and payments. That is one law. As to another piece of legislation, if they do it without the money, they are violating the law.

Realizing the real emergency we moved as promptly as possible. I had not heard of the particular Polish problem at that time. I do not think it had arisen as far as the press is concerned. But I am aware, having gone through this last year and from the Senate hearings, I wanted it where these things could be handled on the merits and on the hearings.

I had not heard of this, but there are other very urgent problems which were the basis of our action. We are dealing with the one item, and it is important that we get this through as soon as possible. That is the reason we wrote it like this, so the matters could be settled. As I said, I had not heard of this one at this time. As the gentleman knows, when we get to everybody in particular, there is no telling what would show up if we have a direct appropriation with all manner of unknown amendments in view of the urgency.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the committee chairman.

Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CONTE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, addressing myself to the specific concern, could we solve the problem under a motion to recommit?

Mr. CONTE. Definitely so. It has been a pleasure for me to serve with the gentleman from California (Mr. LEWIS). He has been a very valuable member of our Appropriations Committee. If the gentleman would read the language he would like to insert, we will put that in the motion to recommit.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

The language would read as follows:

Page 2, after line 7, add the following new language: "None of these funds can be paid by the Commodity Credit Corporation for payment on guaranteed loans to Poland unless the primary creditors have requested such payment."

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, that language is fine with me.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

MAKING IN ORDER ON TOMORROW OR ANY DAY THEREAFTER CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 390, URGENT APPROPRIATION FOR THE ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY, 1982

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order on tomorrow or any day thereafter to consider in the House as in Committee of the Whole, the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 390) making an urgent appropriation for the Environmental Protection Agency for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982, and for other purposes.

Mr. Speaker, I point out that this consideration would be in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. I would point out to my colleagues in making this request that legislation was passed on waste treatment too late for it to be included in the regular appropriation bill for the current fiscal year.

In many areas of the country we have presently had Department of Health condemning operations, and the need for this is very urgent. But we do leave it where it is subject to amendment, and we ask that the request be granted.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, we have no objection to the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

MAKING IN ORDER ON TOMORROW OR ANY DAY THEREAFTER CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 391, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, 1982

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order on tomorrow or any day thereafter to consider in the House the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 391) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, as I understand it, this is for the unemployment compensation benefits, $210 million for the employment offices, the services offices?

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, this is to keep the offices open and provide the funds for benefits and increased workload. It is something that we have to have.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, this is really urgent, and there is an emergency out there. My question is, can we expect to take this up on Monday or Tuesday?

Mr. WHITTEN. All I am asking for is Friday or any other day. Of course, it is up to the leadership as to what day it comes to the floor. I anticipate they will bring it up as soon as possible, but I do not know when.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I will yield to the majority leader, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT).

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, it is the plan to bring that bill up on Tuesday next along with some of these other matters, and I would be happy to discuss this with the minority leader and, of course, with the gentleman from Massachusetts at the proper time.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear that because I have been called and I am sure the chairman of the committee has been called by many, many of our Members who are very concerned about these offices being closed, and we must move this as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. WHITTEN. Certainly.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if I could, I would like to address a couple of questions to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

This is, as I understand it, on the unemployment compensation and other matters of supplemental appropriation. I guess I am asking these questions as a member of the Committee on Rules as much as anything.

My understanding of the gentleman's request is that we waive the budget or any rules of the House that might in any way complicate or rule out bringing up this legislation; is that correct?

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, it is primarily just to waive the 3-day rule. I know of no other rule that we have to waive. I do not have anything like that in mind, but it does waive that so we can move ahead.

Mr. LOTT. What about section 311(a) of the Budget Act? Is there a budget problem of hitting the ceiling?

Mr. WHITTEN. In the first place, I do not know how that applies. It is my information that technically we are not in excess of the budget right now. That might be open to question on this, that, or the other thing. My purpose in offering this is so we could move ahead regardless. What I had in mind was the 3-day rule.

The SPEAKER. May I answer the gentleman? It does not waive all points of order.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, that is what I wanted to ask.

The SPEAKER. I say to the gentleman from Mississippi that it does not waive all points of order but makes it in order to call the bill up under the conditions stated.

Mr. LOTT. If I could, Mr. Speaker, I would address the question to the chairman, or perhaps the Chair could respond.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman is speaking, of course, with regard to the Budget Act, the budget authority. This request, as stated, does not waive a point of order, if some Member would get on the floor to offer a point of order under the Budget Act.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, is it my understanding a point of order would lie on this point of the Budget Act when it comes to the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that a proper point of order at that time would be entertained.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Mississippi for his response, and I thank the Chair, because I know there is some concern about budget impact, and I realize this is emergency legislation and the gentleman wants to bring it up as soon as possible. I am sure that this side wants to cooperate in that.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman understands that we do not waive any points of order under the Budget Act or on the other hand any objection we might have to such a point of order. But as announced by the Speaker, we do not ask for a waiver of points of order; neither do we know for sure of any point of order that would lie in regard to the Budget Act.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, certainly a point of order would be in order, but as I understand it, it would not be sustained because we are not over the budget ceiling.

Mr. LOTT. All right. That is the question in my mind, and that is why I have been asking these questions.

Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I have one further question.

I will ask the chairman, is it anticipated that these four supplementals—three or four or however many the gentleman is going to ask for—would be brought up separately, or is it anticipated they would be brought up in one vote?

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, may I say that I deliberately introduced them separately. They do differ. Two at least are of extreme emergency. The others are very necessary. But I introduced them separately so the House could deal with them separately. I have every intention of bringing them up separately.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I will not object at this point because I know there is an urgency involved here and we need to get at least one or two of these bills through, but I would like to express under this reservation that I am a little bit disturbed about doing this under a unanimous-consent request. However, I will not object at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

MAKING IN ORDER ON TOMORROW OR ANY DAY THEREAFTER CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 392, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES, 1982

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be on order on tomorrow or any day thereafter to consider in the House as in Committee of the Whole the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 392) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Health and Human Services for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS TO FILE REPORT ON HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 389, SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, 1982

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 389) making supplemental appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, could the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. WHITTEN) explain this request?

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, by the time we finish the full committee meeting today I do not know that the House will be in session.

Mr. CONTE. All right. The gentleman is asking permission to file up to midnight; is that right?

Mr. WHITTEN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CONTE. On all four of them?

Mr. WHITTEN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS TO FILE REPORT ON HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 390, URGENT APPROPRIATION FOR THE ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY, 1982

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 390) making an urgent appropriation for the Environmental Protection Agency for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS TO FILE REPORT ON HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 391, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, 1982

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 391) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS TO FILE REPORT ON HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 392, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES, 1982

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 392), making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Health and Human Services for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

TENTH ANNUAL REPORT ON ADMINISTRATION OF THE FEDERAL RAILROAD SAFETY ACT OF 1970—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Energy and Commerce:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith the Tenth Annual Report on the Administration of the Federal Railroad Safety Act of 1970 (45 U.S.C. 421 et seq.) as required by that Act. This report was prepared in accordance with Section 211 of the Act and covers calendar year 1980, preceding my term of office.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 4, 1982.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I have asked to proceed for 1 minute for the purpose of inquiring of the distinguished majority leader as to the program for the balance of this week and for next week.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, it would be our purpose upon adjournment today to adjourn over until Monday noon, with no session scheduled for tomorrow.

Monday would be a pro forma session. But beginning Tuesday there are several very important pieces of legislation scheduled for our action. As the gentleman knows, upon completion of business Wednesday, the House is scheduled to commence the home district work period commemorating the birthdays of Abraham Lincoln and George Washington.

Mr. MICHEL. And that will be at the close of business on Wednesday?

Mr. WRIGHT. That is correct.

On Tuesday and Wednesday, meeting at noon on Tuesday and at 3 p.m. on Wednesday, the House would first take up one suspension: H.R. 4935, the securities and commodities trading amendments.

Then we would begin action on these four urgent supplemental appropriations: The urgent supplemental appropriation for the Labor Department, the one that deals with unemployment compensation and with the employment services; the one on Health and Human Services which would provide funds for the low income energy assistance; the one providing funds for EPA construction grants; and the one providing for Commodity Credit Corporation supplemental funds.

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question on that?

Mr. MICHEL. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

On the Commodity Credit Corporation, I am wondering on what basis that is coming to the floor. Is that coming up under an open rule, or is that going to be subject to amendment on the floor? What is the situation on that?

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, that would be considered in the House and would be subject to the same strictures as normal.

Earlier there was a discussion or a colloquy which took place between the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. WHITTEN), the chairman of the committee, and the ranking minority member of the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE), and as I recall, there was a question as to whether it would be in order to offer a recommittal motion that would have to do with payments of these funds to Poland, and according to my recollection, there was a general agreement that, of course, that recommittal motion would be in order and, as I understand it, will be made. It would, of course, have to be germane to the bill. Now, beyond that, I have no further information that I could divulge.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I might make a further observation, without being especially briefed in any way by the members of the Committee on Appropriations. If my memory serves me correctly, particularly if the figure is going to be in the $5 billion range, with the bumper crops we had, No. 1, and the low prices prevailing, many, many of our farmers are obviously putting their grain under seal for the loans, and with the Commodity Credit Corporation at one time being capitalized at $14 billion—I am not sure if that figure still prevails.

Mr. PEYSER. It is now capitalized at $20 billion.

Mr. MICHEL. All right. At $20 billion. And so obviously what we need here is the cushion between what we currently have and what we are going to need to continue to finance those.

I did raise the question earlier, under a reservation, with the chairman, because there were Members expressing concern with respect to those defaulted loans on Poland. Just to preserve the minority's right, while taking something of this nature up in the House, being foreclosed from amendment, we do have a motion to recommit that would be available.

Mr. PEYSER. If the gentleman will yield, do I understand, then, that there will not be an opportunity of amending that Commodity Credit on the floor?

Mr. MICHEL. Not since the unanimous consent was agreed to to take it up in the House.

Mr. PEYSER. Well, then, it is amendable, is it not?

Mr. MICHEL. No; it is not.

Mr. PEYSER. It is not.

Mr. MICHEL. A motion to recommit would qualify, under the legislative process; but amendments would be foreclosed.

Mr. PEYSER. I thank the gentleman for his answer.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I point out to the gentleman, if the gentleman from Illinois will yield further, that the necessity for supplementing the Commodity Credit program comes about from low crop prices. Commodity prices, crop prices, seem now to be 55 percent of parity, and that is the lowest percent of parity that crop prices have suffered since, I think, March of 1933.

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois will yield again, so that I may direct a statement to the majority leader, the reason I raise the question is that I am sure the gentleman is aware that in the last 3 years now, the Commodity Credit Corporation has lost, has put down in a loss column, over $7 billion.

Now, I recognize the problems that the farmers are facing on this. However, what is very disturbing is that amount of money. We have well over a billion dollars of interest that was due that has never been paid, and that is an excepted part of the program. The thing that is very concerning here is that, starting in October of this year, the new sugar program is coming into this Commodity Credit Corporation, and they are anticipating there an expenditure of nearly $900 million in addition.

To me, what we are suddenly onto here is going to be one of the biggest parts of any item in the budget except for the very major huge items of defense, and other things of that nature. And it is a real concern, I think, to many Members of the House as to the policy of not collecting interest on any of these loans and just letting them default, with no interest payments. And, as I say, one of the biggest violators is going to be the sugar program that is now going into it. And that is why I was interested in the question of amendment. I understand the need of the farmers on this, and I do not want to deny it. But I think it is very difficult, when we are talking about students not paying their loans, when only 8 percent of them do not pay, and we have 100 percent of the farm loans in default, with no interest being paid and none trying to be collected.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, if I might make an observation—and I regret that I am not as close to those figures, as the gentleman had to correct me on the total capitalization of CCC—when I was serving on that Subcommittee on Appropriations having to do with agricultural appropriations, I got the point where I was insisting that we always keep the books balanced on commodity credit, that we did not want to go back to the days when we were 9 years behind in our payments, carrying charges, interest, and all of the rest, which was simply an additional charge upon the taxpayer.

I regret to learn—and I assume the gentleman is up on his figures—that we are now going back to that same old discredited practice. And better that we balance up those books on an annualized basis, to know what these specific commodity programs are costing the taxpayers. You only do that when the books are balanced on an annual basis.

Mr. PEYSER. If the gentleman will yield further, the Commodity Credit Corporation has put out and actually submitted to the committee the other day a very revealing statement of just where these moneys are going and just where the losses are. It is just an unbelievable amount of money that is involved here now, and they are indicating they may be back here in 3 months' time for more, the way it is going right now. This is a tremendous interest item, which is totally uncollected, and not only uncollected, there is not even an effort to collect it. We are swallowing it. The taxpayers are swallowing it.

Mr. MICHEL. I think the distinguished majority leader had another piece of legislation scheduled for next week, and before he responds, I am wondering, since he made mention of our coming in at 3 o'clock on Wednesday, and that being the getaway day, would there be objection to our coming in at noon on Wednesday and maybe availing the Members of an opportunity of getting away earlier, with plane schedules being diminished, as they are, et cetera.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, let me suggest to the distinguished minority leader that we will see on Tuesday. If we are able to finish all of this legislation on Tuesday, that would be the optimum, most desirable arrangement, it seems to me, and I can imagine that we may. But if we are unable to do that, then at that time I think we could reconsider and consider coming in earlier on Wednesday.

Mr. MICHEL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WRIGHT. Obviously, if we are able, as we would hope, to complete this schedule on Tuesday, then it would be a somewhat moot question.

We do have one additional bill, H.R. 4481, the Justice Assistance Act of 1981, which is a 1-hour open rule.

At the close of business on Wednesday, the House will adjourn until 3 p.m. on Wednesday, February 17, for the Washington-Lincoln district work period.

Mr. MICHEL. I thank the gentleman.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1982

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at noon at Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOLLING). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. LEVITAS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object in order to make an inquiry of the distinguished majority leader.

One of the major pieces of legislation that is still pending and has not yet been considered is the Regulatory Reform Act. That bill, which has, in one form or another, been under consideration for about 4 years, was reported out of the Judiciary Committee in December; as a matter of fact, it is a part of the President's program that he outlined in the state of the Union address a year ago.

I am wondering if the majority leader has any indication for the Members as to when we might have the long anticipated opportunity to consider and vote on that extremely important piece of legislation.

Mr. WRIGHT. Well, as the gentleman from Georgia is aware, I support the initiative of the gentleman from Georgia, and I think it is an extremely important thing for the Congress.

To my knowledge, there has not been any request as of yet from the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary for the scheduling of the legislation, and for that reason I think it has not been granted a rule. However, it would be my expectation, upon a request from the committee, it would come before the Rules Committee and, in due course, come before the House.

Mr. LEVITAS. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, 'we are privileged and honored to have with us at this very moment the chairman of the Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee that so ably handled that legislation in the Judiciary Committee, and I wonder if he might enlighten the Members as to when a rule might be requested.

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVITAS. Under my reservation of objection, I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Speaker, despite the honor of my presence here, there must be something good about this day.

I would like to point out that the regulatory reform bill is exceedingly complex. Due to the year-end recess, it was necessary to defer completion of the committee report. But because of the complexity of the legislation, we are putting together what I think will be a landmark report on this particular subject. It is almost completed, and when it is completed, then we will have a right to ask the Rules Committee for a hearing. But we certainly want every stone to be covered.

As the gentleman knows from the press, the subject of closest interest to this heart, namely, legislative veto, was just last week declared to be unconstitutional by one of our courts. There is a 104-page well-reasoned decision on that. I have not totally studied it. But we want to make some allusions to that in our report. This has held it up. I would say we would have our report ready within 10 days.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, in light of the gentleman's comment, I am pleased to know that there will not be any unnecessary delays in moving this forward once the report is completed.

Second, It is one of the matters closest to my heart, not the sole and exclusive matter closest to my heart.

Third, I might point out that the opinion by the Court of Appeals in this particular case, which is verbose because it had to disguise poor reasoning and wrong conclusions, will surely be appealed to the Supreme Court, since it is contrary to other decisions previously rendered by the courts with respect to legislative vetoes over rules and regulations.

Since there are approximately 250 Members of this House who are cosponsors of this legislation, I am just hopeful that we will afford them the anxiously awaited opportunity to help restore control to the people over the unelected bureaucrats.

Mr. DANIELSON. Will my friend, the gentleman from Georgia, yield further?

Mr. LEVITAS. Further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Speaker, there are some who might comment that the gentleman is all heart. But I know that is not necessarily so. There is a lot of brain involved there as well.

89-059 O-85-54 (Pt. 1)

We will have a report ready within 2 weeks. If I cannot, I will see that somebody else does.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL STUDENT LOBBY DAY IS PLANNED FOR MARCH 1, 1982

(Mr. PEYSER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor at this time to call attention to the fact that we are planning a National Student Lobby Day on March 1 of this year. That is just a few weeks away. Today we are issuing a call to students and campuses across the country to come to Washington on March 1 to present their case to Members of Congress, the administration, and hopefully the President himself, as to the plight they are in by the curtailment and increased cutbacks on student aid programs. Mr. Speaker, if this country is going to have a bright future and is going to move ahead, young America is entitled to and needs an education. I am hopeful that students will come to state their case and to express their needs.

FOOD FOR THE WORLD

(Mr. DANIELSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Speaker, in this time of world hunger, of food shortage throughout the world, we can be proud in the United States that we are the largest single supplier of food to meet the needs of mankind.

Those of us from California are especially proud that our State is one of the principal food baskets of the world. Last night the entire California delegation was hosted at a traditional dinner by the California League of Food Processors. At the dinner Ron Peters, president of the league, gave us information which I wish to pass on to you, Mr. Speaker, and to our colleagues:

The California League of Food Processors is made up of canners and packers of fruits and vegetables processors of frozen foods, and of such special foods as cherries, olives and artichokes. The League has 34 member companies which operate about 80 facilities throughout the State and employ more than 60,000 people during the packing season. The annual payroll of the League is almost half a billion dollars and the members spend approximately $600 million for the fruits and vegetables which they process and about $1.5 billion for services, material and equipment.

California's total annual production of canned foods is more than 300 million cases with a present wholesale value of approximately $3.5 billion.

We in California, we in America, can be proud of our tremendous food processing industry, such as the California League of Food Processors, which makes it possible to process the product of our fields and orchards, to preserve them, and distribute them throughout the world for the betterment of mankind.

IRS TO DISCONTINUE ASSISTANCE TO TAXPAYERS

(Mr. JAMES K. COYNE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JAMES K. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, the Internal Revenue Service announced recently that it will no longer provide tax preparation services for taxpayers. The IRS will, however, continue to offer that service at its Capitol Hill office.

I question this new policy and I deplore the exception for Capitol Hill.

I support the President's economic recovery plan and I voted to reduce the budget at every reasonable opportunity. Although the elimination of the tax return preparation service is being touted as another method of reducing the budget, the IRS also recently announced that twice as many taxpayers will be audited in the next few years as were audited in the past. This will increase IRS expenditures. The Commissioner expressed the hope that increased audits will dissuade tax cheaters and ferret out questionable tax shelters. I laud this goal, but I question the outcome.

I do not doubt that the IRS will discover more irregularities in tax returns after it halts its preparation program. Miscalculation is understandable considering the incomprehensible nature of the tax forms and the constantly changing tax code. There will be overpayments as well as underpayments by law-abiding citizens who inadvertently miscalculate their income or tax assessment. The U.S. Treasury will lose money it can ill afford to lose whenever there is an underpayment and taxpayers will lose money they can ill afford to lose whenever there is an overpayment.

I do not believe we should save money by eliminating this service which provided benefits to both the Government and the taxpayer.

Furthermore, the exception for Capitol Hill is ludicrous. Congressmen are able to complete their tax returns as well as other Americans. In fact, they may be more able since Congressmen can use the money they are not paying in taxes to obtain professional tax assistance.

Congress already receives too many perquisites, from reduced-price haircuts in the House barbershop to tax breaks which, in effect, exclude many of us from almost any tax liability. We have earned a reputation for excluding ourselves from any painful laws—my constituents noticed that when the Government shut down on November 23, Congress did not, having carefully passed its own appropriations bill—and this is one more example of Congress putting itself above the citizens we serve.

The IRS exists not just to collect taxes but also to serve the taxpayers. The elimination of this service harms the taxpayer, especially the middle-class taxpayer who, in spite of his 5-percent tax reduction, has become disillusioned watching more and more money going to feed the seemingly insatiable appetite of Uncle Sam. The exclusion for those of us on Capitol Hill gives the impression that Government agencies provide different, "special" treatment for Congressmen.

We are not special. We, above all, should be required to suffer the consequences of our actions. I believe that the budget reductions we approved last year were necessary. I also believe that we in Congress must exhibit some responsibility for those reductions by sharing with the rest of the country the effects of our economic decisions.

THEY BLEW IT

(Mr. WINN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. WINN. Mr. Speaker, partisan politics can be an integral part of the decisionmaking process in the U.S. Congress. The open forum, used responsibly, is essential to representative government in general and legislative responsibility in particular.

But the recent nationally televised state of the Union program as produced by the Democratic Party went too far. Criticism is one thing but a prepackaged show espousing the party line is another. The criticism, as put forth by Democratic Members of Congress, was not only nebulous in nature, but also misleading and, in some ways, downright irresponsible. When the Democrats' so-called state of the Union program was being produced, my colleagues on the other side of the aisle had very little inkling of what President Reagan was going to say in the real state of the Union address. So, instead of Democratic Members critiquing the President's remarks in a live interview forum, the American public was treated to a canned script that resembled a Hollywood soap opera.

The American people deserve a range of legitimate alternatives as we attempt to solve the Nation's problems. Instead, the Democratic Party presented them with theatrics. The editorial follows:

[From the Kansas City Star, Jan. 28, 1982]

THEY BLEW IT

The taped critique was in the can a week before Ronald Reagan gave Congress his State of the Union report. The untimely, stale feel of the Democrats' own "State of the Union" presentation on national broadcasts was insulting enough. Worse, though, what the Democrats said, through comments by a new generation of party stars and interviewees selected to give that man-on-the-street flavor, was zero. Zilch. Nuthin.

If that follow-up to Mr. Reagan's act was the Democrats' best shot, it'll be a short war. The idea of having the out-of-power party counter the president's predictably partisan comments is a sound one. But not the way the Democrats handled it in 1982. Maybe next year—or the year after that, or the year after that.

The Democrats squandered their chance to give an intelligent political interpretation of the first year of the Reagan era. What should have followed Mr. Reagan's address of promises was a live critique by the party's best that nailed down the flaws as they see them. What Americans who stayed tuned got instead was more of the same quibbling about Mr. Reagan's programs. The Democrats don't seem to understand that the train is leaving the station and they're not going to be on it because they don't like the engineer.

THUNDERBIRDS AND BLUE ANGELS—HUMAN LOSS JUST TOO HIGH

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MARKS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. MARKS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce a sense of the Congress resolution expressing congressional sorrow at the recent and past loss of human life involved in the U.S. Air Force and U.S. Navy high-performance, precision flying teams.

On January 18, 1982, four members of the Air Force Thunderbirds died in the desert just north of Las Vegas, Nev. Apparently, either engine, instrument or human failure caused their deaths—deaths which I and all of my colleagues in the Congress regret intensely. Reading and hearing of the deaths of these four, fine young men—ranking as they must at the head of their profession—struck me an almost physical blow. The impact these tragedies have and will have on the family and friends of the lost pilots is obvious and there is no need for me to remind my colleagues further of that.

However, Mr. Speaker, I do feel that I should bring this matter once again before the House and urge that we express to the administration the sense of this Congress that the cost in both human life and national resources has become intolerably high and will, undoubtedly, go higher. Thirty-nine lives, and $50 million in lost aircraft, plus yearly costs of $6.3 million—I think that is more than sufficient to have paid—and the real price has been paid by the family and loved ones of those who have lost their lives carrying out orders given and taken in the line of duty.

Mr. Speaker, this is one issue which it would be very easy to demagog. Much could be said about the spectacular nature of these events, and I mean the word "spectacular" in its root sense. I will refrain from such language out of respect for the families of those who have lost their lives over the years in these programs. But I do maintain that the goals of instilling patriotism and inspiring young Americans to serve their country in the armed services can be achieved through other means. Further, the nature of the acrobatics performed by these incredibly brave men bear very little relationship to the tactics appropriate to fighter aircraft in a battle situation.

The resolution I introduce today expresses the sorrow of the Congress at all loss of life attendant to performances or practices. It further urges an end to such high-performance, precision flying teams and urges that a gold medal be presented to the families of all those who have lost their lives in such performances or practices.

Mr. Speaker, this is, indeed, a sad duty for me. I dislike urging a halt to these teams. However, a great Nation is not to be measured by providing crowd-pleasers but by its recognition of human priorities that make good sense. Preserving the lives yet to be lost in continuing these performances is vastly preferable to an unthinking bravado.●

OUR CONGRATULATIONS TO ITALY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RODINO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I have joined Congressman ANNUNZIO in sponsoring House Concurrent Resolution 260 because I believe the U.S. Government should publicly express its gratitude for the Republic of Italy's dedicated efforts to win the release of Brig. Gen. James Dozier.

This is yet another example of the Italian people responding courageously to battle the scourge of terrorism inflicted on their country over the past 2 years. They have resolved never to give in to pressures of lawlessness and violence, and always defend the democratic principles which are the foundation of Italy's republic.

When I led an American delegation to Rome in January, six of my House colleagues and I met with Italy's President Alessandro Pertini, who said that General Dozier's rescue was his "highest priority." The precision, professionalism, and persistence of the Italian police reflected this determined commitment to the safe return of our NATO deputy commander in Italy. In fact, everywhere our American delegation visited in Italy we were met by concerned Italian citizens who promised "we will find General Dozier."

Mr. Speaker, these are truly our friends—these staunch defenders of democracy.

I am proud to join in this resolution which expresses America's congratulations to our valuable ally. We should also send them our thanks.●

LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE ADDITIONAL MEDICAL BENEFITS AND BURIAL BENEFITS TO ELIGIBLE VETERANS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. MOTTL) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced two bills to expand medical benefits to veterans of the Mexican border period and World War I and to restore the payment of a burial allowance to all veterans and to increase that burial allowance to $400.

One bill would amend section 620 of title 38, to provide for the direct admission or transfer of veterans of the Mexican border period or World War I from a private hospital directly to a VA nursing home or a community nursing home under contract to the VA. At the present time the VA is authorized to furnish hopsitalization and outpatient care to these veterans; but to be eligible for admission to a VA nursing care bed or to a community nursing home under contract to the VA, the veteran must first be hospitalized in a VA facility. This bill would make possible the direct transfer of the patient to a nursing care facility. At the same time it would conserve hospital beds by avoiding the needless hospitalization in a VA hospital in order that the veteran may be outplaced in a nursing care facility.

The second part of the bill would amend section 628 of title 38 to authorize the direct admission of veterans of the Mexican border period and World War I to a private hospital in an emergency when it is of such nature that a delay would be hazardous to life or health. Such emergency admission would be at Government expense.

The other bill I am introducing would amend section 902 of title 38 to restore the payment of a burial allowance to all eligible veterans and to increase that burial allowance from $300 to $400. This is being introduced at the request of the American Legion. The $300 allowance for certain veterans was amended by title XX of the Omnibus Budget Reconcilation Act of 1981. This reduction in the burial allowance was supposed to save an estimated $75 million in fiscal year 1982.●

FARM HOME ADMINISTRATION'S INSENSITIVITY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. ALEXANDER) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I am appalled at the insensitivity demonstrated by the Farmers Home Administration as reported in the Washington Post today by its placing pressure on county level employees to collect delinquent farm loans or face losing their jobs.

Not only is this a travesty of the decency which should be expected in the working relationship between the U.S. Department of Agriculture and the FmHA county offices, but it also totally ignores the fact that low commodity prices and high interest rates have placed farmers in a position of being unable to repay these loans. Farmers who are experiencing problems repaying these loans—in Arkansas at least—are not bad managers. Rather they have been hit with pressures beyond their control.

I find this action totally distasteful—but even more distasteful to me is the fact that acceleration letters have been sent to 13,318 farmers advising them that they should pay up or get out of farming when the USDA and FmHA are insisting they are being lenient with farmers.

Less than a week ago at an Appropriations Subcommittee on Agriculture hearing, Secretary Block said "We want to stay with the farmer."

At that same meeting, Under Secretary of Agriculture Naylor said:

> The instructions we have given our people . . . have been to make full use of the discretionary authority available to them to finance these producers and carry them with operating loans for another year of operations . . .

While state directors and county officials of the FmHA have undoubtedly heard these instructions, there is an indication that an unspoken pressure is having more bearing on the situation. Many of the county officials fear their job performance will be evaluated on how many delinquencies they will clear and not on how well they exercise their discretionary authorities in order to be sure that FmHA continues to "stay with the farmer" in this time of need.

We need to stop this unspoken practice and allow the Farmers Home Administration to function by the policies that Secretary Block and Under Secretary Naylor have announced. If we do not we will drive farmers out of farming, and kill the lifeblood of this Nation.

I would like to make the Washington Post article a part of today's RECORD as I believe it will be of interest to my colleagues.

The article follows:

U.S. INCREASING PRESSURE TO COLLECT ON DELINQUENT FARM LOANS

(By Ward Sinclair)

County-level employees of the Farmers Home Administration have been put on notice that their jobs may depend on how well they collect on delinquent operating loans to farmers.

The pressure on FmHA employees is apparently part of a wider effort at the agency to collect delinquent loans, which make up about 20 percent of the agency's portfolio.

FmHA's campaign apparently is producing results. Unpublished data at the Department of Agriculture indicate that through December, 2,395 farm foreclosures were "in process" and that 13,318 acceleration letters, warning farmers to pay up or else, had been sent out.

USDA and FmHA officials have insisted that the lending agency is being lenient with farmers, citing 1981 statistics that showed only 300 foreclosures out of 300,000 loans. Since November, however, FmHA has sent out 6,000 acceleration letters.

Charles W. Shuman, FmHA administrator, denies that the aim is to force farmers out of business, but he has threatened to withhold new loan money from states with delinquency rates "higher than deemed appropriate." Each state has been assigned a "goal" for cutting delinquencies. The goal averages about 23 percent.

FmHA, which holds 11 percent of all U.S. farm debt, provides year-to-year operating loans to farmers who cannot get credit through commercial channels.

Secretary John R. Block, although refusing to put a moratorium on foreclosures as some farm leaders had urged, announced two weeks ago that the department would walk an extra mile to help farmers through "these cloudy times."

Falling farm prices, high interest rates and rising production costs have put many FmHA borrowers under severe operating pressure, and the Department of Agriculture insists that FmHA is making extraordinary efforts to help farmers in debt to FmHA get new crop loans for 1982.

But Shuman and Frank Naylor, undersecretary of USDA for small community and rural development, will be pressed to explain seeming discrepancies between FmHA policy and promise when they appear today before a House Agriculture subcommittee on rural credit.

Although less than 1 percent of FmHA's approximately 300,000 borrowers have what Naylor last month called "even potentially a serious problem," concern over a stiffening of the agency's attitude toward beleaguered farmers has rippled through agriculture for months.

"There is no question that there's a squeeze at the top, and something has to pop out at the bottom," said Rep. Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.), a member of the credit subcommittee. "There is tremendous pressure to rein in those delinquencies . . . The word 'foreclosure' is irrelevant. How many forced liquidations will there be? We're being given tranquilizers while they tighten the noose."

Dorgan said he was not mollified by assurances from Block and Naylor. He said that a standard FmHA letter to delinquent farmers in North Dakota advises them to cut back operations or to consider leaving farming. "The fact is," Dorgan said, "the majority of these farmers are, beset with interest and price problems that have nothing to do with their management ability."

Part of the concern about FmHA policy stems from a document circulated by the Center for Rural Affairs, a public interest organization in Nebraska, which expanded data contained in a memo in which Shuman outlined the goals for reducing each state's delinquent accounts by March 31.

The center's analysts concluded that an average national goal of 23 percent had been set for delinquency elimination, although the figure varied from state to state. Shuman's memo to state directors also warned of reductions in loan money if the goals were not met.

Shuman acknowledged that less loan money would be available, but he insisted in an interview that the "goal" is only a goal—not a "quota," as some farmers and legislators suspect. "The English language tells me there is a tremendous difference between goals and quotas," he said. "The goal has not been changed and there is no reason to alter it."

He said the center's tabulation of national percentages was a distortion of his agency's work. "I expect that in the political arena," he said, "but I am appalled at the disservice this does to agriculture, what it does to producers."

The FmHA administrator denied that state and county officials are under new pressure to eliminate delinquencies, either by foreclosure, forced or voluntary liquidations or other methods short of debt repayment.

He conceded, however, that district-level personnel evaluation procedures leave room for judging FmHA county employes' performance at least partly according to the number of delinquent accounts they settle. Districts in Idaho, Montana, New Mexico and Arizona, among others, are known to be using this system.

"Our state director warned last month that those delinquency reduction goals were going to be met without fail," said an FmHA county supervisor in a southwestern state. "They can call it what they like, but if we force a farmer to stop operation the result is the same as foreclosing on him."●

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 50 minutes a.m.) under its previous order, the House adjourned until Monday, February 8, 1982, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

2991. A letter from the Acting Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, transmitting a report on the impact on United States readiness of the Navy's proposed sale of certain defense equipment to Greece (Transmittal No. 82-22), pursuant to section 813 of Public Law 94-106; to the Committee on Armed Services.

2992. A letter from the Acting Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, transmitting notice of the Navy's intention to offer to sell certain defense equipment to Greece (Transmittal No. 82-22), pursuant to section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act, together with certification that the sale is consistent with the principles contained in section 620C(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, pursuant to section 620C(d) of the act; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

2993. A letter from the Acting Assistant Legal Adviser for Treaty Affairs, Department of State, transmitting copies of international agreements, other than treaties, entered into by the United States, pursuant to 1 U.S.C. 112b(a); to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. WHITTEN: Committee on Appropriations. House Joint Resolution 389. Joint resolution making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982, for the Department of Agriculture (Rept. No. 97-424). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. WHITTEN: Committee on Appropriations. House Joint Resolution 391. Joint resolution making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982. (Rept. No. 97-425). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. WHITTEN: Committee on Appropriations. House Joint Resolution 392. Joint resolution making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Health and Human Services for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982. (Rept. No. 97-426). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. WHITTEN: Committee on Appropriations. House Joint Resolution 390. Joint resolution making an urgent appropriation for the Environmental Protection Agency for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982, and for other purposes; with an amendment (Rept. No. 97-427). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

SENATE—Thursday, February 4, 1982

(Legislative day of Monday, January 25, 1982)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable THAD COCHRAN, a Senator from the State of Mississippi.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, LL.D., D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called sons of God.—Matthew 5: 9.

Father in Heaven, our world languishes for peace. Human hearts long for the day when men shall "beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks * * * when they shall study war no more." What contradiction, dear God, in a world which universally desires peace, that there are those who prepare for war. Help us to see the profound wisdom with which Jesus spoke.

Dear Lord, help the Senators as they struggle with monumental issues which determine literally the destiny of every person on Earth. Help them hear what the Bible teaches; to contemplate its precepts, its values, its admonitions, its instruction. Help them to seek Thy wisdom and be directed by its light and truth. Somehow, dear God, give us the will for peace. Grant to the whole Nation the will for peace; for we remember that "peace on Earth" depends upon "good will among men." We pray this in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

The assistant legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., February 4, 1982.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable THAD COCHRAN, a Senator from the State of Mississippi, to perform the duties of the Chair.

STROM THURMOND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. COCHRAN thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order and following the special orders for Senators BENTSEN and BUMPERS, the Senate turn to a period of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 11 o'clock and that the time therein allotted to each Senator not exceed 5 minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The minority leader is recognized.

PROBLEMS AFFECTING OUR AILING STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, yesterday I had the opportunity to appear before a public conference of the International Trade Commission here in Washington to make a statement on the problems affecting our ailing steel industry.

My State, in particular has been badly hit by the slump in the steel indusry, which is one of the largest direct employers in West Virginia. Not only are those directly employed by the steel industry impacted, but also thousands of coal miners who produce metallurgical coal are hurt by the near-depression market levels of the American steel industry.

I ask unanimous consent that my statement be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR ROBERT C. BYRD, BEFORE PUBLIC CONFERENCE OF THE INTERNATIONAL TRADE COMMISSION

I am glad to have this chance to speak out on behalf of the steelworkers of West Virginia and against the subsidized but illegal importing of foreign steel into the United States. The steel industry is vital to West Virginia. That industry is one of the largest direct employers in our State. The West Virginia steel industry also indirectly employs thousands of coal miners who produce metallurgical coal.

What hurts steel hurts West Virginia. And whatever hurts West Virginia upsets me and the rest of West Virginia's elected officials.

That is why I am here. Last Friday, the Department of Commerce stated that total European steel mill imports of products involved in this investigation increased 27.4 percent in 1981 over 1980. At the same time, American steel mill shipments increased by only 2.5 percent. Contrary to general opinion, foreign steel mills do not produce steel more efficiently than do our own steel mills.

Such a rampant increase in foreign steel imports can best be explained by the large subsidies enjoyed by many foreign steel producers. Those subsidies give foreign steel producers an unfair price advantage that distorts our domestic free market.

Currently, several different steel cases are before the Commission and the Department of Commerce. But I understand that foreign government subsidies in those cases range from as low as $120 per ton in Germany to as high as an astonishing $533 per ton or more in the United Kingdom.

In fact, one West German steel association has estimated that such subsidies in that country alone would total about $30 billion between 1978 and 1983. Likewise, the state-owned steel mills in Belgium, Italy, and France are especially heavily subsidized.

No American industry—regardless of its product mix, its proximity to market, its efficiency, or its productivity—can compete with such flagrant and unfair government subsidies.

Let me put the American steel industry's problems into clearer focus. Business Week recently reported that the American steel industry was entering 1982 at a near-depression market level.

Let me underscore what I just said. Business Week did not say that our steel industry was suffering from a recession—like everybody else in this country. The state of health of our domestic steel industry is being likened to that of a depression.

Moreover, this week's issue of Fortune magazine reported that steel-industry operating rates had fallen from above 80 percent of capacity to 55 percent of capacity just since spring of 1981. Nevertheless, Fortune went on, foreign steel imports, led by increases in shipments from Europe, have surged, just since last spring, from below 15 percent of our steel market to above 20 percent. Since that time, some 76,000 American steelworkers have been laid off, and industry earnings have virtually disappeared.

In effect, then, our domestic steel industry is in a major crisis. As a result, when the Commerce Department figures for 1981 were released last Friday, I requested time to appear before you. As I understand it, the Commission's responsibility is to determine whether injury has occurred to the domestic steel industry as a result of the importation of dumped or subsidized steel into the U.S. market.

According to Public Law 96-39, "the term material injury means harm which is not inconsequential, immaterial, or unimportant."

To decide whether such injury has occurred, the members of the Commission must consider a variety of factors prescribed by law and Federal regulation. But as an elected official, I must decide whether injury is occurring to the people whom I am elected to represent.

For that reason, last Saturday, I visited a major West Virginia steel town. In the proud steel town of Weirton, W. Va., almost 3,000 people are now out of work—nearly 25 percent of the employees of Weirton Steel.

Labor and management alike live in constant fear of becoming the next Youngstown. I met with the people of Weirton—people who share the same fears about paying the mortgage, about keeping their children in college, and, in some cases, about feeding their families in the months ahead.

Everybody wanted to know why you and I—their elected and appointed officials—had let this happen to them. Why do we allow Americans to suffer so that foreign, subsidized steelworkers can keep their jobs?

Recently, I went to some metallurgical coal-producing areas of my State. I saw closed coal mines. I saw jobless coal miners—men who lost their jobs because of reduced operations in America's steel plants. And those jobless coal miners asked the same questions that the jobless steelworkers asked.

I saw injury. Maybe not in the same way that this Commission must judge injury—but injury nevertheless. I saw injury in their eyes, and I read the injury in their hearts. Because of what I have seen in West Virginia, the Commission could hold its deliberations in Weirton, in Follansbee, in Wheeling, or in Steubenville, Johnstown, Gary, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Cleveland, or other steel towns—not just in an unaffected city like Washington. In this room you can listen to lawyers, economists, and trade experts and—yes—even politicians.

But in Weirton or other steel towns, you could hear the voices of those who bear the real injuries that subsidized foreign steel imports are causing.

But injury to America's domestic steel industry goes beyond injuries to our steelworkers and their families alone. That injury also becomes a permanent injury to our national security.

If we irretrievably abdicate a significant portion of our domestic market to foreign steel suppliers, we might never retrieve that lost tonnage in time to meet a national emergency.

Although that kind of injury may seem far fetched, such an injury cannot be ignored. Already the U.S. is the only major country in the world that cannot produce enough steel to meet its maximum annual steel demands. We first proved that in 1974, and we have less capacity to produce steel in 1982 than we did in 1974. Steel self-sufficiency is vital to any major world power.

Therefore, as you make your decision, I hope that you will remember the injuries that I have mentioned—injuries to the American people and injuries to our national defense. Time is long overdue to give our domestic steel industry a chance to compete fairly and equally with its foreign rivals.

Let us give American steel a chance to get back on its feet. Let us give our steelworkers and coal miners a chance to show the kind of job that they can do in a fair market. Once and for all, let us stop helping foreign steel companies and foreign steelworkers. Let us give American steel a fair break.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield as much of my remaining time as the Senator from Wisconsin may require.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION: A RESPONSE TO SENATOR THURMOND

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, every Member of the Senate recently received a copy of Senator THURMOND's column on the Genocide Convention. So that my colleagues have an opportunity to hear both sides of the issues he raised, I would like to respond today to the major points of that article.

GENOCIDE CONVENTION IS PROPER USE OF TREATY POWER

First, he argues that ratification of the Genocide Convention is an inappropriate use of the treatymaking power of the Congress and that in the final analysis genocide is essentially a matter of domestic jurisdiction.

The facts simply do not support either assertion.

The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that the treatymaking power is virtually unlimited. In Geofrey against Riggs (1890), the Court held that except for—

> A change in Character of government, or in that of one of the States, or a cession of the portion of the latter, without its consent . . . but these exceptions, it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted.

That decision was reaffirmed in the landmark case, Missouri against Holland in 1920, and is recognized by constitutional scholars as having resolved the question of Congress treatymaking authority.

And the U.S. Senate has a long history of using that treatymaking power for issues which are of international as well as domestic interest. Examples include the Slavery Convention and its Supplementary Protocol, the Protocol Relating to the Treatment of Refugees, the Treaties on the Political Rights of Women—which were adopted by this Senate without a dissenting vote in 1976—and the 1968 amendments to the Charter of the Organization of American States.

That brings me to the second part of his argument: Is genocide essentially a domestic matter?

Mr. President, was the massacre of a million Cambodians a domestic matter for Communist Cambodia? Was the murder of the Acholi and Langi tribes by Idi Amin a domestic matter for Uganda? Was the murder of millions of Jews a domestic matter for the expanding Nazi state?

I think not. And I am confident that my colleagues would agree.

GENOCIDE CONVENTION CONSISTENT WITH FIRST AMENDMENT

Second, Senator THURMOND argues that the treaty's definition of genocide could have a chilling effect on our first amendment freedom of speech.

The Genocide Convention has only two provisions which might relate to freedom of speech. The first is a prohibition of incitement to commit genocide; the second prohibits causing serious bodily or mental harm. Let me take them in order.

The Supreme Court in Brandenburg against Ohio (1969) made a clear distinction between advocacy, which is free speech protected by the Constitution, and incitement which goes beyond the constitutional protections of the first amendment, thereby producing imminent lawless action. Incitement could be prohibited, according to the Court, and incitement is what the Genocide Convention forbids; it does not affect advocacy whatsoever. It is worth noting that the American Civil Liberties Union, which has never been lax in opposing any action they perceive to threaten civil liberties, has found no threat to the first amendment in this language and endorses the treaty.

The drafters of the Genocide Convention added the section on mental harm to the convention based on incidents during World War II in which drugs were forcibly applied to prisoners of war as part of brainwashing efforts. It does not apply to racial slurs or name calling—as appalling as those may be—and it certainly does not interfere in any way with the right of religious missionaries to preach the Gospel. As the Senate Foreign Relations Committee understanding notes, the mental harm clause refers only to "permanent impairment of mental faculties," for a substantial portion of an ethnic, racial, religious or national group.

AMERICA RESERVES THE RIGHT TO TRY ITS CITIZENS IN AMERICAN COURTS

Third, Senator THURMOND raises the specter that Americans will be extradited abroad, tried in a foreign land without American safeguards, and punished by hostile courts.

The answer to this allegation is a clear and resounding: "No way."

There is no obligation—and I mean none—for the United States to extradite Americans abroad under this convention. The report of the committee which drafted the Genocide Convention states that nothing in this treaty precludes the right of any nation to try its own citizens at home. That passage is reprinted on page 10 of the Foreign Relations Committee's 1976 report to the Senate. In addition, an understnding recommended by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee as part of the resolution of ratification restates that point to assure its clarity. And, finally, the proposed implementing legislation reprinted in the Foreign Relations Committee's report mandates in section 3 that the Secretary of State, in negotiating extradition treaties on this subject, must secure for the United States the right to try its own citizens here at home.

DEFENSE DEPARTMENT ENDORSES GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Finally, Senator THURMOND restates Sam Ervin's agrument that the North Vietnamese could have tried captured American servicemen for genocide, if we had ratified the Genocide Convention.

I find this a curious argument.

Is Senator THURMOND arguing that the Communist North Vietnamese have such respect for international law that they felt they could not try our prisoners of war for genocide because the U.S. Senate had failed to ratify this treaty? That assumes that they have more respect for internationa law than the facts would warrant.

In time of war, there is no law or treaty or the lack of any law or treaty, which will be the perfect guarantee of the rights of our prisoners of war and Senator THURMOND knows it.

But what is clear is that in 1976, when each branch of our armed services was contacted by the American Bar Association, every branch of our services responded that the Genocide Convention deserved our support and did not pose any threat to our fighting men.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, Mr. President, the propriety of the Genocide Convention is clear. Genocide is indeed a matter of international concern as well as domestic concern and the precedents are clear that, time and again, the Senate has adopted treaties with such dual concern.

This convention does not impinge upon our first amendment rights in any way and it will not affect the right of Americans to a trial in an American court with our constitutional safeguards.

Finally, the Genocide Convention will not expose our servicemen to any dangers that they do not now face.

Mr. President, the Genocide Convention is not a panacea for the world's ills. It is an international treaty to punish criminals; criminals who commit the most heinous crime known to man.

It is a treaty whose origins are found in America's most fundamental principles and deserves our wholehearted support. Mr. President, I appreciate this opportunity to set the record straight.

Mr. President, I thank the minority leader. I yield the floor.

QUORUM CALL

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have no further need for my time. I shall be glad to yield it back.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BENTSEN

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. BENTSEN. I thank the Chair very much.

WORLD AGRICULTURAL TRADE

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I should like to continue the series of addresses that I have been making for the last several days concerning the problem that we find the American farmer in today. That is probably the most efficient part of our entire economy, yet farmers are facing the worst days they have faced since 1933—not of their making, but from things beyond their control.

III. THE INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS OF THE UNITED STATES IN AGRICULTURE

Faced with the obvious unfairness of policies such as EC subsidization of agricultural exports that are taking away U.S. markets and reducing commodity prices dangerously—matters I have outlined previously—it would seem reasonable to ask why our international trade agreements have not long ago outlawed such practices. This, in fact, will be the main question we will ask at the hearings scheduled by Chairman DANFORTH for February 11. If I may, Mr. President, let me sketch out the current international legal situation and U.S. statutory policies.

GATT

The main purpose of the international trading system represented by the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), Mr. President, is to produce some degree of stability in world trade by providing a backdrop of trading rules that all the parties to the GATT can depend upon. In the important area of agriculture, these rules tend to be ambiguous and frequently go unenforced.

As the world leader of the free trade system, I believe the United States must try to find ways of working within the existing system to provide fairness and greater opportunity for all. We must resist easy, angry solutions such as withdrawing from the subsidies code or even the GATT itself. The long-term consequences of such an action would adversely effect our nonagricultural as well as our agricultural industries. It would have an incalculable and certainly detrimental effect on world trade and Western security.

We must instead use the system of international agreements and U.S. laws in every possible way to enforce principles of open trade, particularly where other countries' practices deny us export markets in areas such as agriculture.

SUBSIDIES CODE

During the multilateral trade negotiations that led to the Trade Agreements Act of 1979, the United States negotiated an agricultural export subsidies agreement providing that, in addition to the preexisting GATT rules, parties may not grant export subsidies on agricultural products in a way that either displaces exports of another party (bearing in mind developments in world markets) or brings prices for subsidized exports materially below those of other suppliers to a particular market. The full text of article 10 of the subsidies code is set out here for the consideration of the Senate.

Article 10—Export Subsidies on Certain Primary Products.

1. In accordance with the provisions of article XVI:3 of the general agreement, signatories agree not to grant directly or indirectly any export subsidy on certain primary products in a manner which results in the signatory granting such subsidy having more than an equitable share of world export trade in such product, account being taken of the shares of the signatories in trade in the product concerned during a previous representative period, and any special factors which may have affected or may be affecting trade in such product.

2. For purposes of article XVI:3 of the general agreement and paragraph 1 above:

(a) "More than an equitable share of world export trade" shall include any case in which the effect of an export subsidy granted by a signatory is to displace the exports of another signatory bearing in mind the developments on world markets;

(b) With regard to new markets traditional patterns of supply of the product concerned to the world market, region or country, in which the new market is situated shall be taken into account in determining "equitable share of world export trade";

(c) "A previous representative period" shall normally be the three most recent calendar years in which normal market conditions existed.

3. Signatories further agree not to grant export subsidies on exports of certain primary products to a particular market in a manner which results in prices materially below those of other suppliers to the same market.

Other provisions of the Subsidies Code and the GATT apply to this problem, such as the obligation of countries not to threaten serious prejudice to U.S. interests.

U.S. POLICY

As we try to determine whether the United States can use these agreements to defend itself against CAP exports we must take a close look at current U.S. policy as expressed in our trade laws.

The trade policy of the United States is not to freeze international market shares in agricultural products at some past, present, or future level. Nor is it our objective to attack any common policy of a united Europe. But we do have laws to attack unreasonable and unjustifiable practices of our trading partners, especially where those countries—by actions inconsistent with their international trade obligations—impair our own access to foreign markets.

We have laws to protect our own domestic markets from unfair competition. For example, under our countervailing duty law we would impose special duties on European sugar exports to the United States to cancel the effect of the EC sugar subsidy.

When it comes to securing market access for third country export markets (the EC long ago excluded many of our agricultural exports to Europe itself by CAP variable import levies), we also have a law designed to help enforce international trade agreements.

This law, section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974, has not been rigorously employed in the past. Under its provisions, the President has broad discretion to bring trade agreement violations to the attention of foreign governments and to take retaliatory actions.

Until recently, however, Presidents have hardly acted at all under section 301. Even today, they do not seek out such unfairness on their own under this section, but act only on petition of those adversely affected U.S. industries that have the time and resources to file a complaint. Many industries never file 301 complaints because of fear of retaliation and because it takes forever to get final action.

When the executive branch does act on its own, it does not subject itself to section 301 time limits. This can result in years of meaningless informal consultations.

I am informed that the administration has been studying the agricultural export trade problem since the middle of last year. Late in 1981, the administration took increased interest in the subject and began proceedings in the GATT under the Subsidies Code on several complaints brought to its attention by U.S. exporters in wheat flour and poultry.

The administration has also instituted cases involving the effect of CAP subsidies on pasta sales in the United States and on sugar prices in the United States under section 301, which do not directly relate to agricultural exports, and on citrus exports, a case that involves EC import preferences.

THE EUROPEAN REACTION

During the entire period of the CAP, the Congress and its representatives in the administration, especially the U.S. Trade Representative, have brought to the attention of the Commission of the European Communities the problems presented by the CAP. Even as we speak, these problems are again being brought to the attention of the Commission.

The initial reaction from the Commission is unfavorable. Without revealing the content of confidential international negotiations, I can say, Mr. President, that European representatives have tried to sidestep the issues. They strongly suggest that the 1979 Subsidies Code added nothing to the discipline of the international agricultural marketplace. Apparently, they feel that all CAP subsidies were in some sense validated by the U.S. signature on the Subsidies Code.

As a member of the U.S. delegation to the multilateral trade negotiations, I am not aware of any U.S. concession to hold the CAP harmless.

I can understand to a certain extent the concern of the European Commission. Europe, like the United States, is in a recession. Unemployment is high and reducing farm programs might drive European farmers off the farm and into the sagging industrial economy. I am told about 8 percent of the EC work force is still on the farm, compared to only 3.6 percent in this country.

But real unemployment is about as high in this country as in Europe, and the United States is cutting back its farm programs. The EC, in stark contrast, will be spending over $14 billion on agricultural programs in the current fiscal year, compared to about $3 billion in U.S. agricultural price supports. Additionally, EC member states spend on agricultural programs about twice as much as does the EC itself.

Worse yet, the Commission's announced objectives are to increase EC support of agriculture, and specifically to increase its agricultural exports. The Commission is proposing the establishment of nonsubsidy measures to boost exports, including long-term contracts with countries that are not members of the EC for the supply of agricultural products.

The Commission also wants to provide means for assuring that processed agricultural commodities win a growing share of agricultural exports as part of the effort to create jobs. Modest suggestions from the EC Commission to modify the CAP as a cost-saving measure—which might have also reduced slightly EC subsidies—have not been accepted by the EC council.

Thus, the attitude of the EC has been that present international agreements do not apply to their export subsidies despite compelling evidence to the contrary. But that is not the whole story. The EC is committed to increasing and extending both the size and effect of these subsidies.

Tomorrow I shall suggest areas we might explore at our February 11 hearing to improve the current situation.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BENTSEN. I am delighted to yield to my distinguished colleague.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from Texas for his description of what is going on in the European Economic Community.

Their subsidization of agriculture there has had the effect of not only discriminating against the sale of American agricultural produce but it has also generated the production of surpluses, as the Senator has indicated, which they in turn dump in the world marketplace and therefore drive the prices down.

We are, I think, now strongly aware of the inherent protectionism in the whole device of the European Economic Community.

I wonder if the Senator from Texas would also comment on the situation in Japan. If indeed we are to provide a marketplace here for automobiles and electronic products, which the Japanese perhaps produce more efficiently and cheaper than we, is it not reasonable for us to expect that the Japanese should open the doors to American agricultural products in Japan because that is one area in which we produce far more efficiently and cheaper than they, particularly when we consider the fact we are providing Japan with the major part of defense expenditures against potential adversaries?

Mr. BENTSEN. The Senator is absolutely right.

What Japan has done is to put quotas on the importation of agricultural products. They did that to us on beef. In negotiations over there we found that they said, "Look, we will take an additional 10,000 tons of U.S. beef; that is a lot of beef."

I figured it up and that was equivalent to about one hamburger per Japanese per year. I did not think that impressive.

We really did not have the kind of breakthrough we should have had.

The same thing is true on citrus. The Japanese fight us on importation of oranges and importation of grapefruit. They put severe restrictions on that. And we have had to fight hard to keep them from flooding our rice markets with their subsidized rice.

When we talk about automobiles, they say, "Look, we have the same percentage virtually on tariffs that you have on automobiles, why should you compain about that?" The difference is that when they import American cars into Japan, when it comes to the safety standards and the EPA standards they require an inspection on every single one of those cars. But when we bring them into this country we inspect only one out of many. Take a Toyota that sells for $8,500 in this country. It sells for $8,500 in Japan. But take a Chevrolet Citation similar to what I drive, it sells for $8,500 in this country but it sells for $15,000 in that country.

So it is all of these nontariff barriers that they add on that escalate the costs and keep our products out.

Look at what happened to us in electronics and what happened to us on televisions. One can see the whole theme of it where they established their market share in this country but put limitations on the imports into Japan until they had developed a strong domestic industry.

I will tell you how they negotiate. The Japanese negotiate by talk and talk and ship and ship and talk and talk and ship and ship.

The concessions they are talking about now are minimal. And why are they talking about these additional concessions? Because they see how concerned we are in Congress, they are talking about some concessions that do not amount to anything.

There still is no significant breakthrough.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair advises the Senator that his time under the special order has expired.

Mr. BENTSEN. I thank my colleague.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BUMPERS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I thank the Chair very much.

S. 2062—TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, the bill I am introducing today is a reintroduction of the bill that I introduced in 1979, and it is designed to cover an oversight which occurred 20 years ago.

As a matter of fact, I think the distinguished Senator who sits in the Chair and represents the great State of Mississippi (Mr. COCHRAN) is aware of this.

In 1959 the Tennessee Valley Authority Act was amended to allow the Tennessee Valley Authority to issue its own bonds. Because there was a feeling at the time that such authority would enable TVA to freely expand its service area to the detriment of private utilities, the act was amended to restrict TVA's service area. The restrictions were left somewhat flexible, however, in order to allow TVA to make adjustments to serve areas contiguous with its service area as it stood when the restriction was imposed. The single rigid restriction is that TVA is not allowed to sell power in a State which it was not serving on July 1, 1957. Apparently to avoid unduly harsh results to certain cities in Kentucky, Georgia, and Tennessee, those cities were specifically exempted from the restriction.

This bill merely adds the city of West Memphis, Ark., to the list of exempted cities, and it does so without violating the purposes and principles of the overall restriction. West Memphis is contiguous with Memphis, which is within TVA's service area. Statistically, West Memphis is considered a part of Memphis, as defined by the Bureau of Census' standard metropolitan statistical area, and, as such, West Memphis is counted as part of Memphis for purposes of receiving some Federal aid. Moreover, electricity generated by TVA may well be sold in West Memphis at this time, as a result of power exchange agreements with other suppliers, because of exchange agreements between Arkansas Power & Light which does serve West Memphis, and TVA.

I want to emphasize the limited definitive nature of this amendment, because it does not reopen the debate over public power versus private power, and the citizens of West Memphis should not become hostage to the argument. The amendment does not require TVA to sell power to West Memphis; nor does it require West Memphis to buy TVA's power. It gives each party freedom of choice rather than imposing a barrier, which in this particular case is purely artificial and, for that matter, contrary to the purpose of the territorial restriction which was intended to allow extensions of TVA service to contiguous areas, such as West Memphis. Indeed, West Memphis would qualify for TVA service, even under the present restrictions, except for the statute's use of State boundaries as a barrier to the flow of TVA power, which is the Mississippi River which separates Tennessee and Arkansas, and is absolutely arbitrary and demonstrates, since it is united economically with Memphis by the very boundary between the two States, that it simply bars West Memphis from sharing in TVA power. It is especially ironic that this arbitrary barrier should exist under Federal law when it would most likely be unconstitutional if Tennessee had imposed it upon a private utility. I am not proposing to eliminate that barrier in toto, even though it would be justified. I only propose that it be removed to the extent that it artificially walls off West Memphis from participation in TVA's power. Thus, the amendment merely puts West Memphis within the wall.

The 31,000 people in West Memphis are victims of a rank injustice, because the disparity between their electricity rates and those across the Mississippi precludes them from competing with their neighbors for industry. West Memphis is a lovely city. It has great people. It has good leadership. It has worked so hard to build its economy, and it simply will never be able to make the strides it is entitled to make as long as this barrier and this injustice exist. In 1979, an industrial user in West Memphis was paying $3,413 for 100,000 kilowatt--hours, while an industrial user 3 miles away in Memphis was paying $2,830. That is a 20-percent difference. Similarly, commercial users in West Memphis were paying $167 for 3,000 kilowatt-hours, while commercial users in Memphis were paying $111, a difference of 50 percent. Finally, residential users in West Memphis were paying $37 for 1,000 kilowatt-hours, but residential users in Memphis were paying $29, a difference of 28 percent.

If it were not for the river, there would just be a street or a line dividing those two cities, and everybody would say, "Well, this is just insane." But simply because the river is there it has been excepted.

These differentials have widened in recent months as the rates of the Arkansas Power & Light Co. have risen. The city of West Memphis is completely dependent upon A.P. & L. for its power, and it has recently imposed a further large increase upon its customers. West Memphis had no choice but to acquiesce in that increase, because it has no other source of supply. My bill would merely allow it the opportunity to negotiate with the A.P. & L. grid. Thus we are not talking about a construction project. We are not talking about any cost to the Federal Government. We are talking about simple justice. We are talking about this law and the pushing of a button to rectify that injustice.

We are all acutely aware of the necessity for minimizing the cost of energy, not only by conserving but by seeking less expensive sources of energy. This bill would simply allow West Memphis a fully justified opportunity to undertake that search.

Now, Mr. President, this is an idea whose time has come. We do it now or we can do it later, but it has to be done, and I ask all of my colleagues to think very seriously about this. I am not trying to open up TVA and force it to sell power to everybody that wants it. There is not another case in the country that comes even close to the injustice that is presented here.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that editorials from the Memphis Commercial Appeal dated September 1, 1979, and from the Memphis Press-Scimitar dated September 12, 1979, be inserted in the RECORD. These editorials by these two papers in Memphis strongly support this legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that a resolution adopted by the Arkansas General Assembly and a resolution by the West Memphis City Council be printed in the RECORD.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill amending the TVA Act be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FRIENDS IN NEED

The business of Memphis and Memphians does not begin or end at the corporate limits of this city. Rather, it reaches across the municipal boundaries, county lines and state borders that touch Memphis on all sides. This is not several contiguous communities but one community, though we don't always realize it. There are current cases in point.

For example, the City of Memphis and the Tennessee Valley Authority should move to help the power needs of the people of West Memphis and Crittenden County, Ark. This community and TVA should actively support a bill pending in Congress to extend TVA power across the river and make our neighbors there full partners in the future of this metropolitan area.

That's what we are, and that's how we must learn to act.

Recent actions by the Arkansas Power & Light Co. deepened energy problems in West Memphis and strengthened the city's arguments for TVA service.

West Memphis Utilities had been offered 2-percent interests in each of AP&L's new generating plants at White Bluff and Independence. The city had begun the process of selling some $30 million in bonds to purchase its shares. But then AP&L cut the deal in half. Crittenden County's industrial and economic development hopes have long been disadvantaged by the cheaper TVA power on this side of the Mississippi. When the county's wholesale supplier chopped its future power sources, even at higher costs, it left the area with no place to turn except the valley authority.

It is no longer enough for TVA to say, as board Chairman David Freeman did in February, "West Memphis would not be big enough to make us or break us." That sort of left-handed acknowledgement that TVA has the power to sell if Congress says it should, isn't going to get this job done. The time has come for the authority to look upon this case as an opportunity for one of its primary service areas.

Of course, Freeman's lack of enthusiasm has been rooted in the laws which prohibit TVA from being "the principal source of power supply" for areas outside its statutory boundaries, and in what he has seen as practical limits to TVA capacities. He also said last winter, "We have our hands full with Memphis. Our current planning is geared to meet the needs of the people currently within the valley. . . ." But that's just the point. The people of West Memphis are "currently within the valley" economically and spiritually, if not geographically.

Indeed, the geographic definition of the valley was made in an arbitrary political act to include Memphis. New political adjustments to the map now would be entirely in keeping with that tradition.

If the growth fortunes of TVA are tied to those of its biggest and best customers, and they are, then it now behooves TVA officials to lend their full weight to the bill introduced by Sen. Dale Bumpers (D-Ark.) which has been languishing at a sub-level of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

The same goes for the business and political leaders of Memphis. West Memphians aren't our distant relations. They are members of our urban family. We've heard the arguments that what's good for us is good for them, and it is. But the reverse of that is equally true. If TVA power locates business and jobs over the bridges only the most parochial among us could count it as a loss to Memphis. In fact, all of us would have gained on the goal of building a single progressive metropolitan community of national importance.

The route there is not one-way, however. And as the need to assist West Memphis in its search for adequate power argues against Memphis holding to its own provincial interests, the business about building a $12-million private hospital in DeSoto County, Miss., makes the same point about our regional neighbors. Proponents of the project, facing a comprehensive state health plan which recognizes the medical services available to DeSoto countians in Memphis and a surplus of beds in the area, have fallen back on that old bromide, "Keep the money in Mississippi." Are they willing to keep all their indigent patients, too?

We doubt it.

When the Mississippi Health Care Commission approved a requested certificate of need for this facility, it held that the normal rules shouldn't apply because DeSoto County's circumstances were "unique." They are. DeSoto County is a part of metropolitan Memphis. The DeSoto County growth rate cited as the need for the hospital project is evidence of that fact. Does anyone believe DeSoto County would be growing at any significant rate were it not for Memphis? Would there be a Southaven without a Memphis?

The unique circumstances do not suggest that DeSoto County be encouraged to go it alone. Instead, they indicate that the county should be made a part of the Memphis health service area, as suggested by Dr. Alton Cobb, Mississippi's health officer. That is not because we want to "keep all the money in Memphis," but because the many parts of this single community are interdependent.

If men aren't islands unto themselves, neither are the urban communities they have built.

TVA FOR WEST MEMPHIS

Undaunted by Tennessee Valley Authority board opposition to their latest bid for electric power, West Memphians vow to continue their fight. And well they should.

It would be a logical move to extend TVA service to Memphis' sister city to the west. It is, after all, part of the Memphis metropolitan area, and the cheaper power would provide a much needed economic boost.

At present, West Memphis is struggling under the handicap of higher-priced power supplied by the Arkansas Power & Light Co. Industrial growth has been stymied as a result. And lest any Memphians think this is strictly a West Memphis problem, industrial progress across the river invariably benefits the entire Memphis area.

TVA officials almost as a matter of routine resist efforts to bring additional territory within the utility's boundaries. It has repeatedly opposed suggested expansion across the Mississippi River, and reaffirmed that position this week.

At any rate, decisions on whether to change the utility's boundaries are made in Congress. And Arkansans are pushing hard on that front.

A bill by Sen. Dale Bumpers that would amend the TVA act to include West Memphis is in the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee. Meanwhile, Rep. Bill Alexander has a measure in the House Public Works and Transportation Committee that would provide TVA power to all of Crittenden County.

Support of those worthy measures by Memphis area leaders could help sway the needed votes.

An interesting aspect is that very little actually would be involved in adding West Memphis to the system. "It's just a matter of throwing a switch," said P. G. Para, manager of the West Memphis Utility Department. "Right this minute I may be using TVA current. It's already available in West Memphis. Arkansas Power & Light and TVA swap out all the time when one or the other needs energy. But we always pay AP&L rates."

David Freeman, TVA board chairman, was quoted recently as saying that West Memphis (which Para says has about 8,000 residential electricity customers compared to Memphis' 265,000, and used just 61,000 kilowatts of power in July compared to Memphis' 13 million kilowatts) would neither make nor break TVA.

"But TVA could make West Memphis." Para correctly points out.

It's an opportunity the Arkansas city should not be denied.

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION URGING CONGRESS TO ENACT LEGISLATION AUTHORIZING THE TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY TO SELL ELECTRICITY TO THE CITY OF WEST MEMPHIS

Whereas, it appears that the Tennessee Valley Authority has the capacity for generating a substantial amount of surplus electricity; and

Whereas, the City of West Memphis is a part of the standard metropolitan statistical area of Memphis, Tennessee; and

Whereas, Memphis, Tennessee is served by the Tennessee Valley Authority but federal law now prohibits the TVA from selling electricity to the City of West Memphis; and

Whereas, since the City of West Memphis owns its own electric utility and is the only such city within a standard metropolitan statistical area served by TVA which is not allowed to purchase electricity from TVA; and

Whereas, it would not result in increased cost to the TVA to sell electricity to the City of West Memphis; and

Whereas, this prohibition in current federal law is blatantly discriminatory against the City of West Memphis and should be eliminated so that the residents of West Memphis may enjoy the same treatment as the other residents of the Memphis standard metropolitan statistical area with regard to the consumption of electricity: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the first extraordinary session of the seventy-third General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, (the Senate concurring therein), That the United States Congress is hereby urged to enact legislation authorizing the Tennessee Valley Authority to sell electricity to the City of West Memphis, Arkansas.

Be it further resolved, That upon the adoption of this Resolution an appropriate copy hereof be transmitted by the Chief Clerk of the House to each member of the Arkansas Congressional Delegation.

RESOLUTION No. 861

Whereas, the City of West Memphis, Arkansas, passed Resolution No. 834, April 16, 1981, at which time Notice was given to Arkansas Power and Light Company that within sixty (60) months from the date of the Notice the City of West Memphis, Arkansas, would seek additional electrical power; and,

Whereas, the Power Coordination Interchange and Transmission Agreement requires that this Notice be given; and,

Whereas, the City of West Memphis desires to seek additional power in an effort to sell electricity cheaper to the Citizens of West Memphis; and,

Whereas, legislation has been entered in the Congress of the United States at Washington, D.C., for the City of West Memphis to buy some of its power from the Tennessee Valley Authority; and,

Whereas, it is in the utmost interest of the Citizens of West Memphis, Arkansas, that this legislation be passed and the present law of the Tennessee Valley Authority which prohibits selling electricity out of its boundaries be expanded to include the City of West Memphis, Arkansas: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the City Council of the City of West Memphis, Arkansas:

1. That our Senators and Congressmen in Washington, D.C., renew their efforts to secure legislation allowing the Tennessee Valley Authority to sell electricity to the City of West Memphis in the future.

2. That copies of this Resolution be sent to: The Honorable Dale Bumpers; the Honorable David Pryor; and, the Honorable Bill Alexander.

S. 2062

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Section 15d(a) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act is amended by inserting the words "West Memphis, Arkansas," following the words "South Fulton, Tennessee."

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RADIO AND TELEVISION COVERAGE OF SENATE DEBATE

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have long been on record as being in favor of permitting radio and television coverage of Senate proceedings. I stand firm in the belief that allowing the electronic media to cover Senate debate would be in the best interests of the American people—and, yes, in the long term best interests of the U.S. Senate as well.

In fact, I sponsored a similar resolution myself more than 2 years ago which called for opening the Senate debate on the Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty to radio and television coverage as an experiment for eventual full-time coverage of Senate floor action.

Mr. President, television is a reality. The Senate simply can not continue to ignore this important medium that is so widely used by the American people as a primary source of news and information. The American people are interested in what goes on inside the Senate Chamber and they deserve to have the opportunity to see firsthand how their lawmakers conduct the business of the Nation.

In 1979, the House of Representatives opened its doors and began to provide television signals to the broadcast media. The experience in the House has been widely considered a success.

Here in the Senate, committee hearings have been broadcast and Panama Canal Treaty debate was covered live on radio—both have been done with great success. I have seen little, if any, evidence during these episodes of the "showboating" or playing to the cameras that some argue will occur if we allow television coverage of the floor debate.

Due to the success of all these experiments, I believe the next logical step is to allow full radio and television broadcast coverage of Senate proceedings.

Mr. President, as I said earlier, I have long been in favor of permitting radio and television coverage of legislatures, courts, and other forums where the public's business is conducted. During my term as chief justice of the Alabama Supreme Court, we opened the doors of my State's courts to television cameras.

Our allowing television coverage of both trials and appellate court proceedings generated a movement which has led to broadcast coverage of many trials and hearings in other State courts.

Televising court proceedings can bring into conflict two constitutional guarantees; namely, the first amendment which guarantees the freedom of the press, and the sixth amendment which guarantees the defendant a fair and impartial trial. Conversely, if photojournalism is allowed in the Senate Chamber, I can foresee no conflict between provisions in our Constitution.

Perhaps a review of the consideration given the issue of radio and photojournalism from a judicial system basis will be helpful to the Senate in considering this issue.

In hearings before the Supreme Court of Alabama, the media made a strong case when it pointed out that photographing and broadcasting by television and radio of a church service did not affect the dignity of the service. It also pointed out that when sophisticated and advanced technology is employed, participants in the church service are not distracted, and the solemnity of the worship service remains unharmed.

Experts testified that the media can now use noiseless long range cameras, overhead lighting, still photography without flashbulbs, and other advanced equipment.

The Supreme Court of Alabama approached the issue as to whether, in the majority of the cases, the use of camera, radio, and television instruments would interfere with a fair and impartial trial and with the effective administration of justice. It first considered radio. The court had, for some time prior thereto, been recording oral arguments. It concluded that noiseless and effective broadcasting devices could be placed at designated locations which would record the proceedings accurately and clearly for later radio broadcasting without disturbing court proceedings in any way.

It was apparent to the court that, in the vast majority of cases, radio recording devices would not detract from the dignity of the proceedings or cause prejudice to the parties any more than its own recording system.

Next, the court considered photojournalism. There was no doubt in the minds of the justices that problems could arise. They saw the constant popping of flashbulbs, spotlighting of television lights in the eyes of witnesses, lawyers, jurists, and jurors and wires getting tangled in the chairs and knocking over water pitchers as serious impediments to the effective administration of justice.

However, if the media used advanced camera technology, employed only overhead lighting, and restricted camera movement to designated areas, these problems could be minimized.

The justices also considered that if cameramen and other reporters conducted themselves in the same manner that was expected of spectators, then the resulting harm would be eliminated.

The court further realized that if photographers used silent cameras without flashbulbs and took their pictures from inconspicuous locations, then there would be little danger that the use of such cameras would detract from the dignity of the proceedings.

Adequate overhead lighting can be provided in a manner that would be almost unnoticeable. Areas of movement for camera personnel can be restricted, and orderly conduct required. If desired, a dress code can be enforced for members of the camera crews.

Pooling by television networks has been used effectively by the White House. The number of cameras in the balconies of the Senate Chamber can also be limited. The experience of the television coverage in the House of Representatives can be beneficial to the Senate in formulating rules and guidelines for the media coverage.

Drawing from my experience of participating and observing electronic journalism in courtrooms, and relating this to the facilities of the Senate, I foresee no real problems relative to the dignity of the proceedings, such as distractions.

I have mentioned still photography, as well as radio and television in my remarks about the considerations to be given to this area of media in courtrooms. The issue of still photography may be irrelevant to the resolution currently at hand, but I think that, sooner or later, the issue of comprehensive media journalism will confront the Senate.

The U.S. Supreme Court has established that freedom of the press is not confined to newspaper or printed periodicals, but is a right of wide import and "* * * in its historic connotation comprehends every sort of publication which affords a vehicle of information and opinion." Lovell v. City of Griffin, 303 U.S. 444.

Personally, I am a strong believer in first amendment rights, and feel that all forms of reporting journalism should be allowed in the Senate Chamber. However, I fully realize that there are some who will disagree with my position and I respect their right to do so.

Mr. President, I must admit I have some reservations concerning Senate Resolution 20 as it is now written. It is my understanding that if the Senate approves Senate Resolution 20, the Rules Committee will be given total and final authority to set guidelines concerning the placement of cameras, distribution of audio and video tapes, and other rules and regulations. All this without any further consideration or vote by the full Senate.

Mr. President, I would be forced to oppose Senate Resolution 20 if it were being voted on today. However, we are not voting on Senate Resolution 20 but on a motion to proceed with consideration of that resolution. I believe the problems with Senate Resolution 20 can be worked out during the deliberations over the merits of the resolution. I indeed hope so.

It is time to open the Senate to the American people—those voters who sent us to Washington to do the public's work. Therefore, I shall vote for proceeding with consideration of this resolution with the profound and sincere hope that any reservations that I hold concerning its implementation will be corrected by amendment.

Mr. President, I do not wish to wage that battle today, but I sincerely believe Senate Resolution 20 is flawed because it does not allow for a final review by each Member of this body before the Rules Committee's guidelines go into effect.

Thank you.

S. 1956—AUTHORIZATION FOR REIMBURSEMENT OF CHIROPRACTIC SERVICES PROVIDED TO VETERANS

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise today to offer my support for S. 1956, legislation which was introduced by my colleague, Mr. THURMOND of South Carolina, on December 15, 1981. This bill would insure chiropractic care when necessary to eligible veterans under the Veterans' Administration medical care program.

Mr. President, this legislation would not establish any new policy within the Veterans' Administration. Indeed, the VA already has the authority to refer eligible veterans to a chiropractor for necessary treatment. Unfortunately, for our veterans, this authority is infrequently used. Veterans in need of chiropractic care should be allowed to seek and obtain the services of a chiropractic doctor at VA expense. Other Federal and State health care programs already allow reimbursement for chiropractic services.

In the United States, the present number of chiropractic patients is an estimated 10 to 20 million. There are more than 30 million living veterans in the United States who risked their lives to defend our Nation in time of war. Of this great number, I believe there are many veterans who should be but are not receiving needed chiropractic treatment.

To insure the proper medical treatment our veterans so justly deserve, this bill will establish a pilot program which would compel much needed chiropractic referral and care within the VA. It limits expenditures for chiropractic services to $4 million in any fiscal year and also limits the veterans who are eligible for such benefits.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I am pleased to be a cosponsor of this bill to authorize reimbursement for the reasonable charge for chiropractic services provided to certain veterans. This important piece of legislation would reaffirm benefits offered to those veterans who sacrificed for this Nation in its hour of need.

I commend my friend and colleague from South Carolina, Mr. THURMOND, for his leadership on this crucial matter and I urge the full Senate to give this legislation its favorable consideration.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BIOMEDICAL AND CANCER RESEARCH

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in President Reagan's recent State of the Union address he proposed an increase of over $100 million in funding for research at the National Institutes of Health. I was very pleased to hear the President make such a proposal.

It was just a few weeks ago that I learned from various reports that David Stockman, Director of the Office of Management and Budget, was preparing to propose a reduction in funding for health programs in the 1983 fiscal year which would have gone far beyond previous spending cuts. On January 8, I wrote President Reagan, urging that he give his full support to the important health research efforts at the National Institutes of Health, particularly in the field of cancer research, and carefully consider any proposed further reductions in their funding. I am glad that the President did oppose further budget reductions and, in fact, decided to support an increase in funding.

It was a little more than a decade ago that our Nation declared war on the horrible disease of cancer. Just before last Christmas, the National Cancer Act, the landmark legislation that greatly expanded and intensified our effort to conquer cancer, was 10 years old.

Although the war has not yet been won, and although the ultimate goal of totally wiping out cancer has not yet been reached, unbelievable progress has been made. It is most important that we work to see that this progress shall continue.

The progress that has been made has largely been because of the National Institutes of Health and its National Cancer Institute. The mission of the NIH is to improve the health of the American people. To carry out this mission, the NIH conducts and supports biomedical research into the causes, prevention, and cure of diseases.

A major component of the National Institutes of Health is the National Cancer Institute, which has developed a national cancer program to expand existing scientific knowledge on cancer cause and prevention, as well as on the diagnosis, treatment, and rehabilitation of cancer patients.

Research facilities are supported by grants from the National Cancer Institute, and other institutes of the NIH, and are often provided through university-based programs. In the State of Alabama alone, the work done under these research grants has been staggering. In 1980 and 1981, more than $60 million in health research support grants were awarded to 13 universities and hospitals in Alabama. Of this, some $4.5 million was awarded to the University of South Alabama in Mobile, and more than $5 million went to Southern Research Institute in Birmingham. Both institutions are known across the country for the outstanding work done there under the auspices of the National Institutes of Health. Southern Research is particularly known for the work done there in cancer research.

However, the flagship of biomedical and cancer research in Alabama is the medical complex at the University of Alabama in Birmingham. That university, in 1980 and 1981, received a total of more than $47 million in research grants from NIH, and has built what is truly one of the greatest records in biomedical research in the Nation, if not the world. In 1981, more than $6 million in research grants were awarded to the UAB Comprehensive Cancer Center there in Birmingham. That center is regarded as one of the top two or three such centers for cancer treatment and research in the country.

Through research institutions such as these, the talents of the entire Nation are brought together under the National Institutes of Health, to find new ways of insuring better health for every sector of America, and for every American.

It is because of the priority of these research efforts that I was completely shocked and appalled when I learned of the possibility of OMB proposing a further reduction in their funding for the 1983 fiscal year.

Such reductions would strike a great blow against our war on cancer, for it would require the cutting of these fine research projects and programs at the National Institutes of Health, and the National Cancer Institute.

Under the leadership of these health research agencies, we have come too far in our fight against cancer and other health problems to abandon the efforts now. Indeed, to a great extent, the health research of today will determine the health of the American people tomorrow, for even though it has been written that money cannot buy health, money can fund research programs which find ways to restore health to those unfortunate enough to lose it.

One of the highest priority areas in this research has been our fight against cancer. As a result of decades of work, great progress has been made. It is not possible to describe every advance that has been made toward the prevention and cure of cancer. A look at the broad gains shows the achievement of cures for some forms of cancer, gains in survival for many forms, greatly enhanced knowledge of prevention, and sweeping advances in fundamental areas that will serve as the basis for further improvements in prevention, diagnosis, and treatment. Expanded training programs have increased the number of doctors who are cancer specialists—from about 100 in the late 1960's to almost 3,000 today.

As a result of all this progress, many patients with some types of cancer can be cured, but, regrettably, much more still remains to be done.

Cancer is still a disease that knows no class, income level, lifestyle, race, or sex. It is still a disease that can strike anyone, at any time. The National Cancer Institute estimates that 805,000 Americans will develop cancer this year. Approximately one of three will survive 5 years or more after treatment. Not long ago, that rate was only one out of five.

If you exclude cancer victims who die of other causes—old age, accidents, heart disease—the survival rate today reaches above 40 percent. The death rate from cancer for Americans under the age of 55, where cancer is the single largest cause of death from disease, is decreasing. The decrease is even greater for those patients under 30.

We can now expect to cure half of all children with cancer through the use of modern treatment methods. Gains have been made in the fight against breast cancer—the major cancer killer of women.

Still, despite all these advances, cancer remains a major killer. It is estimated that almost one-half a million people died of cancer in 1981; the estimated annual cost of cancer in financial terms is $30 billion.

Yes, a great deal has been done, but much still remains to be done, too much for us to forsake our tasks now.

This is why it is imperative that we continue to support the important work being done in cancer research. I do not for one moment urge that we abandon all the other health and biomedical research being carried out by the National Institutes of Health. However, I do urge that the increase in funding proposed by the President go toward making further progress in our fight against cancer.

When I learned of the anticipated budget cuts in programs of the NIH and NCI, I spoke out because I could not stand as an idle witness to the disruptive effects that any such reductions would have on our continued progress in biomedical and cancer research.

Now that such a total disruption has been averted, I cannot support a retreat from our long battle against cancer, particularly when we have come so far. I hope that each of you will join with me in urging that the additional research money be used to intensify our attack.

Only through our united, continued support of the crucial work at the National Cancer Institute, and its research programs at universities and hospitals across the United States can we finally succeed. Only through such support can we reach the final goal of our long struggle, and give a great gift to mankind by finding a cure for this killer called cancer.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter I recently wrote to the President, urging his full support for the important research at these institutes, be printed in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that a transcript of remarks made by Dr. Vincent Devida, Jr., Director of the National Cancer Institute, at the dedication of Southern Research Institute's Howard E. Skipper Chemotherapy Laboratory, in Birmingham, Ala., be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE,
SCIENCE, AND TRANSPORTATION,
Washington, D.C., January 8, 1982.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: It has come to my attention through recent press reports that additional budget cuts are anticipated for the National Institutes of Health programs for fiscal year 1983.

I am concerned over the disruptive effects that any further cuts would have on the continued progress in biomedical research; particularly in the area of cancer research.

As you of course know, during the past decade, tremendous strides have been made in the diagnosis and treatment of cancer. In addition, unprecedented advances have provided limitless opportunities to find the cure for cancer. In fact, I am advised that as a result of these achievements, many patients with cancer can be cured. However, the ultimate goal of cancer research is to find a cure for all types of this horrible disease.

The Comprehensive Training and Education programs at the National Institutes of Health have been a tremendous help by disseminating information to the public, hospitals, clinics, and physicians in private practice. Therefore, I urge you to give your full support to the important health research efforts at the National Institutes of Health and carefully evaluate further reductions in their budget.

With kindest regards, I am

Sincerely yours,

HOWELL HEFLIN.

OPEN LETTER TO HOWARD SKIPPER

(By Dr. Vincent T. DeVita, Jr.)

It is always a pleasure to come to Southern Research Institute and it's a greater pleasure to come to this institute on this occasion—the 10th anniversary of the National Cancer Program and the dedication of a building in the name of one of our favorite persons, particularly in the cancer treatment field.

On this occasion of the 10th anniversary of the National Cancer Program I am often asked to make some statement about what kind of progress has been made. I will not burden you with a long list of these things, except to say that when one looks at the contrasts in the field of cancer research in 1970 and in 1981, those contrasts are striking. It's very interesting to let that gap of 10 years go by and reflect on these changes. Some of the things we can do now in cancer research, and some of the promise that we have in cancer research, were things that dreams were made of in 1970. In fact, had I, as director of the National Cancer Institute, mentioned some of these things from a podium like this 10 years ago, people would have thought I had taken leave of my senses.

Nowhere is the contrast more striking than in the field of cancer treatment with drugs, and no institution in the country—probably in the world—has a more distinguished place in the history of cancer chemotherapy than Southern Research. And this is largely due to the man we are here to honor today, Dr. Howard Skipper.

I entered the field of cancer research in 1963. This was a very critical time period for cancer chemotherapy. The impact of Dr. Skipper's work reverberated across the field like a whipcrack and changed the field practically overnight, in medical terms, from one that relied almost totally on empiricism to a field that was heavily laced with inductive reasoning. He had a very strong influence in my career, personally. As a matter of fact, as I look around the room, I think he's had a very strong impact on the career of everybody whose face I recognize, and I am sure that's probably true for many of the other people here whose faces I don't recognize.

I want to tell you it's not really easy to talk about Howard Skipper. As a matter of fact, as I sat down, Dr. Skipper leaned over and said to me, "Now Vince, stick to the facts. Don't embellish it!" I told him I did not want to step out of character but, on this occasion, I will stick to the facts, Howard. He resists all attempts at flattery. I think he's probably the most humble scientist I have ever met, in a field that is not always noted for its overabundance of humility.

I want to express my feelings about Dr. Skipper in a little bit more personal way. I received my instructions from Howard Skipper over a period of 15 years, in a series of booklets that is now threatening to bring my bookshelf to the ground. I want to tell Howard a little bit about how I feel about him and about, I think, how many of my colleagues feel about him. So I have chosen to write a letter to you, Dr. Skipper, which you'll receive shortly. And I'd like to read it to the audience. It could be a lot longer than it is, because there are many, many things we could say about you, but for your sake, Howard, I have made it mercifully short. So if the audience will bear with me, I would like to read this letter:

DEAR HOWARD: I feel somewhat presumptuous making a speech at a dedication ceremony in your honor. There are many of your colleagues who deserve the honor more than I, and it is indeed an honor. I chose a letter because some of the things I have to say can be expressed less formally this way. Also, nowadays I'm never sure I'm going to make it but a letter will (or should).

There are several things I've always wanted to say about you and now is a good time:

First, you can't imagine the influence you have had on the field of cancer chemotherapy in the last 20 years. I came to the Cancer Institute 17 years ago out of a good residency training program in internal medicine. I was proud of what I knew. I had assembled the facts, and the facts were you couldn't cure cancer with drugs. Knowing this made using drugs easy. Since we knew they couldn't do much good, we were careful to train ourselves to use drugs in such a way as to assure no harm. This usually meant low doses of both drugs and optimism and convenient schedules. Cancers, especially hematologic malignancies, were interesting though and we busied ourselves describing phenomena related to the diseases themselves. If you stop to think about it, you might think it peculiar that one so young and new in the field could already be so fixed in his ways, but that's the way it was and still is in medicine. New people are a product of their environment and their teachers. Lacking experience, we defend ourselves with facts or what we perceive to be the facts.

I found something strange happening at the Cancer Institute. No one seemed to be obeying the rules. You had come along and spoke of cure of L1210 leukemia. You even had the audacity to suggest that the same thing might be possible in leukemia of humans, if we would go about doing what we did somewhat differently.

It's hard now to recreate for you the atmosphere your work generated. Probably it's even harder for you since you never seem to think anything you do is important. But what you and Schabel and all the other workers here at Southern Research did was give the minds of eager young clinical researchers, which were not yet entirely rigidly impaled on the facts they assembled, something more palatable to work with—hypotheses, good hypotheses. We still had to dodge the folks who scorned the concept of curing cancer with drugs. Right or wrong, these people never seem to be in doubt or in short supply, but the Clinical Center at NCI was a good place to hide under the protection of your good friends, Gordon Zubrod and Tom Frei. We had some good drugs and some concepts to test, and a whole bunch of us took off running at trying to cure leukemias and lymphomas.

Well, you know the results. These cancers are now curable with drugs. You were right. It really didn't even prove that difficult once we adjusted to the differences between mice and humans.

I'm sure these things are old hat to you and the people at this ceremony. You, undoubtedly, have heard them many times before.

There are, however, two other points I would like to make that you perhaps haven't heard, or if you have heard them, you can't have heard them often enough:

First, I'm a doctor, I always have been and when push comes to shove, I always will be a doctor. I go to clinics and I take care of patients. Howard, you can't imagine the feeling we doctors get when we treat patients successfully, especially with "the new boy on the block," chemotherapy. Working with those mice is convenient and must be satisfying to you, but it can't provide as much satisfaction as we get saving human lives. The thrill of seeing a patient with Hodgkin's disease I treated successfully 15 years ago is really beyond my power of description and makes any struggle I have had to go through worthwhile. There is now a whole generation of medical oncologists who experience these feelings daily. Howard, we doctors owe you a lot. You gave us this thrill. On behalf of all these doctors, I want to thank you.

The second point is this: As I said, I go to clinics still, although less often than I'd like to these days. When I do, I am well received. The patients recognize me as a doctor who had something to do with developing a treatment for their cancer. You can't imagine how it is to see the fear and despair of these patients turn to hope for a normal life. I know all those patients and their families would be saying these things to you personally if they knew how important you were to their lives. Sadly, Howard, we get all of the credit. They don't know who you are. I imagine that those smelly mice are not at all grateful to you either. So, on behalf of the thousands of patients (almost 40,000 a year now cured by chemotherapy), on behalf of their fathers and mothers, husbands and wives and children, I thank you, Howard. I thank you very much.

Finally, having a building named in your honor at Southern Research is perhaps the nicest honor you will ever receive. It isn't the first and it won't be the last, but it is, undoubtedly, the nicest. The folks at Southern Research Institute have a great deal of good sense. They had the good sense to bring you here and to keep you here and provide you with excellent staff and excellent resources. Now that you've retired, they've had the good sense to name a building in your honor. But I want you to know, Howard, none of us are taking your retirement seriously; after all, what would we do without your booklets?

I remain,

Your grateful student,

VINCE DEVITA.

TELEVISION AND RADIO COVERAGE OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I support Senate Resolution 20, a resolution submitted by the very distinguished majority leader. I am happy to report that I am a cosponsor.

I am perfectly well aware of the arguments that have been marshaled against this measure—it will cost too much, it will cause Senators to perform for the cameras, it will tend to harden positions because of the glare of publicity. Indeed, we are all familiar with those arguments because they have been used repeatedly to oppose change, especially change that would open up the legislative process to public view.

Woodrow Wilson convinced an entire world that democracy was premised on openness—"open covenants openly arrived at." But our own Government has been excruciatingly slow in implementing the most basic changes that would assure the people of openness and forthrightness.

I fear that our reluctance to open our debate to public view will be interpreted by some that we have things to hide. Quite frankly, Mr. President, there are times when this body acts in a manner that might well be restrained by the presence of television cameras. Under the full glare of public inspection, I wonder how easily we would pass legislation to effectively exempt us from paying Federal taxes, a decision I hope this body will quickly reconsider. I also wonder if we would as easily have raised the ceiling on the honoraria a Senator can receive—payments which, unfortunately, create a sense of obligation, and which may subtly affect legislation. Finally, I wonder whether the hundreds of millions of taxpayers' money that will ultimately be spent on a new Senate office building would have been authorized so easily. In short, I wonder whether the presence of television cameras would not be a positive benefit, not only to the public we represent but also to ourselves.

Each and every step we have taken toward openness in government has had positive, not negative, effects. Opponents of Senate Resolution 20 should be reassured that the consequences of allowing television and radio coverage of the House have been less than catastrophic. After a few weeks of initiation, the cameras were no longer an obstruction but were an unobtrusive part of the daily routine. Surely, it will not be said that Senators are less able to cope with the presence of television cameras than our counterparts in the House.

The Senate has long prided itself on a tradition of debate, a forum in which there was virtually unlimited discussion of the weighty matters of state. Surely, we have an obligation to open these debates to the people whose lives will be affected. There was a time when, through the visitors' galleries and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the Senate was able to reach that segment of the public truly interested in national affairs. Today, a much broader segment is interested and cannot journey to Washington or trek to a library to read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. By allowing for television and radio coverage, we rip away the artificial barriers which prevent too many citizens from looking over our shoulders.

I believe, Mr. President, that we have an obligation to agree to this resolution and that we have an obligation to insure that the American people have ample opportunity to watch the inner workings of the greatest democratic nation on Earth.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE AUTHORIZATIONS, 1982

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, is it in order at this time to proceed to the consideration of S. 951?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Under the previous order, the hour of 11 a.m. having arrived, the Senate will now resume consideration of S. 951, which the clerk will state by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 951) to authorize appropriations for the purpose of carrying out the activities of the Department of Justice for fiscal year 1982, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

AMENDMENT NO. 69, AS AMENDED

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is amendment No. 69, as amended, by the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS), on which there shall be 90 minutes, with 30 minutes each to the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON), and the Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN).

The text of the amendment, as amended, follows:

At the end of the material proposed by the committee to be stricken out in its first amendment to the bill on page 2, line 14, add the following:

"minus $37,653,000;

"(C) financial assistance to joint State and local law enforcement agencies engaged in cooperative enforcement efforts with respect to drug-related offenses, organized criminal activity and all related support activities, not to exceed $12,576,000, and to remain available until expended: $50,229,100;

"(D) no part of any sum authorized to be appropriated by this Act shall be used by the Department of Justice to bring or maintain any sort of action to require directly or indirectly the transportation of any student to a school other than the school which is nearest the student's home, except for a student requiring special education as a result of being mentally or physically handicapped.".

"SEC. 2.5 (a) This section may be cited as the 'Neighborhood School Act of 1981'.

"(b) The Congress finds that—

"(1) court orders requiring transportation of students to or attendance at public schools other than the one closest to their residences for the purpose of achieving racial balance or racial desegregation have proven an ineffective remedy and have not achieved unitary public school systems and that such orders frequently result in the exodus from public school systems of children which causes even greater racial imbalance and diminished support for public school systems;

"(2) assignment and transportation of students to public schools other than the one closest to their residences is expensive and wasteful of scarce supplies of petroleum fuels;

"(3) the assignment of students to public schools or busing of students to achieve recial balance or to attempt to eliminate predominantly one race schools is without social or educational justification and has proven to be educationally unsound and to cause separation of students by race to a greater degree than would have otherwise occurred;

"(4) there is an absence of social science evidence to suggest that the costs of school busing outweigh the disruptiveness of busing; and

"(5) assignment of students to public schools closest to their residence (neighborhood public schools) is the preferred method of public school attendance and should be employed to the maximum extent consistent with the Constitution of the United States.

"(c) The Congress is hereby exercising its power under article III, section I, and under section 5 of the fourteenth amendment.

"Limitation Of Injunctive Relief

"(d) Section 1651 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding the following new subsection (c):

" '(c)(1) No court of the United States may order or issue any writ directly or indirectly ordering any student to be assigned or to be transported to a public school other than that which is closest to the student's residence unless—

" '(i) such assignment or transportation is provided incident to the voluntary attendance of a student at a public school, including a magnet, vocational, technical, or other school of specialized or individualized instruction; or

" '(ii) the requirement of such transportation is reasonable.

" '(2) The assignment or transportation of students shall not be reasonable if—

" '(i) there are reasonable alternatives available which involve less time in travel, distance, danger, or inconvenience;

" '(ii) such assignment or transportation requires a student to cross a school district having the same grade level as that of the student;

" '(iii) such transportation plan or order or part thereof is likely to result in a greater degree of racial imbalance in the public school system than was in existence on the date of the order for such assignment or transportation plan or is likely to have a net harmful effect on the quality of education in the public school district;

" '(iv) the total actual daily time consumed in travel by schoolbus for any student exceeds thirty minutes unless such transportation is to and from a public school closest to the student's residence with a grade level identical to that of the student; or

" '(v) the total actual round trip distance traveled by schoolbus for any student exceeds 10 miles unless the actual round trip distance traveled by schoolbus is to and from the public school closest to the student's residence with a grade level identical to that of the student.

"'Definition

"'(e) The school closest to the student's residence with a grade level identical to that of the student shall, for purpose of calculating the time and distance limitations of this act, be deemed to be that school containing the appropriate grade level which existed immediately prior to any court order or writ resulting in the reassignment by whatever means, direct or indirect including rezoning, reassignment, pairing, clustering, school closings, magnet schools or other methods of school assignment and whether or not such court order or writ predated the effective date of this legislation.

"'Suits by the Attorney General

"'(f) Section 407(a) of title IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (Public Law 88-352, section 407(a); 78 Stat. 241, section 407(a); 42 U.S.C. 2000c-6(a)), is amended by inserting after the last sentence the following new subparagraph:

"'Whenever the Attorney General receives a complaint in writing signed by an individual, or his parent, to the effect that he has been required directly or indirectly to attend or to be transported to a public school in violation of the Neighborhood School Act and the Attorney General believes that the complaint is meritorious and certifies that the signers of such complaint are unable, in his judgment, to initiate and maintain appropriate legal proceedings for relief, the Attorney General is authorized to institute for or in the name of the United States a civil action in any appropriate district court of the United States against such parties and for such relief as may be appropriate, and such court shall have and shall exercise jurisdiction of proceedings instituted pursuant to this section. The Attorney General may implead as defendants such additional parties as are or become necessary to the grant of effective relief hereunder.'

"(g) For the purpose of this Act, 'transportation to a public school in violation of the Neighborhood School Act' shall be deemed to have occurred whether or not the order requiring directly or indirectly such transportation or assignment was entered prior to or subsequent to the effective date of this Act.

"(h) If any provision of this Act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the Act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

"(i) It is the sense of the Senate that the Senate Committee on the Judiciary report out, before the August recess of the Senate, legislation to establish permanent limitations upon the ability of the Federal courts to issue orders or writs directly or indirectly requiring the transportation of public school students.".

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, who controls the time on each side under the order?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The three Senators: Mr. WEICKER, Mr. JOHNSTON, and Mr. LEVIN.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, none of those Senators is present. I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask unanimous consent that the time for the quorum call be charged proportionately to each Senator allocated time under the order.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANDREWS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so I may send a cloture motion on S. 951 to the desk?

Mr. LEVIN. I am happy to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture motion having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair directs the clerk to read the motion.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the standing rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on S. 951, the Department of Justice authorization bill.

J. Bennett Johnston, David L. Boren, Russell Long, Jennings Randolph, J. James Exon, Steven Symms, Don Nickles, Edward Zorinsky, Walter D. Huddleston, James Abdnor, John C. Stennis, Lloyd Bentsen, Chuck Grassley, William Proxmire, Mack Mattingly, and Roger W. Jepsen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the pending amendment even though I share with my friend from Louisiana the general dislike of busing children away from their neighborhood schools. As a matter of fact, I would concur in and fully support the provision of the amendment—at least one provision of the amendment—which indicates that busing is not the preferred method and should not be used unless constitutionally required. I am deeply troubled by this amendment, however, and its implications in terms of Federal court jurisdiction.

I am also deeply troubled by the fact that it sets out to make findings of fact which I do not believe we can rationally make as a Senate. I might say first, however, that as a local elected official in Detroit when busing was ordered, I saw that negative consequences can sometimes result when children are ordered to attend schools outside of their neighborhood. Busing is no longer viewed by the courts, and rightly so, as the preferred method of righting the evils of segregation. Busing orders can no longer be entered to correct de facto as opposed to de jure segregation, and courts have shown an increased willingness to find alternatives to busing where possible, even in the case of de jure segregation. In Detroit, for example, after years of busing, the court and the community are actively exploring alternatives.

As I indicated, I concur with subsection 5 of this amendment, which says that the assignment of students to public schools closest to their residence, neighborhood public schools, is the preferred method of public school attendance and should be employed to the maximum extent consistent with the Constitution of the United States.

Despite my feelings about busing and its limitations and its failure in many instances, I am, nonetheless, troubled by an amendment which would remove from the Federal courts the power to enforce the Constitution. It is a pernicious approach to a difficult problem and I hope that the U.S. Senate will avoid it.

Mr. President, I am wondering if my friend from Louisiana might help me understand what some of these findings of fact purport to find. For instance, in section 2.5(b) of the Senator's amendment, he would have Congress find that court orders requiring busing of students have proven an ineffective remedy and have not achieved unitary public school systems.

My question is whether or not it is the meaning of this amendment and this proposed finding that court-ordered busing has in every case proven to be an ineffective remedy.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I say to my friend that the finding of fact does not say so in every case but in the overwhelming number of cases. If I may, for example, quote from David J. Armour's article, "Unwilling to School." That is a 1981 article in the fall issue of Foreign Policy Review.

Mr. Armour, by the way, is the one who conducted that extensive Rand Study. He says this:

> At this point, however, there is overwhelming social science evidence that mandatory busing has failed as a feasible remedy for school segregation. It has done so, first, because public opposition and white flight have been so extensive as to increase, rather than to decrease, racial isolation in many cities.

He goes on at some length. But the point is, to use his words—and these are the words of the social scientists—that there is overwhelming social science evidence that it has failed as a feasible remedy and has increased racial isolation. He does not say in every single case. There are probably some cases in which it has worked well, I suppose, but we know that it has failed across America.

Mr. LEVIN. Do I correctly understand, then, my friend's answer to mean that the amendment does not purport to say that in all cases the court-ordered busing has proven to be an ineffective remedy?

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, the amendment does not so state.

Mr. LEVIN. That is helpful.

I am wondering, also, if this David J. Armour, whom the Senator quotes, is the same David J. Armour who testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee on May 14 of 1981 that "I do not mean to imply that social scientists are in agreement about the lack of educational and social benefits from desegregation"?

Mr. JOHNSTON. There is no question that there is not unanimity of opinion. So distinguished an intellect as the Senator from Pennsylvania disagrees with me on this particular remedy. So, of course, there is not a unanimity of opinion. I simply say that there is an overwhelming weight and quality of that opinion against busing.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Senator.

Will the Senator then be able to clarify another aspect of the findings in the amendment? Section 4 of the findings states that there is an absence of social science evidence to suggest that the cost of school busing outweighs the disruptiveness of busing.

I am not sure I understand what that means. It seems to have a double negative in it. I think it means that the values of busing outweigh the disruptiveness of busing; and, to be a little fuller on that, I think what the Senator is trying to say is that there is an absence of evidence which suggests that the values of school busing outweigh the disruptiveness of school busing. Assuming that that is the Senator's meaning—although those are not the words; in fact, the words are quite different—will the Senator, then, be willing to agree, along with what he just said and along with what David Armour has said, that there are social scientists who do believe that the value of school busing to the schools and to education outweighs the disruptiveness of busing?

Mr. JOHNSTON. First of all, let me say that I hit upon a double negative which was unintended. I hope what we meant to say comes through more clearly than the words portray. But in any event, what we meant to say was that there is no evidence to support the proposition that school busing is worth the cost in disruptiveness.

For example, again to quote Armour from the same 1981 article, and I use him because he is the latest thing in print:

> Desegregation has not produced the educational and social benefits that were promised. Not only does it fail to truly desegregate, it also fails to remedy the presumed effects of segregation.

So I say this: Initially, at the time busing was first discovered by the Supreme Court as a remedy—I suppose that was in the Swann case back in 1968, Swann or Green or that group of cases back in the late 1960's—it was perceived by most social scientists that busing would work.

Indeed, James J. Coleman, the distinguished Harvard professor, had a rather extensive study on the effects of past segregation and suggested that busing was the only feasible remedy. It was upon his very findings that the Court based much of its opinion in the Green case and the Swann case and the other cases.

Mr. LEVIN. I am familiar with that background. My question is slightly different, though. Perhaps it was not very clear.

The amendment would have us find that there is an absence of social science evidence to suggest the conclusion that the amendment states.

My question to the Senator is this: Are not social scientists in disagreement on that conclusion; and, therefore, would the Senator agree that there is some evidence that he believes is outweighed by other evidence?

Mr. JOHNSTON. There is certainly opinion. I guess I used "evidence" in the sense of credible evidence. I think it would be better stated that there is no credible evidence. Clearly, the Senator's point is correct. There is opinion to the contrary, although a diminishing amount of opinion, and certainly in terms of its weight, in the social science community. In my opinion, the weight in the social science community—not just in my mind but in the social science community—is greatly on the side of those who state that busing has failed.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Senator for that clarification. I have another inquiry.

In section 2.5(b) of the amendment, the Senator would have Congress find that court orders requiring busing of students have not achieved unitary public school systems. Is it the Senator's intent to say that the court-ordered busing has never achieved unitary public school systems?

Mr. JOHNSTON. No. I think we meant to say just what we said. I am not aware of a school system in the country, certainly not a large one, where it has achieved a unitary school system. I am not aware of even one, particularly not a large one. It may have happened. If it does, we do not intend to preclude it. We do not purport to say "never." We say "not." I think "not" is the correct way to say it. It has not achieved unitary school systems.

Mr. LEVIN. Will the Senator agree that there are instances where it has achieved unitary school systems?

Mr. JOHNSTON. If the Senator will tell me that there are such instances, I am sure he is correct. I am not aware of those.

Mr. LEVIN. I just wondered whether or not we had been given any materials which indicate approximately how many districts have court-ordered busing.

Does the Senator know whether or not there have been any printed materials provided by the committees looking into this telling us the number of school districts which have court-ordered busing?

Mr. JOHNSTON. There are, of course, many studies on it. There is the James J. Coleman study.

Mr. LEVIN. I mean any current studies telling us how many districts currently have court-ordered busing. Do we have any information before us? Does the Senator know of any?

Mr. JOHNSTON. We have put into the RECORD both in the Judiciary Committee and here in the Chamber the various studies. Obviously it is a moving target because more systems are brought in and in the question of what is a busing order we have to define what that is because when districts are redrawn they do not order schoolchildren bused. They order that the districts be redrawn and then they leave it to the school system to do the busing.

Mr. LEVIN. Can the Senator give any idea, approximately, as to the number of districts in which court-ordered busing is now ineffective?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I cannot tell the Senator. I am sure that it is information that is available in the RECORD. I do not recall.

Mr. LEVIN. The Judiciary Committee has not even printed a report, as I understand it. Is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSTON. To my knowledge the committee has not printed a report.

Mr. LEVIN. We have taken the time to go look at those records and there was not a printed report available to the Senate. We are being asked to vote on findings of fact of a critical nature based on reports we have not even printed. We have gone and looked at those transcripts and cannot find that figure. Yet we are being asked to vote on findings which are based on certain information which is not even available. It is the very basic question about how many school districts presently have court-ordered busing and in how many would the Senator estimate it is ineffective? If there are 800 districts which have court-ordered busing, would someone estimate for us, if not the Senator from Louisiana—I do not want to put him on the spot because he cannot have all the figures on the top of his head—but would some one estimate for us in how many of those 800 districts which have court-ordered busing it is a failure?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I suggest to the Senator that the appropriate question is not how many school districts are subject to court-ordered busing but the proper question is how many school districts where it has been ordered has it been successful and how many has it been unsuccessful.

Mr. LEVIN. I agree with that.

Mr. JOHNSTON. And let me say that these rather long studies have been put in the RECORD and have been printed in the RECORD. I do not know whether the Senator has had a chance to read the James J. Coleman report. It is 78 pages long. It is entitled "Trends in School Segregation." That goes into rather painful detail with more mathematical formula than I can understand, and it takes each school district and it finds what happened before and after and where the children went and where they would have gone but for the court order and the demography of it and the trends, and all of those things. As I say it is in rather painful detail. It is interesting to those who are really interested in the social science of it. I think somewhere tucked in all that mass of figures is the judgment of how many school districts have been ordered to bus. If I tell the Senator that there are 9,000 school districts that have been ordered to bus, that does not really tell him anything. The important thing is how it has worked, and I think there is ample evidence printed in the RECORD and made available to Senators.

If I may just say one additional thing, and I do not mean to speak too long in answering these questions, but this is very critically important. Each Congress for the last three or four Congresses, at least, has considered this question in depth and has printed records. I have in my office stacks of printed records, bound records where people testify and figures have been promulgated. It is not a new question. I mean we did not wake up this morning to the world and finally find that busing has not worked. That has been going on for a long time, for a decade, and during that time Congress has considered and reconsidered and simply has not gotten this far in the process yet.

Mr. LEVIN. This is important. This morning we are being asked to make findings of fact.

I think the statement of the Senator from Louisiana that the statement that court-ordered busing has proven to be an ineffective remedy does not mean in every single case. It is an important statement. The Senator acknowledged that in some cases it may be an effective remedy. As a matter of fact, in Jefferson County, according to the information we have, it has been described as a good plan which is working out well. Since 1975 in Hillsboro County, Fla., it has been described as a plan which has drawn citizen support and only minor difficulties according to a Time magazine article and other articles.

I do think it is useful that the Senator has acknowledged that there are or may be instances where court-ordered busing has proven to be an effective remedy.

I take it that the Senator is not willing to offer a percentage as to what percentage of the cases where it has been ordered where it has worked out OK or perhaps the Senator is. If we can get figures as to in how many cases it has been ordered, would the Senator be willing to guess as to what percentage has been ineffective?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I would not want to put a percentage on it. I think Armor is right where it is stated there is "overwhelming social science evidence that mandatory busing has failed as a feasible remedy." So I think the evidence is overwhelming.

No. 2, this amendment does not prohibit all busing. It severely limits it.

No. 3, let me just ask the Senator from Michigan. As he began his statement he said that he happens to agree with me that busing does not work; he does not like the remedy.

Mr. LEVIN. That is not quite what I said. I said busing frequently has not worked.

Mr. JOHNSTON. In the opinion of the Senator from Michigan why has it not worked in those cases where he thinks it has failed?

Mr. LEVIN. I am only familiar with my own situation in Detroit where it has not worked because the school district was about 75 percent black to begin with and it increased the outflow of citizens predominantly white but not exclusively white who were willing to become citizens in the suburbs.

I opposed busing in Detroit. By the way, I opposed it along with our mayor, may I say, Mayor Young. In Detroit we had a case of de jure segregation.

So I am not someone who believes that busing is always the answer, but I am someone who believes in the Constitution, and I do not believe in removing from the Federal court in every case that fits the Senator's description of distance and time the right to order busing to remedy a constitutional violation because busing makes no sense in some cases. I am not willing to take that risk with the Constitution because we set a precedent. If we say the Federal court cannot enforce the Constitution in the earlier busing, tomorrow we will say that it cannot enforce the Constitution in the area of free speech or some other area.

So my difference with the Senator from Louisiana is not so much that I think we should avoid busing except where it is constitutionally permitted as subsection 5 of the Senator's amendment says, a subsection I agree with. Where I disagree with the Senator is that the Senator would have us vote today on findings of fact which sound all inclusive—I am glad they are not—but if they are not all inclusive and if there could be cases and are cases where busing is an effective remedy why then would we foreclose it in all cases as this amendment would do? I do not think that the amendment's logic is consistent with the explanation in the Chamber that there may, indeed, be areas and cases where it has proven to be an effective remedy.

I am not familiar personally with Hillsboro County, Fla., or with Jefferson County, Ky., or with Clark County, Nev., or with Racine, Wis., or with dozens of other districts where apparently this is working.

I do not know, I do not have firsthand knowledge, but we are being asked to find that it is not working in those cases and that retroactively we ought to undo busing orders in communities which have now settled in with those orders. I think such an amendment can be extremely disruptive. I understand its purpose and, frankly, I would like to see busing limited to situations where it clearly is going to have a positive effect and where there is no alternative. But I am not willing to do that by removing Federal court jurisdiction in all cases if it fits your distance and time standards because I think it is a pernicious precedent and that the Federal courts are going to be hobbled by this kind of approach in enforcing the Constitution.

Much as I dislike busing in many instances, I like the Constitution even more, but I do thank my friend from Louisiana. I do think the amendment has been clarified. I do not think it is logical any more because again it prohibits busing in all cases that fit the standards, even though I believe it is clear from this colloquy that busing has not been ineffective in every case or that busing has never produced a unitary school system.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEVIN. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I, like my friend from Michigan, strongly agree with passionately believe in, the Constitution. But I happen to believe in all of the Constitution, including section 5 of the 14th amendment which gives to Congress the right to implement the amendment by appropriate legislation.

The Senator also recognizes that section 5 is a part of that Constitution just as surely, indeed more surely, than some newly discovered decisions of the Supreme Court, which did not even exist prior to the late 1960's and, indeed, which decisions do not explicitly require busing.

Mr. LEVIN. I would agree. I want to ask my friend this question: Would you suggest we could eliminate from the Federal court the power to use the remedy of injunction to enforce the first amendment, leaving to the persons who are injured a damage remedy? Would you call that enforcing an amendment?

Mr. JOHNSTON. You can clearly not do that under section 5 of the 14th amendment because that does not relate to 14th amendment rights.

Mr. LEVIN. I would apply it to rights that are enforced against the States through the 14th amendment.

Is my friend suggesting that we could eliminate for all those rights which apply to the States through the 14th amendment the injunctive remedy, leaving to claimants the right to damages? Is that the position you would take?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I would say that the Supreme Court of the United States in the litigation over the Norris-LaGuardia Act, which took away the right to get injunctions in labor disputes of an act passed by Congress, was upheld by the Supreme Court under article III of the Constitution. That is not under section 5.

Mr. LEVIN. That was different from a constitutional violation or a constitutional amendment or right which was enforced against the States under the 14th amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON. In Ex parte McCardle, an old case in 1868, they took away the right of habeas corpus which is about as basic a constitutional right as you can get.

I am not suggesting that the power of Congress is or should be unlimited under section 5 of the 14th amendment or, indeed, under article III relating to jurisdiction. In all of the instances which the Senator has stated, I believed it would be unwise, even if legal, for Congress to exercise that power. I simply want to get the record clear that we are in a rather unclear or at least in a complicated area when you are talking about what is the power of Congress under the 14th amendment and section 5.

Mr. LEVIN. I would agree. Despite all that, the approach of the pending amendment is flawed both logically and legally.

First, as to the logical weaknesses of the amendment. It rests upon several findings of fact which are, in reality, little more than expressions of opinion. The debate on this amendment has not centered on the findings of fact which are broad and sweeping conclusions regarding the effects of school busing. These findings purport to demonstrate that busing is, in all cases, a failure. The universal failure of busing is critical to the internal logic of the Johnston amendment because the universality of busing's failure is the only justification for a universal ban beyond certain limits.

Senator JOHNSTON himself believes that if the Congress approves his amendment, it will have given its sanction to these facts and, in turn, the courts will have to give deference to them as well. He relies chiefly upon the opinion of Justices Brennan, White, and Marshall in Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112 (1970), which states:

> The nature of the judicial process makes it an inappropriate forum for determination of complex factual questions of the kind so often involved in constitutional adjudication. Courts, therefore, will overturn a legislative determination of a factual question only if the legislature's finding is so clearly wrong that it may be characterized as "arbitrary", "irrational," or "unreasonable".

While it is true that busing has sometimes been unsuccessful and has sometimes produced the kind of negative results identified in the findings contained in the Johnston amendment, it is impossible to rationally determine the reasonableness of the sweeping conclusions in this amendment on the record which has been established during only 1 day of hearings on S. 528, the bill introduced by Senator JOHNSTON which is the predecessor of this amendment. The hearing record and the Senate debate on this amendment have failed to produce any record upon which the Senate could find that—

> (1) court orders requiring transportation of students to or attendance at public schools other than the one closest to their residences for the purpose of achieving racial balance or racial desegregation have proven an ineffective remedy and have not achieved unitary public school systems and that such orders frequently result in the exodus from public school systems of children which causes even greater imbalance and diminished support for public school systems; or that
> (3) the assignment of students to public schools or busing of students to achieve racial balance or to attempt to eliminate predominately one race schools is without social or educational justification and has proven to be educationally unsound and to cause separation of students to a greater degree than would have otherwise occurred.

At best, it seems to me that our experience with busing is sufficient to conclude that there are problems with its application in a number of situations. As a result, I agree that busing should be imposed only where constitutionally required and in the absence of a better alternative. But Senator JOHNSTON'S amendment goes way beyond that by prohibiting any busing beyond 5 miles from a student's home in all circumstances.

Senator JOHNSTON relies upon studies on the effects of schoolbusing which have been conducted by David J. Armor, a senior social scientist at the Rand Corp., and James S. Coleman, a professor of sociology at the University of Chicago and the well-known author of the 1965 Coleman report.

David J. Armor testified before the Senate Subcommittee on the Constitution of the Senate Judiciary Committee on May 14, 1981. He told the subcommittee that "mandatory busing has failed as a reasonable remedy for school segregation," but he emphasized that there is still disagreement among social scientists as to the effects of school busing. He stated:

> I do not mean to imply that social scientists are in agreement about the lack of educational and social benefits from desegregation, the possible harmful effects of desegregation on race relations, or the causes of housing segregation. These issues are controversial and are still being debated.

Furthermore, Armor's specific recommendations to the subcommittee differ dramatically from the approach taken in the Johnston amendment. He recommended: First, that the Congress commission studies to consolidate evidence showing the feasibility of various types of remedies for school segregation; second, that any new legislation should represent an affirmative step to acknowledge the existence of constitutional violations and to address the need for feasible remedies, rather than legislation that simply opposes mandatory busing; and third, that the courts should be required to use remedies approved by the Congress.

Senator JOHNSTON also relies on a study conducted by James S. Coleman entitled, "Trends in School Segregation, 1968-1973." This highly controversial study identifying the phenomenon of "white flight" has been harshly criticized by a number of prominent social scientists. Dr. Coleman himself has conceded that the conclusions he reached in the paper go beyond the statistical data he gathered. I would like to insert in the RECORD at this point, a July 11, 1975, New York Times article which points to some of the deficiences of the Coleman study. The article states in part:

> Dr. Coleman's contentions were based on a purely statistical study of trends in the 20 largest central city school districts from 1968 to 1973. The crux of his argument is that integration in the first two years, 1968-1970, led directly to a substantial exodus of white families in the following three years, 1970-1973, over and above the normal movement to the suburbs.
> However, a thorough check of all 20 cities—in which key officials in each were questioned by telephone—could find no court-ordered busing, rezoning or other kind of coerced integration in any of the cities during 1969-1970 period. Court suits were pending in many, but desegregation was limited to a few modest open enrollment plans, used mostly by blacks. If there was "massive and rapid" desegregation, as Dr. Coleman said, it could not have been due to court-imposed remedies.

For every study purporting to demonstrate that busing has been unsuccessful, there are those which claim it is beneficial to students who have been the target of purposeful discrimination in the schools. How then can we be expected to find an absence of social science evidence?

The Congress has only once addressed the question of whether schoolbusing is effective, in a comprehensive and responsible fashion. In 1972, the Select Committee on Equal Educational Opportunity found that "our survey of the evidence that is available demonstrates a definitive positive relationship between racial socioeconomic integration and academic achievement of educationally disadvantaged children." It is unfortunate that the Congress has not chosen to update the findings of the select committee, because in a debate of such import there should be current and accurate information. Indeed, I question whether there should even be a vote on this amendment without first having updated the report of the select committee.

However, since we are debating the issue, we should at least weigh all the available evidence. There are, for example, studies which suggest that the white-flight phenomenon studied by David Armor and James Coleman is often attributable to a variety of sociological and economic conditions other than busing. In his appendix to testimony before the Senate Subcommittee on the Constitution regarding the effects of schoolbusing, William Taylor, Director for the Center for National Policy Review, stated:

> The claim that desegregation leads to white flight is limited to school desegregation that occurs in large cities with high proportions of minorities that are surrounded by virtually all white suburbs. White suburbanization preceded school desegregation by several decades. It stems from many causes, including record levels of suburban housing construction; the movement of urban jobs to suburban facilities; and discriminatory housing practices limiting minority access to suburban housing.

Senator JOHNSTON'S amendment is logically deficient as there is no proof before us that busing is a universal failure. Absent such proof, the absolute ban on busing beyond a certain distance, which the amendment proscribes, is not logical.

I am also deeply troubled by the approach of prohibiting the Federal courts from ordering busing where it is constitutionally required. As I read the Constitution, such an attempt to restrict the power of the courts to order a specific remedy is unconstitutional. Consequently, the amendment is also legally flawed.

The amendment purports to be rooted in part in section 5 of the 14th amendment which grants the Congress the "power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article." But the Supreme Court, in its limited examination of the meaning of the phrase "power to enforce," has indicated that the Congress was given a "positive grant" to adopt legislation which is "plainly adopted to the end" of enforcing equal protection and which is "consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution," Katzenbach v. Morgan, 384 U.S. 641 (1966).

In Katzenbach, the Supreme Court held that section 4(e) of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which invalidated a New York literacy requirement for voting as applied to Puerto Rican residents educated in American-flag schools, was appropriate legislation under section 5 of the 14th amendment. In a footnote to the majority's opinion in that case, the Court stated:

> Section 5 does not grant Congress the power to exercise discretion in the other direction and to enact statutes so as in effect to dilute the equal protection and due process decisions of this Court. We emphasize that Congress' power under Section 5 is limited to adopting measures to enforce the guarantees of the Amendment; Section 5 grants to Congress no power to restrict, abrogate, or dilute those guarantees. Thus, for example, an enactment authorizing States to establish racially segregated systems of education would not be—as required by Section 5—a measure "to enforce" the Equal Protection Clause since that clause of its own force prohibits such state law.

That this amendment attempts to restrict the equal protection guarantees insured by a long line of school desegregation cases is plain and apparent. The direct and rigid limit on the equitable power of the Federal courts it contains circumscribes a specific remedy which has been construed by the Supreme Court as being essential, in many cases, to the effective elimination of the remnants of State-sanctioned school segregation.

Senator JOHNSTON argues that this amendment restricts only one possible remedy for de jure school segregation and therefore cannot be said to tie the hands of the Federal courts in fashioning alternative remedies for denial of constitutional rights. But Chief Justice Burger wrote in North Carolina Board of Education v. Swann, 402 U.S. 42 (1971), that "bus transportation has long been an integral part of all public school systems, and it is unlikely that a remedy could be devised without continued reliance on it." On the basis of this premise, the Federal courts have found busing to be constitutionally required in some cases.

This amendment is inconsistent with section 5's requirement that the Congress adopt legislation which is designed, in a positive sense, to extend the rights guaranteed under the 14th amendment. The amendment attempts to restrict what the courts have deemed a sometimes necessary remedy. As a result, it is a violation of the limitations placed on the power of the Congress under section 5 of the 14th amendment, in my view.

A second legal problem, Mr. President, also springs from attempts made in this amendment to exercise the power granted to Congress in article III of the Constitution. If the pending amendment is adopted by the Congress, it will signal a new open hunting season on the Constitution. There are over 30 bills pending in the Congress which would limit the jurisdiction of the Federal courts over constitutional claims relating to school prayer, abortion, busing, and differentiations between men and women in the armed services. If we allow the Congress to curtail Federal court jurisdiction in any of these areas, we will set the stage for an extremely dangerous policy whereby anytime the Congress finds the Court protecting rights which we want to see abrogated, we would simply restrict their power in that particular area.

The effect of such a policy would be twofold. First, we would totally eliminate the Federal nature of our Government. As the Court indicated in Ableman v. Booth, 62 U.S. (21 Howard) 506 (1958), such actions would have the effect of nullifying the supremacy clause of article VI of the Constitution. The Court reasoned that where there is not a single supreme tribunal with the authority to interpret and pronounce the meaning of the Constitution and of Federal law, "the Constitution and the laws and treaties of the United States, and the powers granted to the Federal Government, would soon receive different interpretations in different States and the United States would soon become one thing in one State and one thing in another."

Equally damaging would be the erosion of the judicial branch as a check on the other branches of the Federal Government or the States. Today a majority of the Congress takes issue with Federal court's decisions regarding school segregation. Tomorrow the Congress might differ with the Court on its decisions upholding the Bill of Rights. The system of checks and balances which the Johnston amendment threatens is the cornerstone of our Government. Surely we do not want to erode it in this manner, regardless of our individual views on the effectiveness of busing.

Mr. President, Supreme Court decisions requiring social change are often unpopular. This is not the first time that attempts will have been made to restrict the power of the Federal courts which make these controversial decisions. Over the years, however, the Congress itself has recognized the danger of such attacks on the judiciary. For example, in 1957, Senator Jenner introduced a bill to eliminate the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction over State rules regarding the admission of applicants to the bar, State actions to control subversive activities, regulations by educational institutions regarding subversive activities by teachers, Federal executions of security programs, and congressional contempt actions against witnesses. The Senate Judiciary Committee struck the latter four limitations, added several nonjurisdictional amendments to the bill, and reported it to the Senate with the limitation regarding State bar admissions intact. The Senate voted to table the bill, rather than limit the Court's jurisdiction.

In 1964, Senator THURMOND offered an amendment in response to the Supreme Court's Reynolds against Sims decision, which required reapportionment of each House of the State legislatures solely on the basis of population. The amendment would have eliminated both the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction and the lower Federal court's original jurisdiction over cases involving questions of reapportionment of State legislatures. The amendment was rejected 21 to 56.

In the 1930's this Nation properly rejected attempts by President Roosevelt to pack the Supreme Court in an effort to implement a mechanism which would give him control over it. As much as many believed in the products he wanted, the process was highly objectionable. To dismantle the integrity of the Court would have been to dismantle the very basis of our system of checks and balances and to jeopardize enforcement of the guarantees of the Constitution. This amendment is the modern version of Court packing.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter addressed to Senator BAKER from the president of the American Bar Association, Mr. Robert Hoffman, be printed in the RECORD. Part of that letter states:

The issue is not busing. The issue is whether as a matter of policy and of Constitutional permissibility, this nation is going to adopt a device whereby each time a decision of the Supreme Court or a lower Federal court offends a majority of both Houses of Congress the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to hear that issue will be stripped away. We do not believe that is a system the framers intended or one that we should strive to institute.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEAR SENATOR BAKER: I am writing to urge our opposition to the Johnston-Helms amendment to the Justice Department authorization bill. This amendment would drastically restrict the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to issue remedies in school desegregation cases, even when such remedies are the only available means of vindicating Constitutional rights against a deliberate and intentional violation of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The American Bar Association opposes this amendment because of one overriding conviction: the necessity to protect the integrity of the courts of this nation from misdirected legislative efforts to achieve something that can be done only through Constitutional amendment. The issue is not busing. The issue is whether as a matter of policy and of Constitutional permissibility, this nation is going to adopt a device whereby each time a decision of the Supreme Court or a lower Federal court offends a majority of both Houses of Congress the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to hear that issue will be stripped away. We do not believe that is a system the framers intended or one that we should strive to institute.

The American Bar Association has long opposed efforts from whatever spectrum of the political scene, to alter constitutional interpretation through means other than constitutional amendment. We stood in opposition to the "Court-packing" plan of the late 1930's, which would have altered prevailing law by stacking the Court's membership. More than thirty years ago we called for the adoption of assurance that jurisdictional manipulation would not and could not be used to work substantive changes in the Constitution. In 1958, the Association opposed bills pending in Congress that would have denied the Supreme Court review of decisions involving alleged subversives in various fields. That policy is Association policy today.

Because the policy considerations are so substantial and because the constitutional propriety of these bills is open to such serious reservations, we urge the Senate to oppose the curtailment of the jurisdiction of the Federal courts for the purpose of effecting constitutional change that is properly the province only of the amending process. Irrespective of the subject involved and regardless of our individual beliefs with respect to any of them, the overriding consideration is that we support the integrity and independence of Federal courts, whether we agree with particular decisions or not, and that we support the integrity and inviolability of the amending process.

In view of the above, I urge you and your colleagues to reject the Johnston-Helms Amendment.

Sincerely,

HERBERT E. HOFFMAN.

Mr. LEVIN. I also ask unanimous consent that the resolution of the 50 State supreme court chief justices, who make up the Conference of Chief Justices, be printed in the RECORD. Part of that resolution reads:

the Conference of Chief Justices, without regard to the merits of constitutional issues involved, expresses its concern about the impact of these bills on state courts and views them as a hazardous experiment with the vulnerable fabric of the Nation's judicial systems,

The bills being referred to are the approximately 20 bills pending.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION I—RESOLUTION RELATING TO PROPOSED LEGISLATION TO RESTRICT THE JURISDICTION OF THE FEDERAL COURTS

Whereas, there are presently pending in the United States Congress approximately twenty bills that would strip the federal courts, including the United States Supreme Court, of substantive jurisdiction in certain areas involving prayer in public schools and buildings, abortion, school desegregation and busing, and sex discrimination in the armed services; and

Whereas, the Conference of Chief Justices, without regard to the merits of constitutional issues involved, expresses its concern about the impact of these bills on state courts and views them as a hazardous experiment with the vulnerable fabric of the nation's judicial systems, arriving at this position for the following reasons, among others:

A. These proposed statutes give the appearance of proceeding from the premise that state court judges will not honor their oath to obey the United States Constitution, nor their obligations to give full force to controlling Supreme Court precedents;

B. If those proposed statutes are enacted, the current holdings of those Supreme Court decisions targeted by this legislation will remain the unchangeable law of the land, absent constitutional amendments, beyond the reach of the United States Supreme Court or state supreme courts to alter or overrule;

C. State court litigation constantly presents new situations testing the boundaries of federal constitutional rights. Without the unifying function of United States Supreme Court review, there inevitably will be divergence in state court decisions, and thus the United States Constitution could mean something different in each of the fifty states;

D. Confusion will exist as to whether and how federal acts will be enforced in state courts and, if enforced, how states may properly act against federal officers;

E. The proposed statutes would render uncertain how the state courts could declare a federal law violative of the federal Constitution and whether Congress would need to wait for a majority of the state courts to so rule before conceding an act was unconstitutional;

F. The added burden of litigation engendered by the proposed acts would seriously add to the already heavy caseload in state courts: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Conference of Chief Justices expresses its serious concerns relating to the above legislation, approves the report of the Conference's Subcommittee of the Committee on State-Federal Relations, and directs its officers to transmit that report, together with this resolution, to appropriate members of Congress.

Adopted at the Midyear Meeting in Williamsburg, Virginia on January 30, 1982.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Chair. I ask the Senator from Connecticut if he will yield 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield 1 minute?

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank my friend.

The bills being referred to in that resolution from the conference of the chief justices are 20 bills which would strip the Federal courts, including the U.S. Supreme Court, of substantive jurisdiction in certain areas involving prayer in the public schools, abortion, school desegregation, busing, and sex discrimination in the armed services.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a Harris poll recently issued, indicating that the majority of the parents whose children are bused so far as desegregation orders, both white and black, find such orders are working satisfactorily, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the survey was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAJORITY OF PARENTS REPORT SCHOOL BUSING HAS BEEN SATISFACTORY EXPERIENCE

(By Louis Harris)

Among the 19 percent of American families whose children have been bused to school as part of the effort to achieve racial balance, 54 percent of the parents say the experience has been very satisfactory, 33 percent say it has been partly satisfactory, and only 11 percent feel it has not been satisfactory. These latest findings are diametrically opposed to the general impression that such busing has been a disaster where it has been tried.

Among the 17 percent of white families who have experienced busing, 48 percent report that it has been very satisfactory, 37 percent partly satisfactory, and only 13 percent unsatisfactory. Among the 40 percent of black families, 74 percent feel that busing has been very satisfactory, 21 percent partly so, and only 5 percent report it has not worked well.

Among the public as a whole, there are signs that the longstanding opposition to busing as a means of remedying segregation in the schools is beginning to diminish:

A 53 percent majority of Americans, blacks and whites, believe that black children would do better "if they all went to school with white children." Only 16 percent feel that black children would do worse, while 18 percent think they would do about the same. Among whites, 51 percent think that black children would do better, 18 percent worse, and 19 percent the same. Among blacks, 67 percent feel their offspring would do better under integrated conditions.

75-22 percent, Americans simply do not believe the claim that "if black children all went to school with white children, the education of white children would suffer, because black children would hold back the white children." Among whites, a 72-24 percent majority discounts this; among blacks a nearly unanimous 92-4 percent disagrees that black children would hold back white children.

Nationwide, 52 percent think that "five years from now, most black and white children will be going to school together." There is a sense that increasing integration is inevitable. Another 27 percent feel that "some but not a lot" of black and white students will be attending schools together, while 16 percent feel "only a few" will be going to school together. There is little difference in how blacks and whites estimate the future of integration. Among whites, 52 percent foresee that most white and black children will attend the same schools, 28 percent think it will be "some but not a lot," while 15 percent say only a few. Among blacks, 53 percent estimate that most children will be attending fully integrated schools five years from now, 24 percent "some but not a lot," and 19 percent "only a few."

These results from the latest Harris Survey of 1,254 adults nationwide suggest that school busing for racial purposes has worked well in most cases and that it will result in increased school integration. There is also a rather deep sense that blacks get a better education when they attend integrated schools and that white children will not be held back educationally if they go to school with blacks.

Yet, when asked whether they would like to see their own children "picked up in buses every day so they could go to another part of town to go to school with children of all races," a 74-21 percent majority of Americans feels such busing would be "too hard on the children." Whites and blacks sharply disagree on this question: by 79-16 percent, whites feel that busing is too hard, while blacks favor it by 61-31 percent.

It seems that the idea of busing to achieve racial balance is unpopular. And yet, those whose children have experienced busing report that it was a satisfactory process that worked out well in the end.

TABLES

Between February 19th and 22nd, the Harris Survey asked a cross section of 1,254 adults nationwide by telephone:

"Do you feel that black children would do better or worse if they all went to school with white children today?"

Mr. LEVIN. I very much thank my friend from Louisiana for his patience both with my questions and with my voice.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LEVIN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON. When his time runs out then on my time.

Will the Senator yield? First of all, I would observe that the letter from the American Bar Association really had reference to article III jurisdictional cases or legislation and not to section 5 of the 14th amendment cases.

Second, I would observe that the Harris poll is not inconsistent with polls which over a period of a decade have by margins of at least 3 to 1 of the American public soundly disapproved of busing; am I correct on those two points?

Mr. LEVIN. I must admit that I was surprised by the size of the results of the Harris poll myself. I do not know what other polls show. I think it would show that busing is unpopular with most Americans. But the point is it does not always fail, and sometimes it does work. This amendment is retroactive, and we would have, unduly have, instances under this amendment where it has worked as well as those cases where it has not, and I think that is a much broader sweep than the Congress should be engaged in.

I also, in terms of the first question. believe that the amendment is offered to the Congress not just under section 5 but also under article III. I believe both are cited in the amendment that is before us.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator is correct.

Let me ask one final question: The Senator stated he opposed busing in Detroit, even went to court to oppose it. The circumstances cited were a black-white ratio of 75 to 25, and the Senator feared that there would be white flight if the order was entered. I believe the order was entered, and I believe that white flight did occur. I believe the Senator would now be convinced that he would be vindicated in his judgment that the order was improvidently entered and should not have been entered; am I correct on that?

Mr. LEVIN. The Senator's statement is generally correct.

Let me say that I opposed the order being entered. I opposed the order being entered because I believed in that instance it would not achieve the goal of limiting segregation but would promote resegregation. That is why I opposed the order.

But there are other orders by other Federal courts where busing is used which will not have the effect of promoting segregation. This amendment touches those orders as well.

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is in somebody else's State.

Mr. LEVIN. Also in my State, may I say. We have busing orders in Michigan, so I am not just talking about other States. What I am talking about are other situations about which I have read where the orders have been effective, where the communities feel they have benefited, and where the orders would be undone.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I understand the Senator's point on that. But my question now is, Did not the court in that case obviously feel that it was bound by Supreme Court decisions to enter that order that the Senator thinks was improvidently entered?

Mr. LEVIN. I think the court wrongfully felt that and was corrected by the court of appeals, as I remember it. I hope my memory is correct on it. The order of the lower court was returned to the lower court by the court of appeals for further consideration in light of Supreme Court opinions, I believe. I hope my memory is correct. I should know that by heart. I may be wrong, but I think that is what happened.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I ask the Senator, finally, what would be his remedy? What should we do if courts do enter these orders? And let me tell you that all across Alabama they enter these orders. In Baton Rouge, this morning 6-year-old children are being bused 1½ hours in one direction. That is improvident. I would go so far as to say that is virtually idiotic. Any policy of any country that requires that ought to be reversed. How would the Senator reverse that kind of nonsense?

Mr. LEVIN. I would adopt the Senator's subsection 5, which says that the assignment of students to public schools closest to their residence, neighborhood public schools, is the preferred method of public school attendance and should be employed to the maximum extent, consistent with the Constitution of the United States.

I buy that wholeheartedly, either that or I would amend the Constitution, but I would not try to amend the Constitution by legislation because that is not the proper way to do it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator does feel that there is a place and a power of the Congress under section 5 relating to busing. The Senator's disagreement is as to the reach of this bill. It overreaches what the Senator thinks is "appropriate legislation" as that term is used in section 5 of the 14th amendment?

Mr. LEVIN. I think we can enforce section 5 through legislation. I do not think we can hobble it, reduce it, diminish it, and I think that is clearly the effect when you remove one extension for enforcing. There is no way I could see logically that removing the injunction sanction is a way of enforcing the Constitution. That, to me, violates all logic and I believe also violates the Supreme Court decision in the Katzenbach against Morgan case.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank my friend. I also thank my friend from Connecticut for yielding me additional time. I hope that this latter colloquy comes off the time of the Senator from Louisiana: I expect that it does.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana reserves the remainder of his time.

The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, first, I compliment the distinguished Senator from Michigan for bringing into question that section of the amendment which sets forth congressional findings of fact which indeed are neither findings nor facts. Nobody that I know of in the U.S. Senate has done the necessary investigative work to arrive at any conclusions, much less these conclusions. And of course when it comes to those school districts that, again, by virtue of their history, in fact, defy the conclusions therein, there are many across the United States where the remedies of the court have succeeded.

In any event, I choose to debate this matter on another aspect and only want to compliment the work done and the comments made by the distinguished Senator from Michigan as to the section of the bill that relates to findings of fact.

Now, Mr. President, this issue commenced on June 16, 1981. And I would expect that this exercise in unconstitutionality by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana and the distinguished Senator from North Carolina will end up in their favor before the afternoon is up. But I think anybody makes a serious mistake if they look upon it as any more than one more stop along the way to the eventual disposition of the bill.

I remember on June 16, it was reported in the media that this matter would be resolved in a matter of 24 to 48 hours. It is now February 4, 1982, and the matter has not been resolved and the matter will not be resolved either today or this week or this month, and it should not be.

I am surprised, during this conservative era, at the concern exhibited on behalf of lawbreakers by Members on the floor of this Chamber. And that is what we are talking about—lawbreakers. This remedy does not even come into play unless somebody has been found guilty of breaking the laws of the United States of America; in this particular instance, found guilty of discrimination.

Now, maybe that does not have the flair to it that murder does or rape does or bank robbery does, but we are still talking about breaking the law.

This is supposed to be the law-and-order Congress, the law-and-order administration, and yet all this time is being spent on an overweening concern for lawbreakers.

We are told of the importance to this Congress of the social issues—the social issues defined as busing, the social issues defined as abortion, the social issues defined as prayers in school. I would suggest to my colleagues that a true definition of the social issues to the rest of the country, if not to the Members of this Chamber, are unemployment—that is a social issue; interest rates—that is a social issue; bankruptcy of small businesses—that is a social issue. These are the social issues that are impacting on the lives of millions of Americans and in a devastating way. And yet what is this Congress up to? Spending its time trying to unearth the bitternesses of decades past, to exhume the corpse and to revel in it. There is not one Member on this floor—with the possible exception of the two principal sponsors, and even maybe they have doubts—that would not recognize that what we are spending time on, what we will pass, will eventually be termed unconstitutional.

Every impartial, outside individual or entity with knowledge in the area of the law clearly marks it as being unconstitutional.

The American Bar Association, both as an association and through its leadership, has consistently decried this type of effort ever since it was proposed in June.

I noticed the following in an article in the Washington Post of January 24, 1982, entitled, "ABA Head Sees Crisis for Courts."

American Bar Association President David R. Brink warned today that legislation before Congress to strip the federal courts of jurisdiction over controversial social issues could "lead to the most serious constitutional crisis" since the Civil War.

He called on attorneys, because of their "special responsibility as guardians of the rule of law" to declare battle against these proposals, which he said were "almost unbelievably" making unexpected headway in Congress.

Conservatives have introduced at least 32 proposals in Congress to remove federal court authority in such controversies as abortion, school busing and school prayer in retaliation for Supreme Court rulings they consider objectionable. Such bills generally would leave these matters to the state courts, where conservatives say they think they will have better luck.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the article already quoted a similar article in the New York Times, and others to be quoted in the next several minutes be printed in their entirety in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ABA HEAD SEES CRISIS FOR COURTS

(By Fred Barbash)

CHICAGO, January 23.—American Bar Association President David R. Brink warned today that legislation before Congress to strip the federal courts of jurisdiction over controversial social issues could "lead to the most serious constitutional crisis" since the Civil War.

He called on attorneys, because of their "special responsibility as guardians of the rule of law" to declare battle against these proposals, which he said were "almost unbelievably" making unexpected headway in Congress.

Brink made his remarks in a speech to the National Conference of Bar Presidents, meeting here along with the American Bar Association.

Conservatives have introduced at least 32 proposals in Congress to remove federal court authority in such controversies as abortion, school busing and school prayer in retaliation for Supreme Court rulings they consider objectionable. Such bills generally would leave these matters to the state courts, where conservatives say they think they will have better luck.

Brink's statement was unusually strong for the head of an organization that prides itself on moderation on political issues. The ABA is run largely by lawyers with large commercial law firms. But the growth in power of conservatives, often on the strength of issues involving the law and the courts, has placed the ABA increasingly in the role of protester.

The organization has waged a massive effort against President Reagan's efforts to eliminate federally financed legal services.

Brink said the fight against the court-stripping bills would be the second "great fight" of this period. "We must join as partners and companions in arms," he said.

These proposals, Brink said, "threaten elimination of the third branch of federal government, the judicial branch." He said they also threaten "the Constitution as the supreme law of this land. And if we lose that, we lose our system of government."

Giving each state court system exclusive jurisdiction over the issues, he said, would "convert America into a kind of league of independent states instead of one nation."

Brink asked each state and local bar association to follow the lead of the ABA and adopt resolutions against such legislation. He also asked that lawyers engage in "a massive letter-writing campaign and personal visits to members of Congress."

The bars, he said, should also fight similar proposals now circulating in state legislatures to take jurisdiction away from state courts over these matters.

LEADING LAWYERS DEFEND THE COURTS

(By Stuart Taylor, Jr.)

CHICAGO, January 24.—The American Bar Association, characteristically gray, pinstriped, businesslike, and traditionalist as its mid-year convention plods through a frigid weekend here, is uncharacteristically worried about the future the legal system.

David R. Brink, the association's president, is a careful man who rose to senior partner of the largest law firm in Minneapolis by helping affluent clients plan their estates. Yet he has been warning in speeches, news conferences and interviews here that "we are confronted at this very moment with a legislative threat to our nation that may lead to the most serious constitutional crisis since our great Civil War."

It is not the radicals of the left, the bugaboos of past A.B.A. presidents, about whom Mr. Brink and other dignitaries of the legal establishment have been sounding alarms.

NEW RIGHT WORRIES LAWYERS

They are worried about the "new right," led by Senator Jesse Helms, Republican of North Carolina, and the fundamentalist Moral Majority. These groups are pushing more than 30 proposals in Congress that leaders of the bar association say may damage or destroy the power of the Federal courts to safeguard Constitutional rights.

And sometimes they worry about the Reagan Administration, with which the 290,000-member association has a correct but cool relationship. The coolness came from a bitter fight in Congress over Administration efforts to abolish direct Federal financing of legal services for poor people.

The bar association has not been known for advocacy of liberal social causes. Thus it may indicate how far the balance of power in Washington has shifted that the nonpartisan bar association finds itself allied on many major issues with liberatarians and civil rights groups. These unlikely allies are fighting the proposals of Congressional conservatives, and, in some cases, of the Administration.

The foremost threat to "the rule of law," according to Mr. Brink and other lawyers, comes from a strong push by Senator Helms and other Congressional conservatives to strip the Supreme Court and the lower Federal courts of the power to decide cases involving such "social issues" as busing, abortion and school prayer.

"These proposals challenge our Constitution, our separation of powers, our system of American government and our identity as one nation," Mr. Brink said here in a speech.

"They threaten the elimination of the third branch of Federal Government, the judicial," Mr. Brink said. If enacted, he continued, they could lead to "a terrible confrontation" between Congress and the Supreme Court, and especially if the Court agreed with Mr. Brink's view that the proposals were unconstitutional.

Mr. Brink said in an interview that he had asked Attorney General William French Smith to oppose the legislative attacks on the Federal courts.

REAGAN CRITICAL OF JUDGES

Mr. Smith, who is to give a speech here tomorrow, and President Reagan have joined with the conservatives in assailing judicial activism. In particular, they have criticized the Supreme Court's decisions establishing constitutional rights to abortion and requiring school desegregation through busing. But the Administration has taken no position on proposals to strip the courts of jurisdiction over these issues.

Other issues on which the bar association does not see eye-to-eye with the position of some conservatives in Congress and the Administration include these:

The battle over legal aid, with the association leading opposition to the Reagan Administration's proposal to eliminate direct Federal financing.

An Administration proposal to allow unconstitutionally seized evidence to be used against criminal defendants, if a search was conducted in "reasonable, good-faith belief" that it was legal. An association group has opposed this as a dilution of the rights of defendants.

The proposed Federal equal rights amendment. The association supports it; the Administration opposes it, on the ground that it would give courts too much power to strike down laws making distinctions between men and women.

In an interview, Mr Brink was quick to reject a suggestion that the bar was becoming politically liberal.

"We're an apolitical organization," he said. "We're not liberal or conservative or anything else. We're interested in the Constitution and the rights it creates, and the role of the courts as protectors of those rights."

Mr. WEICKER. On February 2, 1982, an article in the Washington Post entitled "State Justices Reject Sole Power Over Social Issues," states as follows, in part:

The chief justices of the state supreme courts, in an unusually strong and unanimous resolution, have condemned the many bills before Congress which would strip the federal courts of power to rule on controversial social issues such as abortion, busing and school prayer.

They also served notice on conservatives that turning these issues over to the state courts, as these bills would do, will not produce the intended result of overturning Supreme Court rulings on busing, legalizing abortion or banning prayer in public schools but will, instead, probably cast them in concrete.

The bills "give the appearance of proceeding from the premise that state court judges will not honor their oaths to obey the U.S. Constitution," the Conference of Chief Justices said, "nor their obligations to give full force to controlling Supreme Court precedents.

"If the proposed statutes are enacted," the resolution said, those rulings "will remain the unchangeable law of the land . . . beyond the reach of the U.S. Supreme Court or state supreme courts to alter or overrule."

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE JUSTICES REJECT SOLE POWER OVER SOCIAL ISSUES

(By Fred Barbash)

The chief justices of the state supreme courts, in an unusually strong and unanimous resolution, have condemned the many bills before Congress which would strip the federal courts of power to rule on controversial social issues such as abortion, busing and school prayer.

They also served notice on conservatives that turning these issues over to the state courts, as these bills would do, will not produce the intended result of overturning Supreme Court rulings on busing, legalizing abortion or banning prayer in public schools but will, instead, probably cast them in concrete.

The bills "give the appearance of proceeding from the premise that state court judges will not honor their oaths to obey the U.S. Constitution," the Conference of Chief Justices said, "nor their obligations to give full force to controlling Supreme Court precedents.

"If the proposed statutes are enacted," the resolution said, those rulings "will remain the unchangeable law of the land . . . beyond the reach of the U.S. Supreme Court or state supreme courts to alter or overrule."

The resolution is expected to carry significant weight because under the bills, the state courts headed by these judges would have sole authority to rule on busing, abortion and other volatile subjects. The judges' resolution said they do not want that authority and regard the legislation as "a hazardous-experiment with the vulnerable fabric" of the nation's judicial system.

The Conference of Chief Justices passed the resolution at a meeting at the National Center of State Courts in Williamsburg, Va., last weekend.

Lawrence H. Cooke, chief judge of New York State and chairman-elect of the conference, said every state was represented and there was no dissent when the vote was taken Saturday.

There are at least 30 court-stripping bills before Congress, some due for floor debate within the next few weeks. Congressional conservatives, led by Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.), are pressing the bills as alternatives to the more difficult process of overruling Supreme Court decisions by amending the U.S. Constitution. Most scholars say the effect would be to throw all the issues into the state courts for resolution where conservatives hope they will have better luck.

The resolution said, such a situation, besides clogging the state courts with new cases, would make the Constitution "mean something different in each of the 50 states" and cause "confusion" throughout the judicial system about the balance of state-federal judicial power.

Mr. WEICKER. There may be a political end to all of this, and I am sure that is why we are here spending the time. It is not popular for anybody to stand up here and defend the proposition called busing. But I think we do have a great obligation, as stated by the State supreme court justices, in the sense of our oath of office to uphold the Constitution of the United States. That is the issue before the U.S. Senate.

I gathered in the dialog between the distinguished Senator from Michigan and the distinguished Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON), that the Senator asked what should we do. We have always had it in our power as a Senate to do anything at all in terms of righting the wrongs brought about by discrimination.

What are we going to do? We make the laws. We control the money. We set the policy. The fact remains that we have not done any of these things so the matter goes to the Supreme Court, the Supreme Court acts, and we do not like what they do. So we want to nullify that. If we nullify that, we will sit right back and continue to do nothing.

But the Constitution, you see, does not allow you to do nothing. It says that there shall be equal opportunity and that we all have equal rights. If those rights are being denied, you just cannot sit back and do nothing.

That is the final upshot of what is being done here, to do nothing. If somebody is murdered on the street, do you do nothing? If somebody is raped, do you do nothing?

What? The destruction of the Constitution because it is a little more sophisticated, a little more difficult to understand? That makes its destruction something less than the destruction of human life? Not at all. What gives value to life are the principles espoused in the Constitution and when they go, you do not sit back and do nothing.

The reason why this has to be fought on the floor of the U.S. Senate is so that we cannot complain when the courts take action in the absence of our action.

It is very easy to pass the buck, to let the President do it. We all know the President is not going to do anything in this area. What appalls me is not that he believes in policies that are different from my own beliefs, but he certainly has an obligation by the powers of his office. He can exercise through the powers of the Executive, or he can create through the powers of the Executive, those policies which tend to back off and make a full commitment to civil rights. That is his privilege. It is the privilege of every Member on the floor.

But I can assure each one of my colleagues that if anybody tries to erode the powers of the U.S. Senate there would be a hue and a cry and we would say, "No."

This President is quite satisfied to let part of his office float out to sea. That should be his bother and concern, not mine.

But it is going to come to pass that there will be other men and women sitting in his chair, in his office. I want to make sure that they have every bit of power that was given to him by his predecessor, because these powers, taken in conjunction with each other, the legislative branch, the executive branch, and the judicial branch, are what give a guarantee, the fullest guarantee, to the rights of all Americans.

We are not safe from all power in any one of those branches, and sometimes two of them fail us. But never have three of them failed us.

That is the issue before us. Yet this amendment attacks two of those branches, both the executive in limiting what it is the Justice Department can do, and the judicial in the sense of what the courts in this Nation can do.

Really, is there any American who wants to leave their entire fate and all of their rights in the hands of the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America? We are very good as to polls and very good as to trying to articulate and manifest the tempers of the times. Really, I think history shows us we are a little short on that area called courage. That, more than anything else, is needed in defense of the Constitution of the United States, because that is the toughest document you can possibly imagine insofar as what it demands of each one of us and the Nation.

No, I do not want my fate left in the hands of the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives, because I realize they might one day fall short, as they have more often than not. I want to make sure that I have a second arrow in my quiver, the executive branch, and even a third, the judicial branch. Indeed, when it comes to tough decisions, more often than not history shows it has been the judicial branch that has stepped in on behalf of all of us and the rights that are ours under the Constitution of the United States.

To leave the constitutional arguments that I have tried to put forth this afternoon, let us for 1 minute try to bring our judgment of busing back into the framework of the times when it was ordered and the times that have transpired since.

Brown against the Board of Education was a 1954 case. Is there anybody who will deny the dramatic change that has taken place in education in the past 28 years? That is the bottom line.

Do you think that is the same system out there? Do you think the same people are getting educated? Do you think the same people have the opportunity today they had in 1954? No way.

There are thousands of Americans that have opportunities available to them because of our great public education system and the opportunities presented therein and the lack of discrimination therein—thousands, hundreds of thousands, that could look upon their future back in 1954 as consisting of nothing more than the most menial and physical of tasks.

That is the bottom line, Mr. President. Ah, now we have become more affluent. Now there are enough out there in terms of minorities that have succeeded that maybe we can try this little experiment once again to narrow the scope of vision and idealism that resides in each one of us. Let us try it. Maybe it is time we do have a minority. Maybe we have just lopped off the numbers so there is not such a large crowd out there still knocking on the door of opportunity.

That is what this is all about. That is what the mood of the Nation is all about.

Sooner or later, again as was hinted at in the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Michigan, if we follow this precedent, it will be some other portion of our society that has become unpopular, not deserving of the majority opinion or the politicians' efforts or the results of polls. Maybe it will be the elderly or maybe it will be the retarded. Maybe it will be the workingman, the laborer. Maybe it will be the politician. Maybe it will be the news media.

There is no end to this mischief once it starts and for anybody to think that they will be immune flies in the face of all history for all nations.

It was John Bonne's words, "I am mine own executioner." That is what we are talking about here as a nation that has been given everything in terms of our opportunity and our rights. We do this to ourselves when we think we do it to someone else. That is the issue here today. And there will be many more uncomfortable moments if we follow that Constitution. But I sure would rather be uncomfortable than have nothing, and nothing is exactly what is assured to us by the narrowness of how we view our fellow citizens, how we perceive them through the lens of that Constitution.

I hope the amendment will be defeated, Mr. President, but if it is not, there will be ample opportunity in the months ahead to discuss the issue further. It is not going to become law. They can all sit there and drool with their tongues hanging out at the prospect that we are going to engage in a little narrowing of the American dream, but it is not going to happen. It is not going to happen.

Yes, there will be separation of church and State and the first amendment is not going to get whittled down.

Maybe this is all great for getting votes, but it surely is not doing much for the country in its present state. And when we are all through with it, I guarantee one thing: The policies might have changed, the laws might have changed in the sense of what is on the books in the new conservative attitude, and maybe some of the economics will change; but the Constitution will be exactly on December 31 of this year as it was on December 31 of last year and December 31 of the year before. The only thing that I would like to see is that situation brought about by the courage of the men and women on this floor, rather than having the Supreme Court of the United States do it for us.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, this bill has rumbled on now for many months. We have had debates and we have been told about political courage, we have been told about the great promises of the Constitution. We have debated everything here on the floor except busing.

Is it not interesting, Mr. President, that in all of these months, the opponents of this amendment, to my judgment, have not once gotten up and tried to defend busing as an institution, as a remedy that works, either as something that achieves educational goals, or indeed, as something that achieves desegregation? Not once have the opponents of this amendment gotten up and said that busing works, that busing is useful, that busing is necessary to bring about and vindicate the promises of the 14th amendment.

Is there a case to be made, Mr. President? Of course, there is not a case to be made. We all know that. The American people know that. That is why, in every public opinion poll, by 3-to-1 margins, they have been against it—because they know it does not work.

The experts know that, Mr. President, I hate to repeat these matters ad nauseum, but listen to what James J. Coleman says. He says:

> It was once assumed that segregation, at least in majority middle-class white schools, would automatically improve the achievement of lower-class black children. I hasten to say that it was research of my doing that in part laid the basis for this assumption. It turns out that school desegregation, as it has been carried out in American schools, does not generally bring achievement benefits to disadvantaged children.

He also says:

> It was once assumed that policies of radical school desegregation could be instituted such as a busing order to create instant racial balance and the resulting school populations would correspond to the assignments of students to the schools, no matter how much busing, no matter how many objections by parents to the school assignments. It is now evident that despite the unwillingness of some to accept the fact, there are extensive losses of white students from large central cities when desegregation occurs.

Mr. President, we could go on and on. Mr. Armor states there is "overwhelming social science evidence that mandatory busing has failed as a feasible remedy for school desegregation." Overwhelming evidence.

Mr. President, just listen to this. I ask my colleagues to listen to a few short paragraphs. I shall quote, then tell who said it.

> In a case involving a school district in Alabama, however, the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit approves a plan "that will probably result in an all-black student body where nothing in the way of desegregation is accomplished and where neither the white students nor black students are benefited." Even though the court acknowledged that the remedy was self-defeating, it ordered the plan implemented unless the local school board could come forward with a plan equally effective in eliminating one-race schools."

It goes on to say:

> The pursuit of racial balance at any cost—the unintended legacy of Green—is without constitutional or social justification. Out of zeal to remedy one evil, courts may encourage or set the stage for other evils. By acting against one-race schools, courts may produce one-race school systems.

Who was that? Mr. Justice Powell of the U.S. Supreme Court, speaking in the case of Estes against Metropolitan Branches of the Dallas NAACP in a 1979 case.

Mr. President, it is no wonder my colleagues do not defend busing, because it cannot be defended. There is no evidence to support it. The Supreme Court itself says that they do not look at the effect of busing, but they march in lockstep to these sets of decisions, started in the late sixties, which, in turn, were based on studies like Mr. Coleman's study. It has been proven, and the facts show, that what Mr. Coleman said back in the sixties was not so. Mr. Coleman says to himself.

Mr. President, if the American people oppose busing, as they have for 10 years, by margins of more than 3 to 1; if indeed the black community opposes busing, as the NBC poll taken this last year shows, by a margin of 47 to 44; if the margin of those who feel strongly is about 60-40 against busing even in the black community, and if it does not work for education; that is, it hurts education, as Mr. Justice Powell, Mr. Armor, Mr. Coleman, and a whole range of experts say; then are we powerless to do anything about it? Can we simply wring our hands here in the U.S. Senate and say the Constitution requires it?

Mr. President, in the first place, there is no decision of the U.S. Supreme Court that elevates busing to the level of a constitutional right. There are, indeed, many decisions which require it. What is elevated in all the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court to the level of constitutional rights is the right to be free of discrimination and the need to eliminate segregation and the need to create unitary school systems. That is the constitutional right, not the right to bus.

So, what we are dealing with in this amendment, Mr. President, is a remedy—a remedy.

We are exhorted about the meaning of the Constitution, and those of us who back this amendment are told that the Constitution says only one thing: that it requires busing, and no matter how idiotic, no matter how counterproductive that policy is, there is nothing we can do about it as the elected representatives of the people of the United States.

Mr. President, I say to my colleagues, if they believe that, they are not reading the whole Constitution.

Section 5 of the 14th amendment is also a part of the Constitution. Indeed, it was there more than 100 years before the Green case and the Swann case, which first discovered the remedy of busing. It says that Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Mr. President, there are decisions which, if one reads the language, would seem fully to support the conclusions of this amendment.

I should like to read a couple of short paragraphs from the latest decisions. Katzenbach against Morgan was a 1966 case involving Puerto Rican voting rights in New York. The Court had previously ruled that under the 14th amendment the New York literacy law was perfectly valid and perfectly legal.

Along came the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and Congress, exercising its power under section 5, declared, in effect, that New York's law was illegal. So that Congress went beyond what the Supreme Court had already said did not violate the Constitution, and yet the Supreme Court in Katzenbach against Morgan, a 1966 case, upheld the power of Congress.

What they said was this:

> By including section 5 the draftsmen sought to grant to Congress, by specific provision applicable to the Fourteenth Amendment, the same broad powers expressed in the Necessary and Proper Clause, Article I, section 8, cl. 18.
>
> Correctly, viewed, section 5 is a positive grant of legislative power authorizing Congress to exercise its discretion in determining whether and what legislation is needed to secure the guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Whether and what legislation is needed."

Four years later, the Court came along and decided the case of Oregon against Mitchell, a 1970 case. Here is what they said there:

> The manner of enforcement involves discretion; but the discretion is largely entrusted to Congress, not to the courts.
>
> The power of Congress in section 5 is to "enforce" the Equal Protection Clause was sufficiently broad, we held, to enable it to abolish voting requirements which might pass muster under the Equal Protection Clause, absent an act of Congress.
> But the choice of appropriate remedies is for Congress and the range of available ones is wide.

Mr. President, to read that kind of language, it seems beyond any argument that there is a broad range of discretion to be exercised by Congress, that we are not powerless—that part of the same Constitution we are exhorted to obey gives Congress the right to choose among various remedies.

Mr. President, what we have done in this bill is to try to fashion a remedy that will work. We want to eradicate segregation, root and branch, as the Court often has said. We want to eliminate discrimination. But we also want a remedy that will work to do that.

What good does it do, Mr. President, to prescribe a remedy that does not work? It was with the best of intentions that doctors in medieval times often used the leech to remove what they saw as the cause of the problem; that is, impure blood. So they would put leeches on a person, in spite of the evidence that all it would do was make them weaker. For decades, indeed for centuries, the leech was used, when any observant person could see that leeching hurt the patient rather than helped the patient.

Mr. President, long distance busing is a leech on the educational system in this country. I do not need David J. Armor and James J. Coleman to tell me that. I can go home to my hometown of Shreveport, La., where they defeated a tax election greatly needed by the school system because public support for education is gone with long distance busing.

I do not need an expert to tell me that it is not working in Baton Rouge, La., when the superintendent tells me that 6-year-old kids are bused an hour and a half in one direction. That is 3 hours all together. Just how much attention span and energy and intellectual drive do they think 6-year-old kids have after 3 hours on the school bus?

So, Mr. President, let us do away with this remedy of leeching on our school system. Let Congress find facts and exercise discretion, as the courts say we have the right and the power to do. Let us fashion a remedy that says experience teaches and the evidence teaches that, basically, the neighborhood school system works the best, that it works the best with a limited amount of busing to be authorized, 5 miles or 15 minutes; that you continue to eliminate discrimination in the way you draw your districts.

We endorse that in this bill. We give to every child the remedy they have had under the Constitution for some years now to go to whatever school they wish, regardless of whether it is in their district or not.

We encourage in this legislation the magnet school, the vocational school, the other kinds of special education schools, and endorse busing as a way to get there.

Mr. President, there are many things that can be done more effectively than to use the leech on this patient, than to use the remedy of busing. We are saying let us get appropriate legislation to implement the real goals and the real thrust of the 14th amendment.

With this legislation we can promote integration—or should I say we will really promote desegregation; and we will promote education by bringing back into the school system those tens of thousands, those hundreds of thousands of students who have left the school system because the remedy has not worked. It has resulted in the sickness and in some instances in almost the death of the patient. Let us promote education and adopt this amendment.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 7 minutes and 43 seconds.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I shall ask a very brief question of my good friend from Louisiana on the findings of fact. "The Congress finds * * *"—who found? What committee? Is this prospective or has someone actually done something which has been accepted by the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSTON. At about, I think it is 1:30 this afternoon, this Senate will vote, and that is a finding, and that is the only way of which I know that Congress can find facts, which is to pass it on the floor of the Senate and then hopefully pass it on the floor of the House of Representatives. At that point we will make a finding.

Mr. WEICKER. But there has been no committee work or no one has gone down and prepared any report, have they, just our vote?

Mr. JOHNSTON. There has been committee work and there has been so much work on this question and so many studies that I put in a bibliography which came off the computer tape—and it stretched all across the room—on articles on this very subject. I put in the bibliography and put in a stack of studies this thick, and they heard also from the witnesses themselves. There is a surfeit of studies and information on the subject.

Mr. WEICKER. There might be a surfeit of opinion, but there certainly is not surfeit of fact as established by the Senate.

Let me say this: If busing is a leech on the body politic, then discrimination and racism are the dracula, if you will, on both the Constitution and the body politic.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I agree with that.

Mr. WEICKER. That is what we are talking about. That is how the American body politic has been weakened, because all of its citizens have not had that same opportunity for education and what lies beyond education.

I think it is clear what has been going on here, if we take a careful look at the record and put it all together in these difficult times. In times past it was very difficult to get the big picture because each individual fact was so spectacular. The same is true right now with the issue that confronts us. It has gone on for about the past year. The Voting Rights Act is being watered down. Leave that off by itself. But then let us hook it up to other things that are happening.

Funding for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission is cut back.

Arthur Flemming, one of the most articulate and committed individuals to the cause of civil rights, was dismissed. There are tax exemptions for segregated schools.

Now this type of legislation on the floor comes up. Put it all together and what does it spell? It is pretty clear to me. This is not some sort of a strategic withdrawal of the commitment to civil rights and individual rights. It is an absolute rout.

I for one stand here with many of my other colleagues saying that this is what is wrong; indeed, no greatness lies in that particular act.

This is best phrased in more constitutional terms, however, by a report of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the report of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York in its entirety.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JURISDICTION-STRIPPING PROPOSALS IN CONGRESS: THE THREAT TO JUDICIAL CONSTITUTIONAL REVIEW

(By The Committee on Federal Legislation)*

INTRODUCTION

Central to our system of government, and to its success, is the principle of separation of powers and the elaborate system of checks and balances that prevents any organ of government from exceeding its authority or infringing the rights of the people. The federal judiciary has long played a central role in that scheme by exercising the power of judicial constitutional review—by which we mean judicial determinations, in cases properly brought by parties having standing, or whether actions by the political branches of the federal government or by the states conform with or contravene our supreme law, the United States Constitution. It is principally through the mechanism of judicial constitutional review that the Constitution's limitations on the political branches of government are enforced. Alexis de Tocqueville observed.

"I am inclined to believe this practice of the American courts to be at once the most favorable to liberty and to public order. . . . [T]he power vested in the American courts of justice of pronouncing a statute to be unconstitutional forms one of the most powerful barriers that have ever been devised against the tyranny of political assemblies."

The barrier against tyranny" praised by de Tocqueville nearly two centuries ago is today under attack by newly powerful forces in Congress. There are pending in both houses of Congress at least 25 bills that, if enacted and upheld as constitutional, would have the effect of scrapping the federal courts' historical role in the system of checks and balances. These bills, listed in the Appendix to this Report, would divest the federal courts of all original and appellate jurisdiction to hear cases relating to (1) the constitutionality of programs of "voluntary" prayer in the public schools or other public places, (2) the constitutionality of laws or regulations affecting abortions, (3) busing as a remedy for school segregation, and (4) the constitutionality of treating men and women differently in connection with the armed forces or the draft. One bill, H.R. 114, may be read to go even further—to eliminate all federal judicial review of state court decisions.

In this Report, we do not address the merits of the various federal court decisions on these subjects that have prompted the proposed legislation, nor do we analyze the individual bills in detail. Rather, we address a question that is raised by all such proposals: Is the elimination of federal court jurisdiction to hear constitutional claims a lawful and appropriate response to judicial decisions of which a current majority in Congress disapproves? That question is fundamental to the structure of our government because, if Congress can legitimately curtail the federal courts' jurisdiction to hear constitutional claims concerning such specific issues as school prayer, abortion, and desegregation, then there is no principled limitation on Congress' power effectively to eliminate the judicial branch as a check on the other branches of the federal government or the states. By enacting any of the present bills, Congress would necessarily be claiming the power, should it so choose, to forbid the federal courts to hear any claim asserted under the Bill of Rights or under any other provision of the Constitution.

Although most of the proponents of these bills generally style themselves as "conservatives," our reveiw of the historical record reveals that their proposals are radical in the most extreme sense of that word. They would not only cast doubt upon the abortion, school prayer, and busing decisions of the past few years, but two centuries of historical development and constitutional doctrine. For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that this radical departure from the system of checks and balances that has served our nation well for the past two centuries is unwise and probably unconstitutional. There is no precedent of enacted legislation eliminating all federal courts jurisdiction to hear claims of deprivation of constitutional rights. To find any precedent for the present bills, one must look to many bills that have been proposed over the years but not enacted. Congress wisely declined these previous invitations to tamper with our constitutional structure of government, and should decline the same invitation presented by the current bills.

Article III of the Constitution does grant Congress power to regulate the jurisdiction of the federal courts (see Part III below). But, as the following analysis shows, this power cannot fairly be construed to permit Congress to deprive the courts of jurisdiction to hear claims arising under the Constitution itself, particularly on an issue-by-issue basis. If Congress' power were so extensive, it would undo the elaborate system of checks and balances that the Framers of the Constitution so carefully crafted. First, it would upset the checks and balances among the three coordinate branches of the federal government, eliminating the judiciary as a check upon unconstitutional actions of the political branches by the simple expedient of removing their jurisdiction to consider challenges to such actions. Second, it would disrupt the allocation of power between the federal government and the states, by eliminating the power of the federal judiciary to restrain acts of the states that violate the Constitution. Third, and perhaps most significant, it would alter the constitutional balance between individual rights and majority will, since the judiciary is the only organ of government that is institutionally suited to protect the rights that our Constitution guarantees to individuals against the wishes of a strong-willed majority.

Another serious objection to legislation of the sort currently proposed is that it is undesirable to deal with complex and controversial social issues, particularly those of constitutional dimension, by eliminating the opportunity for full airing and debate in the federal judiciary. Indeed, one of the ironies of the present bills is that the constitutional interpretations with which the bills' sponsors differ would remain frozen as the supreme law of the land forever, binding upon the state courts under the Supremacy Clause and the doctrine of stare decisis, without any possibility of change through the evolution of legal thought or a change in judicial (particularly Supreme Court) personnel.

We are not alone in voicing our alarm over the present jurisdiction-stripping proposals. In August 1981, the American Bar Association announced its strong opposition to the jurisdiction-stripping device. The New York State Bar Association has issued a report that reaches the same conclusion. The substantial majority of legal scholars and former senior Government lawyers who have testified before committees of Congress—from both sides of the political spectrum—have explained their opposition to the jurisdiction-stripping proposals. And a distinguished jurist, Judge Irving R. Kaufman of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, has written that the jurisdiction-stripping device "threatens not only a number of individual liberties, but also the very independence of the Federal courts, an independence that has safeguarded the rights of American citizens for nearly 200 years."

We begin this Report with a brief description of the pending bills (Part I). We then examine in detail the role of the federal judiciary in our governmental structure (Part II) and the extent of Congress' control over federal court jurisdiction under Article III of the Constitution (Part III).

I. Pending bills to restrict Federal court jurisdiction over constitutional claims

As noted, at least 25 bills are pending in both houses of Congress that would restrict the powers exercised by federal courts in cases involving constitutional questions. While these bills to a large extent invoke the same claims to congressional power over federal court jurisdiction, the nature of the constitutional interests affected by them, and the scope of the restrictions proposed, vary substantially. The bills of which we are aware (listed in the Appendix) fall into five categories: prayer, abortion, school desegregation, sex-based military classification, and federal court review of state court decisions.

A. Prayer

"Voluntary prayer in public schools and public buildings" is the subject of seven virtually identical bills in the House and one bill in the Senate. These bills are a response to court decisions holding that certain religious observances in public schools, whether voluntary or involuntary, violate the First Amendment's prohibition against laws establishing religion. Modeled on the so-called Helms amendment introduced in the 96th Congress, such bills would divest the Supreme Court and the lower federal courts of jurisdiction to hear any case that relates to "voluntary prayer" and that arises out of either "any State statute, ordinance, rule, regulation, or any part thereof" or out of any act of Congress "interpreting, applying, or enforcing" such state acts. Actions currently pending in the federal courts would not be affected by these proposals.

Since each of these proposed bills applies only to the jurisdiction of the federal courts, challenges to the constitutionality of state acts relating to voluntary prayer could still be brought in state courts. State courts, like the federal courts, are bound to give full effect to the provisions of the Federal Constitution and to recognize its supremacy over state laws and regulations. In addition, since the proposed legislation does not and could not purport to alter any prior federal court decisions on the subject of prayer in public schools and public buildings, state courts would still be obligated to apply existing Supreme Court precedent in ruling on future cases.

One of the pending bills would eliminate the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction in any case involving a state act that related to voluntary prayer in public schools or buildings, or that relates to "the qualifications imposed by the State as a condition of teaching in the public schools of the State." The latter provision would eliminate all federal appellate jurisdiction where a state law unconstitutionally imposed racial, religious, political, or other invidious qualifications for schoolteachers.

B. Abortion

The Supreme Court has held that certain types of laws restricting or regulating therapeutic abortions infringe women's constitutionally guaranteed rights of privacy. Four bills pending in the House and two in the Senate would restrict the federal courts' power to enforce these constitutional rights.

Two identical bills, H.R. 73 and S. 583, would simply forbid lower federal courts to enjoin the operation of federal or state laws that restrict abortion, pending final review by the Supreme Court. In the event that the Supreme Court does not review a lower court's ruling in an abortion case, the bills would foreclose any injunctive relief. These bills would not affect the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction, nor would they foreclose the lower federal courts from ruling on the constitutionality of state or federal laws relating to abortion. However, by prohibiting the lower federal courts from enjoining the operation of federal or state abortion laws, the bills would in most cases remove the only effective means to enforce such rulings. It would be extremely difficult to maneuver a case through a district court, a court of appeals, and then the Supreme Court quickly enough for an abortion to be safely performed at the end of the judicial process; requiring abortion cases to be handled so hastily would place an intolerable burden on the courts.

Three other bills would also divest the lower federal courts of jurisdiction to issue any restraining order, temporary or permanent injunction, or declaratory judgment in cases involving state or local laws prohibiting or regulating abortion, but would go further, in seeking to undo the Supreme Court's decisions on abortion by declaring that, for constitutional purposes, human life begins at conception. These bills, although not fully impairing the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction, also go further than H.R. 73 in proscribing declaratory as well as injunctive relief and in proscribing declaratory or injunctive relief even after review by the Supreme Court.

Although these bills purport to be a limitation on federal court jurisdiction, they actually represent a restriction not on the types of cases the federal courts may hear, but on the relief those courts may grant. The bills thus raise questions as to the extent of Congress' power to restrict the traditional remedies dispensed by duly constituted courts in cases over which they have jurisdiction—questions that are outside the scope of this Report.

H.R. 867 more closely resembles the pending prayer bills. That bill would remove the jurisdiction of both the Supreme Court and the lower federal courts in cases arising out of either any "State statute, ordinance, rule, regulation or any part thereof" which relates to abortion, or any "Act interpreting, applying, or enforcing" any such state act.

C. School desegregation

The Supreme Court has held that in certain circumstances, where public schools have been racially segregated in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause and where no other remedy will effectively eliminate the pattern of segregation, the Constitution requires that pupils be assigned and transported to schools in a manner that eliminates the unconstitutional pattern of racial segregation. The only limitation upon this constitutional mandate is that "the time or distance of travel" not be "so great as to either risk the health of the children or significantly impinge on the educational process." Six bills proposed in the House and one in the Senate would restrict the federal courts' jurisdiction to award this remedy even where constitutionally required. Although phrased in terms of a limitation on federal court jurisdiction, these bills really limit the power of federal courts to award a particular remedy, not the power of federal courts to hear cases involving certain types of disputes.

H.R. 761 is much broader than the other bills, in that it is not confined to desegregation orders that require busing. Read literally, this bill would forbid any federal court remedy for school segregation, since any desegregation order—even one that did not employ busing—would require that individual students be assigned to a "particular school," even if the assigned school were the one nearest his home.

H.R. 869, which parallels the prayer bills in form, would deny to the federal courts jurisdiction to hear "any case arising out of" any state act (or any act interpreting, applying, or enforcing a state act) "which relates to assigning or requiring any public school student to attend a particular school because of his race, creed, color, or sex." While the intent of the draftsman was probably to eliminate federal court jurisdiction to assign students to schools on the basis of race, if the bill is read literally it would eliminate all federal court original and appellate jurisdiction to hear any segregation case, since even a state statute that blatantly assigned all black students to one school and all whites to another would be a "State statute . . . assigning . . . any . . . student to attend a particular school because of his race" and therefore beyond federal judicial purview under this bill.

Two other bills, H.R. 2047 and S. 528, would not prohibit the federal courts from employing busing as a remedy for school segregation. Rather, these bills would limit the circumstances in which busing may be ordered, limit the length of the bus ride, and require that alternative remedies be explored before ordering busing as a last resort.

D. Armed Forces

H.R. 2365 would eliminate Supreme Court and lower federal court jurisdiction to review equal protection challenges to males-only registration or induction for military service—a constitutional claim rejected by the Supreme Court after the bill was introduced.

Of more concern, therefore, is H.R. 2791, which would deprive the Supreme Court and lower federal courts of jurisdiction to hear constitutional challenges not only to different treatment of the sexes in registration for the draft or induction, but also to sex-based standards for the composition of, or duty assignments in, the armed forces. While courts have generally given the military wide latitude in determining whether sex-based distinctions are appropriate, some sex-based classifications in the military, apart from the draft, have been ruled unconstitutional.

These two bills raise serious constitutional problems beyond those presented by the bills previously discussed, since they foreclose federal court challenges to federal laws and regulations. The other bills primarily address federal judicial review of state acts, and at least leave the state courts as forums for judicial constitutional review. These two bills, however, might eliminate any avenue of judicial constitutional review, since state courts may be powerless to afford a remedy for unconstitutional actions by federal officials.

E. Review of State Court Decisions

H.R. 114 would deny to any court "that is established by Act of Congress under Article III of the Constitution . . . jurisdiction to modify, directly or indirectly, any order of a court of a State if such order is, will be, or was, subject to review by the highest court of such State."

It is not clear whether this bill would affect the Supreme Court's jurisdiction, since the Supreme Court was created directly by Article III of the Constitution, but is organized by congressional act, or whether it refers only to the inferior federal courts. If the bill is intended to apply to the Supreme Court, it would entirely eliminate the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction over all state court decisions—constituting a radical curtailment of the Supreme Court's constitutional role (see Part IIB below). If, on the other hand, H.R. 114 is intended to affect only the jurisdiction of the lower federal courts, it is likely to have little impact, since the lower federal courts do not have appellate jurisdiction over state court decisions, and therefore ordinarily have no occasion to modify state court orders (except perhaps indirectly, as in habeas corpus cases).

Having briefly described what the 25 pending bills seek to do, we turn now to our analysis of the wisdom and constitutionality of the basic concept underlying them all. We consider first whether such legislation would profoundly alter the system of checks and balances upon which our constitutional government rests. We then discuss whether, in any event, Congress has the power under the Constitution to enact such laws.

II. The constitutional role of the Federal judiciary

Such power as Congress has over federal court jurisdiction derives from two brief phrases in Article III of the Constitution. One of them, following a statement that the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, in all cases within the broadly defined "judicial power of the United States," adds, "with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make" (Art. III, § 2.) The other, providing that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in the Supreme Court "and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish" (Art. III, § 1), is the source of Congress' power over lower court jurisdiction.

To interpret these provisions, it is necessary to examine them in the context of the role of the judicial branch of the federal government in our constitutional system. Central to that system is the principle of separation of powers among the branches of the federal government as it relates to judicial constitutional review. Within that system, judicial constitutional review by the federal judiciary serves four distinct, yet interrelated, functions: (a) the federal judiciary enforces the Constitution's limitations on the power of the political branches of the federal government; (b) the federal judiciary assures the supremacy of the United States Constitution and laws vis-a-vis the states; (c) the federal judiciary protects individual rights guaranteed by the Constitution against encroachments by majority will as expressed in acts of the federal and state governments; and (d) the federal judiciary accommodates the principles of our written Constitution with the changing needs of society. We shall examine in turn each of these aspects of the federal judiciary's role and show why the proposed legislation would undermine them all.

A. Judicial Review and the Separation of Powers

The first three articles of the Constitution set forth the specific, limited powers granted to the three coordinate branches of the federal government: the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary. The Framers conceived of this separation of powers as the essential safeguard of the liberties of American people. Thus, in The Federalist Papers, Madison wrote, "The accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judiciary, in the same hands, whether of one, a few, or many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elected, may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny." The doctrine of separation of powers does not require that the legislative, executive, and judicial departments be wholly unconnected with each other, but rather that they should be "so far connected and blended as to give to each a constitutional control over the other." The Supreme Court has repeatedly reaffirmed these concepts as basic to our federal governmental structure.

The Founding Fathers feared tyranny by a majority of the public and therefore feared tyranny by a legislature elected by that majority. Judicial constitutional review by an independent federal judiciary not beholden to the public or legislature for tenure in office or continued compensation was intended by the Framers as the people's safeguard against the exercise of governmental power in excess of that conferred under the Constitution and against the invasion of the individual's rights of liberty and property.

In our jurisprudence, the federal judiciary can only exercise this essential power of judicial constitutional review by declaring and applying the law in cases and controversies submitted to the courts for decision. That fundamental concept led, in 1803, to the Supreme Court's unanimous decision in Marbury v. Madison, and Chief Justice Marshall's heretofore unchallenged declaration that: "It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is." More than 150 years later, another unanimous Supreme Court, in the Little Rock school desegregation case, said of Marbury v. Madison:

"This decision declared the basic principle that the federal judiciary is supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution, and that principle has ever since been respected by this Court and the Country as a permanent and indispensable feature of our constitutional system."

The function of constitutional review is allocated to an independent judiciary in order to prevent the accumulation of power in one department of the government. As Hamilton wrote in The Federalist Papers, it could not be expected "that men who had infringed the Constitution in the character of legislators would be disposed to repair the breach in the character of judges." Thus, a constitutional system that imposes limitations on the authority of the legislative branch also requires an independent branch to determine whether legislation comports with the constitutional limitations; otherwise, the legislature would have the power both to enact and to judge the law, and there would be no check on its proper exercise of its powers.

Judicial constitutional review does not imply judicial supremacy, but rather rests on the foundation of legislative supremacy. As Hamilton explained, because the adoption of the Constitution expressed the people's ultimate legislative act of ratification, the courts are obliged to invalidate legislation that is contrary to the Constitution. The function of constitutional review is safely entrusted to the judiciary not because it is the supreme branch of government, but rather because it is the weakest. As Hamilton observed, "The executive not only dispenses the honors but holds the sword of the community. The legislature not only commands the purse but prescribes the rules by which the duties and rights of every citizen are to be regulated." In contrast, the judiciary "may truly be said to have neither FORCE nor WILL but merely judgment; and must ultimately depend upon the aid of the executive arm even for the efficacy of its judgments."

The power of judicial constitutional review is not absolute, but is limited by the very nature of the judicial function. Courts may decide constitutional questions only when those questions must be answered to decide justiciable cases submitted to them by litigants with standing to raise such questions. hence, the judiciary does not sit in general review of legislation as it is enacted or executive actions as they are taken. Nor have the courts any power to review legislation or executive actions on their own initiative. Rather, judges must wait for the necessity of constitutional review to be thrust upon them by litigants whose interests are adversely affected by conduct claimed to be unconstitutional. This limitation is expressed in Article III's definition of the judicial power as extending only to "cases" and "controversies."

The Founding Fathers were not unmindful of the possibility that the judiciary, like the other two branches of government, might be tempted to exceed its constitutionally circumscribed role. Hamilton conceded the possibility that judges, in constructing a statute, "may substitute their own pleasure to the constitutional intentions of the legislature." But such action would be improper, for the "courts must declare the sense of the law"; they may not exercise "will" instead of "judgment." Thus, Hamilton acknowledged the need for judicial accountability, but stressed that the "precautions" for the "responsibility" of the federal judiciary were to be found only in the Constitution's provision for impeachment. That device, he wrote, was "the only provision on the point which is consistent with the necessary independence of the judicial character.

Hamilton characterized as "a phantom" any feared danger of judicial encroachments on legislative authority. To him, not only was the judiciary a comparatively weak branch of government, but there was also "the consideration of the important constitutional check which the power of instituting impeachments in one part of the legislative body, and of determining upon them in the other, would give to that body upon the members of the judicial department. This is alone a complete security."

If, as the Framers thus believed, the judicial branch is the only realistic check to prevent the political branches from exceeding their constitutional powers, then it must follow that Congress' power to regulate federal court jurisdiction cannot be so broad as to enable Congress to divest the courts of the function of judicial constitutional review, as the bills currently under consideration would do. In the system explicated by the Framers, Congress could not have the power to make any statute review-proof by the simple expedient of divesting all federal courts of jurisdiction to hear a challenge to it. Even more abhorrent to that scheme is the notion inherent in the current bills, that a simple majority of Congress may eviscerate judicial constitutional decisions with which that majority disagrees merely by stripping the federal courts of power to consider such cases in the future. To conclude that the Framers viewed the judiciary as the fundamental check upon excesses by Congress, but also gave Congress the power by simple majority to nullify that check, is, in the words of a recent commentary, "to charge them with chasing their tails around a stump."

B. Judicial Review and the Supremacy of Federal Law

Federal judicial review of state laws and acts is as important to our federal system as review of federal laws and acts. Yet most of the bills now under consideration are aimed primarily at restricting this form of judicial review.

The Supremacy Clause provides that the United States Constitution, and all federal laws enacted pursuant thereto, are the "supreme Law of the Land." The federal judiciary, especially the Supreme Court, is the Constitution's mechanism for enforcing the Supremacy Clause vis-a-vis the states.

Many constitutional scholars believe that the Supreme Court's most important role in our constitutional system is assuring that federal law, and particularly the Constitution, is interpreted uniformly throughout the nation. In this view, the notion of a single supreme Constitution would be rendered virtually meaningless if it could be interpreted to mean different things in different states.

Professor Charles Black has written:

"There is nothing in our entire governmental structure which has a more leakproof claim to legitimacy than the function of the courts in reviewing state acts for federal constitutionality."

And Justice Holmes stated:

"I do not think the United States would come to an end if we [the Supreme Court] lost our power to declare an Act of Congress void. I do think the Union would be imperiled if we could not make that determination as to the laws of the several states."

These views echo those of the Framers. A major criticism of the Articles of Confederation was the weakness of the national government and the consequent disharmony among the states. Hamilton regarded it as essential that, in a national union, there be a national judiciary to assure uniform interpretation of national laws:

"If there are such things as political axioms, the propriety of the judicial power of a government being coextensive with its legislative may be ranked among the number. The mere necessity of the uniformity in the intepretation of the national laws decides the question. Thirteen independent courts of final jurisdiction over the same causes, arising upon the same laws, is a hydra in government from which nothing but contradiction and confusion can proceed."

Hence, the Framers understood that the supremacy of federal law can only be effected if there is a single tribunal with the ultimate responsibility for deciding what the law is. As Hamilton wrote:

"To avoid the confusion which would unavoidably result from the contradictory decisions of a number of independent judicatories, all nations have found it necessary to establish one court paramount to the rest, possessing a general superintendence and authorized to settle and declare in the last resort a uniform rule of civil justice."

Even those at the Constitutional Convention who emphasized the independence of the states in the proposed federal system and wished to minimize the scope of the federal judiciary acknowledged that such independence was limited by the requirements of the Constitution and federal law, and that the federal judicial branch had the authority to interpret the Constitution and the laws. For example, John Rutledge of South Carolina argued at the Constitutional Convention:

"The State Tribunals might and ought to be left in all cases to decide in the first instance, the right of appeal to the supreme national tribunal being sufficient to secure the national rights & uniformity of Judgments."

Over nearly two centuries, Congress has consistently recognized the necessity of appellate jurisdiction in the Supreme Court over state court decisions as the primary means of enforcing the Supremacy Clause. From the Judiciary Act of 1789 through the present Judicial Code, Congress has always preserved the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction to consider whether state acts contravene the Constitution or federal laws enacted pursuant thereto.

The debate over the first Judiciary Act is instructive. Although the First Congress continued the Constitutional Convention's debate over the desirability of creating inferior federal courts, the necessity of the Supreme Court's having appellate jurisdiction to assure national uniformity was not questioned. Even those who "were anxious to give the Federal Courts as little jurisdiction as possible" acknowledged that state court decisions on questions of federal law must be "subject to Federal revision through the appellate power of the United States Supreme Court." The universal acceptance of federal judicial constitutional review over state acts and court decisions sheds light on the intent of the Constitution's Framers, for the Judiciary Act of 1789 was "passed by the first Congress assembled under the Constitution, many of whose members had taken part in framing that instrument, and is contemporaneous and weighty evidence of its true meaning."

Following passage of the Judiciary Act of 1789, leading Supreme Court decisions have consistently expounded the importance to our system of constitutional federalism of federal judicial review over state acts. As one scholar observed:

"From an early date the Supreme Court itself has explicitly recognized that its indispensable functions under the Constitution are to resolve conflicting interpretations of the federal law and to maintain the supremacy of that law when it conflicts with state law or is challenged by state authority."

Justice Story's opinion in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee reaffirmed the Supreme Court's essential role in securing a uniform system of law throughout the United States by holding that its appellate jurisdiction applied to all cases specified in Article III, whether those cases arose in state or federal courts. That landmark opinion emphasized "the importance, and even necessity of uniformity of decisions throughout the whole United States, upon all subjects within the purview of the constitution. Judges of equal learning and integrity, in different States, might differently interpret a statute, or a treaty of the United States, or even the constitution itself. If there were no revising authority to control these jarring and discordant judgments, and harmonize them into uniformity, the laws, the treaties, and the constitution of the United States would be different in different States, and might, perhaps, never have precisely the same construction, obligation, or efficacy, in any two States. The public mischiefs that would attend such a state of things would be truly deplorable; and it cannot believed that they could have escaped the enlightened convention which formed the constitution. . . . [T]he appellate jurisdiction must continue to be the only adequate remedy for such evils."

These principles have never been seriously questioned. In Cohens v. Virginia, Chief Justice Marshall's opinion, upholding the Supreme Court's authority to review a state court criminal conviction that involved interpretation of a federal statute, stated that "the necessity of uniformity, as well as correctness in expounding the constitution and laws of the United States, would itself suggest the propriety of vesting in some single tribunal the power of deciding, in the last resort, all cases in which they are involved. . . .

"[The Constitution's Framers] declare that in such cases the supreme court shall exercise appellate jurisdiction. Nothing seems to be given which would justify the withdrawal of a judgment rendered in a state court, on the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, from this appellate jurisdiction."

In Ableman v. Booth, the Supreme Court reiterated that the Supremacy Clause requires a single federal tribunal to make a final determination as to the laws of the United States and the Constitution, "for if left to the courts of justice of the several States, conflicting decisions would unavoidably take place . . . and the government of the United States would soon become one thing in one State and another thing in another."

In the face of these clear Supreme Court pronouncements, Congress has never disturbed the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction to hear federal constitutional challenges to state acts, either broadly or as to specific issues. To do so now, as proposed in the bills here under consideration, would violate the spirit, if not the letter, of the Supremacy Clause by eliminating the only federal means for enforcing it, and would run counter to a consistent line of historical authority affirming the Supreme Court's central role under that clause.

C. Judicial Review and Individual Rights

The pending bills strike most directly at the third basic function of judicial constitutional review: protecting individual rights against abridgement by majority rule as expressed through the political branches of government.

Majority rule is not the only rule in the United States. Rather, our Constitution guarantees specific rights to individuals—freedom of speech, free exercise of religion, equal protection of the law, and due process of law, to name a few—against infringement by majority will be expressed as through the political branches of government. As the Supreme Court stated nearly 40 years ago in West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette:

"The very purpose of a Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. One's right to life, liberty, and property, to free speech, a free press, freedom of worship and assembly, and other fundamental rights may not be submitted to vote; they depend on the outcome of no elections."

89-059 O-85-56 (Pt. 1)

And as James Madison wrote much earlier:

"[I]n our Government the real power lies in the majority of the Community, and the invasion of private rights is chiefly to be apprehended, not from acts of Government contrary to the sense of its constituents, but from acts in which the Government is the mere instrument of the major number of the Constituents.

Hence, the Founding Fathers recognized that the exercise of fundamental rights, and the individuals who exercise them, would not always win public favor, and that, from time to time, a substantial and vocal majority of the public might clamor to abridge them in certain instances. Were this not so, there would be no reason to enjoin the infringement of these rights in the Constitution.

Institutionally, the federal judiciary is the only organ of government that can be counted upon to protect individual rights when they are pitted against the will of the majority. That was why Article III, Section I, of the Constitution made the judiciary independent of public favor by giving judges lifetime tenure and undiminished compensation throughout their judicial service. It was thus intended that the courts should be free to render unpopular decisions that thwart the current majority's will when the law, as the courts interpret it, so requires.

The central role of the federal courts in protecting individual rights from encroachment by the majoritarian branches of government has been repeatedly acknowledged. Chief Justice Hughes wrote in 1927:

"In our system, the individual finds security in his rights because he is entitled to the protection of tribunals that represent the capacity of the community for impartial judgment as free as possible from the passion of the moment and the demands of interests or prejudice.

Similarily, Justice Frankfurter, while a professor of law at Harvard, wrote:

"The Supreme Court is indispensable to the effective workings of our federal government. . . . I know of no other peaceful method for making the adjustments necessary to a society like ours—for maintaining the equilibrium between state and federal power, for settling the eternal conflicts between liberty and authority—than through a court of great traditions free from the tensions and temptations of party strife, detached from the fleeting interests of the moment.

And Justice Black observed that our federal courts "stand against any winds that blow as havens of refuge for those who might otherwise suffer because they are helpless, weak, outnumbered, or because they are non-conforming victims of prejudice and public excitement."

While most commentators have emphasized the courts' role as protectors of personal liberty (freedom of speech, religion, privacy, and the like), equally important is the courts' role as guardians of private property. The courts are the people's only means of enforcing the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment prohibitions against the taking of private property for public use without just compensation and the deprivation of a person's property without due process of law.

Given the historic swings of the political pendulum, it is not inconceivable that a majority of the people of the United States, or of just one state, might someday elect a socialist government, as has already occurred in Western Europe. Should that government embark on a program that included nationalization of major industries or redistribution of private property, the judiciary would be the only institution sufficiently independent to protect the rights of private property guaranteed by the Constitution in the face of public clamor. But if the 97th Congress can legitmately curtail the federal courts' jurisdiction to adjudge selected constitutional claims, as now proposed, then a future Congress, by simple majority, could as easily eliminate the courts' jurisdiction to hear claims based on government seizures of private property without due process or just compensation.

The federal judiciary's historic role as guardian of the rights of personal liberty and property guaranteed by the Constituion should not be cast aside simply because, as the Framers intended, courts sometimes render opinions that are unpopular. It is no secret that the bills presently under consideration were prompted by controversial judicial decisions—banning prayer from public schools, imposing busing as a means of integrating public schools, and permitting abortions—that are extremely unpopular in many quarters. Whether or not one agrees with the courts' decisions in these cases, it is clear that the courts were acting in their constitutional capacity as the protector of individual rights guaranteed by the Constitution. It would ill serve the long-term stability of our form of government, and would probably be unconstitutional, for Congress now to claim the power to curtail the federal courts' jurisdiction to perform this essential constitutional function.

D. Judicial Review and Constitutional Development

A final objection to the practice of divesting the federal courts of jurisdiction to hear constitutional claims is that it would stultify the development of constitutional law. Our Constitution is more than the words put on paper some two hundred years ago; rather, it is a living document that grows and adapts with the experience of our people.

The meaning of laws, and particularly the meaning of constitutional provisions, is not always a bright-line truth, especially as it may be applied to factual circumstances never envisioned by the Framers. For example, radio and television did not exist at the time that the First Amendment was drafted, nor indeed for most of the Amendment's history. Yet, although the technological advances raise questions of access and other matters not present in the case of other forms of publication such as newspapers, the courts have applied the principles of the First Amendment to these new means of communication.

The federal judiciary has been the primary instrument for reflecting such growth and adaptation in constitutional doctrine. Thus, one of the ironies in proposals like the present bills is that the very judicial decisions that were so unpopular that they spawned such bills would become frozen in the law forever. If the federal courts are divested of jurisdiction to engage in the normal processes of change through the development of new legal doctrine, shifts in social conditions, or turnover of judges (especially Supreme Court Justices), and if state courts continue to follow federal constitutional law, as they are required to do under the Supremacy Clause, the current state of the law on abortions, school prayer, and busing will be preserved, subject to change only by constitutional amendment.

In cases where a bright-line result is not immediately apparent, the interplay between the courts and Congress and among the different courts throughout the country is an important process in the development of the law. Silencing the federal courts to speak on such issues by withdrawing their jurisdiction would deprive the nation of this important element in the lawmaking process and would be grievously unwise. Not only would the creative interplay between the inferior federal courts and the Supreme Court be lost, but so too would the interplay between the federal courts and the state courts. Three years ago, this Committee, commenting upon proposals to abolish diversity jurisdiction, stated:

"The Erie requirement that federal courts apply state substantive law in diversity cases has resulted in a continuous flow between the federal and state systems of both procedural and substantive reforms. . . . Elimination of such cross-fertilization could have significant adverse effects on the general character and competence of the two systems."

This process of cross-fertilization is all the more important in the realm of the basic constitutional issues, which the pending bills propose to remove from the jurisdiction of the federal courts.

III. The extent of Congress' authority under article III

Given the federal judiciary's essential role in our system of checks and balances, its basic function of enforcing the Supremacy Clause, and its task of protecting individual rights, does it stand to reason that Congress has the constitutional power to curtail those functions by limiting the courts' jurisdiction as the proponents of the current bills contend? It is with that question in mind that we now examine the Constitution's provisions granting Congress a measure of control over federal court jurisdiction, which are cited as the constitutional authorization for most of the pending bills.

Congress' power to regulate the jurisdiction of the federal courts is conferred by Article III of the Constitution (emphasis added):

"Section 1. The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

"Section 2. . . .

"In all cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned [within the judicial power of the United States], the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make."

Historically, the federal judiciary has never exercised jurisdiction as broad as the full judicial power defined in Article III. From the Judiciary Act of 1789 onward, statutes defining the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and lower federal courts have never utilized the entire reach of the "judicial power" defined in Article III, Section 2, and the courts have never claimed jurisdiction to reach the categories of cases outside the statutory definition. To cite two contemporary examples: (1) no federal court has original jurisdiction to hear diversity claims that do not meet the statutory jurisdictional amount, even though there is no such limitation on diversity jurisdiction in Article III; (2) the Supreme Court does not have appellate jurisdiction over diversity cases tried in the state courts that do not involve a federal question, even though such jurisdiction would be within the reach of Article III.

On the other hand, since the Judiciary Act of 1789, statutes defining federal court jurisdiction have regularly conferred broad jurisdiction upon the federal judiciary within the definition of "judicial power" contained in Article III of the Constitution. Congress has not sought to use its power over federal court jurisdiction to erode the judiciary's central role in interpreting the Constitution and federal law or in exercising the responsibility of judicial constitutional review. Nor has it previously attempted to define federal court jurisdiction in terms of substantive issues, as opposed to neutral principles such as citizenship of the parties or amount in controversy. Because of this, there has been little occasion for the courts to consider the metes and bounds of Congress' control over federal court jurisdiction. Most of the statements in judicial opinions concerning the extent of Congress' power over federal court jurisdiction are therefore dicta, and cannot be viewed as controlling doctrine.

This much, however, seems clear: There is no support, from the debates surrounding the adoption of Article III or otherwise, for the proposition that the Framers intended Article III to confer upon Congress power to strip the federal courts of jurisdiction to hear constitutional claims or to abrogate the federal courts' essential function of judicial constitutional review in response to unpopular, or even erroneous, judicial decisions. Nor is there authority for the proposition that congress' power to regulate jurisdiction may be used as an indirect means of undermining judicial opinions with which Congress disagrees.

The statements in The Federalist Papers that the power of impeachment was intended to be the only check on the federal judiciary strongly indicate that the Framers never intended Congress' Article III control over jurisdiction to be so used. Rather, read in context, it appears that Congress' regulation of federal court jurisdiction was intended solely to permit Congress, through policy-neutral criteria, to allocate judicial business among the federal courts, to prevent the federal courts from becoming overburdened by cases that do not involve substantial federal claims, and to provide orderly procedures for the federal judiciary's exercise of its jurisdiction. This view is supported by the manner in which Congress has actually exercised its Article III powers to regulate federal court jurisdiction since the beginning of the Republic; Congress has never curtailed the courts' jurisdiction to adjudicate constitutional claims as proposed in the jurisdiction-stripping bills.

The unprecedented nature of the bills here under consideration poses serious doubts about their constitutionality as well as their wisdom. While the manner in which Congress has historically exercised its jurisdictional power cannot alter the Constitution's grant of that power, it can illuminate the proper meaning of that grant. As Justice Frankfurter explained:

"The Constitution is a framework for government. Therefore the way the framework has consistently operated fairly establishes that it has operated according to its true nature. Deeply imbedded traditional ways of conducting government cannot supplant the Constitution or legislation, but they give meaning to the words of a text or supply them. It is an inadmissibly narrow conception of American constitutional law to confine it to the words of the Constitution and to disregard the gloss which life has written upon them."

We turn now to specific consideration of the constitutional language relied upon as authority for enactment of the pending bills. Since Congress' power over Supreme Court and lower court jurisdiction depends upon different provisions of Article III, those provisions must be analyzed separately.

A. Supreme Court Jurisdiction

The Constitution confers original jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court in a relatively narrow range of cases involving diplomatic personnel or in which a state is a party. Congress can neither add to nor subtract from the original jurisdiction thus conferred.

The Supreme Court's most important role in our system is thus as an appellate court, hearing appeals from both inferior federal courts and state courts on issues of federal constitutional, statutory, administrative law. As discussed above (Part II), the history of the Constitution indicates that the Supreme Court was intended to be the final arbiter of federal law; to review the constitutionality of acts of Congress and federal executive actions; to review the constitutionality of state enactments in light of federal statutory and constitutional law, thereby serving as the primary instrument for enforcing the Supremacy Clause; and to protect individual rights from encroachments by the majoritarian branches of the federal and state governments.

Such power as Congress has over the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction is conferred by the Exceptions Clause of Article III, Section 2, which grants such jurisdiction "with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make." If Congress has authority to restrict the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction to hear constitutional claims, as proposed in the pending bills, it must derive from this clause.

Those who advocate such authority for Congress contend that the Exceptions Clause, read literally, gives Congress plenary power over the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction. One answer to this contention is that the Constitutional Convention voted down a proposal that would have expressly given Congress such plenary power. In the course of the Constitutional Convention's consideration of Article III, a motion was made to replace a provision that was substantively identical to the Exceptions Clause as enacted with the following language: "In all the other cases before mentioned the judicial power shall be exercised in such manner as the legislature shall direct." The Convention rejected this proposal, and instead adopted the Exceptions Clause in its present form.

Moreover, while such a literal reading of a single phrase might be acceptable in construing a detailed regulatory statute, it is not appropriate in constitutional interpretation. In the words of Chief Justice Marshall, "we must never forget, that it is a constitution we are expounding." It is thus axiomatic that the Constitution necessarily must be read as a broad outline of our system of government, and its individual provisions must be read in the context of the organic whole. Proper interpretation of the Constitution requires consideration of its spirit, as well as its letter, and the spirit should control over an interpretation that would defeat an essential tenet of the Constitution, such as the doctrine of separation of powers.

Accordingly, the Exceptions Clause must be read in the context of the broad language of Article III establishing the judicial power of the United States. It would be curious drafting, and contrary to established principles of constitutional, statutory, and contractual construction, if an "exception" in the third paragraph of the Article were read to grant to Congress the power totally to efface the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction granted in the same Article—especially in the absence of any historical evidence that this clause was intended to permit, at Congress' option, a radical diminution of the constitutional role of the Supreme Court.

There was no discussion in the Constitutional Convention of any such far-reaching effect to be attributed to the Exceptions Clause. Nor was there any suggestion of any such significance in the preparation of earlier drafts of the Constitution. Although the clause was debated at the Constitutional Convention, the point at issue was the scope of the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction with respect to matter of fact, which some considered to be an infringement of the cherished right to a trial by jury. As Hamilton observed, "The propriety of this appellate jurisdiction has scarcely been called in question in regard to matters of law; but the clamors have been loud against it as applied to matters of fact." As one constitutional scholar has noted, the debate ended in a compromise that left the First Congress to struggle with the scope of the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction over factual determinations under the Exceptions Clause:

"So complicated were the varying practices [of review of facts] that it was concluded to leave the problem for handling by the Congress through the medium of the 'exceptions' clause, fashioned to meet the 'principal criticism' of the appellate jurisdiction, its inclusion of matters of 'fact' "

In his well-known "Dialogue," Professor Hart rejected as "preposterous" the notion that the Exceptions Clause might be read "as authorizing exceptions which engulf the rule, even to the point of eliminating the appellate jurisdiction altogether." According to Hart, the measure of Congress power over the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction under the Exceptions Clause "is simply that the exceptions must not be such as will destroy the essential role of the Supreme Court in the constitutional plan." As Professor Ratner pointed out, this interpretation of the limits of the Exceptions Clause is buttressed by legal usage known to the Framers when the Constitution was drafted, by which an "exception" cannot be construed to nullify the rule that it limits or to negate an essential part of what was granted.

Judicial precedent on the scope of Congress' power under the Exceptions Clause is not illuminating. As noted above, because Congress has never challenged the Supreme Court's jurisdiction to hear constitutional claims, there are no definitive rulings on the extent or limits of Congress' power. While some cases contain extravagantly broad statements concerning Congress power over the Supreme Court's jurisdiction, the statements are dicta, for the cases did not involve any attempt by Congress to limit the Court's jurisdiction to hear constitutional claims. Only two Reconstruction-era cases, Ex parte McCardle and United States v. Klein, actually addressed the scope of Congress power under the Exceptions Clause, and they point in opposite directions.

Those who urge that the Exceptions Clause gives Congress plenary power to divest the Supreme Court of appellate jurisdiction most often cite Ex parte McCardle as the leading authority for this view. In 1867, William H. McCardle, a newspaper editor in Mississippi, had been arrested by the army pursuant to the Military Reconstruction Act passed earlier the same year, which subjected the South to federal military command. Based upon anti-reconstructionist editorials McCardle had published, he was charged with libel, disturbing the peace, inciting insurrection, and impeding reconstruction. He petitioned the federal circuit court for a writ of habeas corpus, challenging the constitutionality of the Military Reconstruction Act, under a Habeas Corpus Act passed by the same Reconstruction Congress in 1867. There was some irony in this: the 1867 Habeas Corpus Act was passed for the purpose of advancing reconstruction by expanding the federal courts' powers to release former slaves and others who were being unlawfully held prisoner by the southern states. But the terms of the statute were not confined to prisoners in state custody, and McCardle, an anti-reconstructionist, was using it as a device to challenge the very reconstruction that the act was intended to promote.

The circuit court denied McCardle's petition, and he appealed to the Supreme Court under a provision of the 1867 Act. The Government moved to dismiss the appeal, and the Supreme Court denied the motion. The Government then faced the prospect that the Supreme Court, on reaching the merits, might declare one of the cornerstones of reconstruction policy to be unconstitutional. To avert this threat, while McCardle's appeal was still pending, Congress repealed the provision of the 1867 Habeas Corpus Act that allowed a direct appeal to the Supreme Court. In light of that repeal, the Supreme Court dismissed the appeal in a terse opinion, containing the following language relied upon by proponents of the current bills:

". . . The provision of the act of 1867, affirming the appellate jurisdiction of this court in cases of habeas corpus is expressly repealed. It is hardly possible to imagine a plainer instance of positive exception.

"We are not at liberty to inquire into the motives of the legislature. We can only examine into its power under the Constitution; and the power to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of this court is given by express words.

"What, then, is the effect of the repealing act upon the case before us? We cannot doubt as to this. Without jurisdiction the court cannot proceed at all in any cause. Jurisdiction is power to declare the law, and when it ceases to exist, the only function remaining to the courts is that of announcing the fact and dismissing the cause."

In reading Ex parte McCardle, it must be borne in mind that the opinion was written under the most intense imaginable pressure at the peak of radical Reconstruction. As one commentary has noted, "With troops in the streets of the capital and the President of the United States on trial before the Senate, a less ideal setting for dispassionate judicial inquiry could hardly be imagined." And as Justice Douglas once observed, "There is a serious question whether the McCardle case could command a majority view today."

Moreover, the full McCardle opinion shows that it does not support so broad a view of Congress' power over the Supreme Court's jurisdiction as the above-quoted excerpt might suggest. While the opinion terms the 1868 repealer act an "exception" to the Court's appellate jurisdiction, in fact the repealer merely withdrew a procedure for appealing to the Supreme Court under the 1867 Habeas Corpus Act enacted the preceding year. The repealer did not narrow the Supreme Court's subject matter jurisdiction—that is, it did not limit the kinds of claims that the Supreme Court could hear, assuming they came to it by an available route. The McCardle opinion made this very point:

"Counsel seems to have supposed, if effect be given to the repealing act in question, that the whole appellate power of the court, in cases of habeas corpus, is denied. But this is an error. The act of 1868 does not except from that jurisdiction any cases but appeals from Circuit Courts under the act of 1867. It does not affect the jurisdiction which was previously exercised."

The Supreme Court made the distinction even plainer later the same year in Ex parte Yerger. There, the Court considered another appeal by another anti-reconstructionist newspaper editor held in military custody under the Military Reconstruction Act. Like McCardle, Yerger was charged with impeding reconstruction. Like McCardle, he petitioned a circuit court for a writ of habeas corpus under the Habeas Corpus Act of 1867. The circuit court denied Yerger's petition, and Yerger sought review by the Supreme Court. But unlike McCardle, Yerger invoked the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction under the procedures provide by the Judiciary Act of 1789, not the repealed provision for direct appeals of the Habeas Corpus Act of 1867. The Supreme Court held, over objection by the Government, that it had appellate jurisdiction under the prior law to hear appeals in habeas corpus cases brought under the 1867 Act, and that this jurisdiction was not affected by the 1868 repealer act. Significantly, the Court intimated that any attempt through legislation to remove entirely the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction in habeas corpus cases would strike at one of the Court's essential constitutional functions and raise serious constitutional questions.

United States v. Klein, the second case to address directly Congress' authority to legislate exceptions to the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction, was decided three years after Ex parte McCardle. That opinion disposed of any remaining impression that the Exceptions Clause gave Congress plenary power to deprive the Supreme Court of appellate jurisdiction. A Civil War statute authorized suits in the Court of Claims to recover captured property by owners who were loyal to the Union or had been pardoned by the President. Klein had received a pardon that recited his previous disloyalty. Based upon his pardon, Klein brought an action in the Court of Claims and recovered judgment under the statute. While an appeal to the Supreme Court was pending, Congress passed a statute purporting to deprive the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court of jurisdiction in any case where a presidential pardon recited disloyalty and to direct that any such case be dismissed. The Supreme Court held that this was an attempt to prescribe a rule of decision in cases before the judiciary, violated the principle of separation of powers, and was not a permissible use of Congress' Article III powers over jurisdiction. The Court opined:

"It seems to us that this is not an exercise of the acknowledged power of Congress to make exceptions and prescribe regulations to the appellate power. . . .

"We must think that Congress has inadvertently passed the limit which separates the legislative from the judicial power.

"It is of vital importance that these powers be kept distinct."

The power claimed in the present bills to divest the Supreme Court of appellate jurisdiction to hear constitutional claims goes well beyond anything Congress has done in the exercise of its Article III powers at least since the turbulent Reconstruction era. Since the pending bills erode the Supreme Court's essential role in our constitutional system of government, they cannot be found to be within Congress' power under the Exceptions Clause of Article III in the absence of compelling authority. But that authority is not to be found in the history of Article III, judicial decisions under that Article, or the weight of scholarly authority concerning the Article's intent.

B. Lower Court Jurisdiction

The foregoing analysis shows that Congress' power to regulate the Supreme Court's jurisdiction under Article III does not give Congress power to withdraw the Supreme Court's jurisdiction to hear constitutional claims. The issue of Congress' power under Article III to divest the lower federal courts of jurisdiction to hear constitutional claims presents a closer question. However, taking into account other provisions of the Constitution and considerations of sound policy toward the judiciary, the case against the jurisdiction-stripping proposals as applied to the lower federal courts is no less compelling.

1. Article III

Congress' control over lower court jurisdiction derives not from the Exceptions Clause, but from its power under Article III, Section 1, to "ordain and establish" courts inferior to the Supreme Court. One early view, expressed by Justice Story, was that Article III required Congress to establish lower federal courts to exercise original jurisdiction in all cases within the constitutionally defined judicial power, other than those in which the Supreme Court had original jurisdiction. Under this view, Congress' discretion was limited to deciding where, what number, and what character of lower federal courts to establish, and how jurisdiction should be allocated among them.

The premise underlying this view—that the entire judicial power defined by Article III must be vested in the federal judiciary—has since been rejected. Indeed, Justice Story's position ignored the historical evidence that the Framers were divided as to the desirability of establishing any lower federal courts and intended to leave that decision to Congress.

The prevailing view has been that the Constitution gives Congress absolute discretion as to whether to establish any lower federal courts. From this it is said to follow that Congress has plenary control over the jurisdiction of such lower courts as it chooses to create. Some modern scholars have questioned the premise underlying this view, arguing that federal courts of original jurisdiction are now necessary to carry out the Constitution's plan for the federal judiciary. Professor Eisenberg argues that, because of the proliferation of federal law and federal court caseloads since the Framers' era, lower federal courts have become a constitutional necessity to administer federal justice; he argues that, if the federal courts were abolished and their cases turned over to the state courts, the burden of harmonizing conflicting interpretations of federal law by the 50 state court systems and vindicating federal rights would be more than the Supreme Court, exercising its appellate jurisdiction, could bear. Professors Redish and Woods argue that lower federal courts are constitutionally necessary to restrain unconstitutional acts by federal officials, since state courts are generally without power to award relief in such cases.

Whether or not it was constitutionally required to do so, the first Congress did establish a system of lower federal courts in the Judiciary Act of 1789, and Congress has since then consistently endowed those courts with a broad measure of the judicial power defined in Article III. The lower federal courts have long had original jurisdiction over diversity cases and cases arising under the Constitution and federal laws. Exercising that subject matter jurisdiction, the lower federal courts have been important instruments of judicial constitutional review, although their role in enforcing the Supremacy Clause vis-a-vis the states is not so central as that of the Supreme Court. Congress has never before enacted legislation to deprive the lower federal courts of jurisdiction to hear cases arising under the Constitution generally, nor on an issue-by-issue basis, as proposed in the pending bills.

The lower federal courts play a vital role as courts of first instance in which federal rights can be vindicated. In Mitchum v. Foster, the Supreme Court reaffirmed this role in tracing the history of 28 U.S.C. § 1983 to its origin in the Civil Rights Act of 1871. The Court noted that this provision "opened the federal courts to private citizens, offering a uniquely federal remedy against incursions under the claimed authority of state law upon rights secured by the Constitution and laws of the Nation." The Court continued:

"The very purpose of § 1983 was to interpose the federal courts between the States and the people, as guardians of the people's federal rights—to protect the people from unconstitutional action under color of state law, 'whether that action be executive, legislative, or judicial.' . . . And this Court long ago recognized that federal injunctive relief against a state court proceeding can in some circumstances be essential to prevent great, immediate, and irreparable loss of a person's constitutional rights. Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123; cf. Truax v. Raich, 239 U.S. 33; Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479."

For individuals seeking to enforce federal rights, the ability to bring suit in a federal forum rather than a state court is significant. As a leading study by the American Law Institute concluded, "federal courts are more likely to apply federal law sympathetically and understandingly than are state courts."

An important advantage of the lower federal courts over most state courts in protecting constitutional rights is the independence of federal judges from political influence, based upon their appointment for lifetime terms and their guarantee of undiminished compensation. Judge McGowan of the D.C. Circuit saw the lower federal courts' role in desegregating the public schools as a prime example of that advantage:

"[I]s it conceivable that the job could have been entrusted entirely to the state courts, bearing in mind the differences in loyalties and the vulnerability to local pressures inherent in an elective system of judges? The federal judges themselves have, even with the security provided them by the Constitution, found the going hard. It is not fanciful to think that it would have been too much for unsheltered state judges. . . . Certainly it would have been hard to ask them to risk such an exposure with so few shields."

Another important role of the lower federal courts is to develop a body of empirical evidence that the Supreme Court can later use in formulating constitutional doctrine. The Supreme Court will often permit a difficult issue to germinate among the lower courts before it accepts a case to resolve the issue. From that process of grappling with a thorny issue through several different cases in different courts, a more judicious final resolution may result—or, at least, the areas of uncertainty and disagreement may be crystallized. Then, when the Supreme Court announces doctrine, it often does so in broad terms, leaving to the lower federal courts the task of fashioning from that doctrine decisions in concrete cases. As Judge Craven of the Fourth Circuit explained, the Supreme Court

"quite sensibly is willing to take the time to allow the inferior courts to experiment with words, giving content and meaning to the doctrine which has been expounded. The truth is that the Court is wise enough to know that it does not know precisely what ought to be done and must be required. Like the rest of us, the Court learns from experience—the experience of the inferior federal courts. Trial balloons constantly soar aloft from the United States District Courts. Some are shot down in flames by the United States Circuit Courts of Appeals, while others are allowed to orbit indefinitely."

In sum, the lower federal courts have historically played a vital role in vindicating constitutional rights and in promoting national uniformity in the interpretation of the Constitution and the federal laws. The federal courts have successfully functioned side-by-side with the state courts. As a practical matter, the proposed limitations on the lower federal courts (even assuming that an avenue of review by the Supreme Court were left open) would so inundate the Supreme Court as the sole federal arbiter of such issues that the effectiveness of the federal judicial branch would be impaired. We see no compelling interest to justify this kind of radical tampering with the present judicial system and the form in which it has functioned for so many years. Indeed, given the lower federal courts' present-day role in that system, such tampering may now be unconstitutional, whatever Congress could have done in 1789.

2. Other constitutional provisions

Aside from the limitations inherent in Article III of the Constitution and the historic role of the judiciary in our system of government, other constitutional provisions and considerations should constrain Congress from enacting any of the pending bills. Whatever the scope of Congress' authority over federal court jurisdiction under Article III, Congress may not exercise that authority in a manner that contravenes any other provision of the Constitution. While Congress is acknowledged to have plenary power to regulate interstate commerce, for example, no one would suggest that Congress constitutionally could use that power to prohibit interstate transport of political pamphlets in violation of First Amendment guarantees, or to seize property moving in interstate commerce without due process of law in disregard of the Fifth Amendment. Congress' exercise of its authority over federal court jurisdiction, like the exercise of all of its other powers, is "entirely subject to all of the other provisions of the Constitution that constrain government power."

As the Supreme Court observed:

"[T]he Constitution is filled with provisions that grant Congress or the States specific power to legislate in certain areas; these granted powers are always subject to the limitation that they may not be exercised in a way that violates other specific provisions of the Constitution."

By the same token, Congress' authority over jurisdiction may not constitutionally be used to shield government actions from judicial constitutional review.

(a) The due process clause

The Fifth Amendment prohibits the Government from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Judicial constitutional review of government actions is an essential element of due process. While Congress has never before put the issue to the test by impairing federal court jurisdiction to exercise such review, several cases have intimated that a law eliminating any opportunity for federal judicial review in any class of cases would violate the Due Process Clause.

Hence, Congress' authority over federal court jurisdiction under Article III is limited by the requirements of the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause. And due process requires that there be a judicial remedy for someone claiming to be aggrieved by a government's violation of the Constitution.

Applying these due process principles, the Supreme Court disregarded a section of the Military Selective Service Act that purported to prohibit any judicial review of selective service classifications except in a criminal prosecution for violation of the Act and upheld a registrant's right to bring an action to enjoin an unlawful classification practice. And the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit refused to give effect to a provision of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act that purported to deprive the courts of jurisdiction to review certain administrative actions taken pursuant to it. Other cases have carefully scrutinized jurisdiction-limiting statutes according to these due process principles.

In light of these precedents, it is extremely doubtful that the bills withdrawing jurisdiction in draft and military classification cases would withstand constitutional scrutiny. The Due Process Clause would not tolerate subjecting a citizen to loss of liberty by being inducted into the military without an opportunity for some form of judicial review of the law ordering that loss of liberty. It is equally doubtful that Congress could constitutionally require the federal courts to enforce federal legislation—for example, by trying individuals for the crime of refusing induction into the military—but deny those courts jurisdiction, as two of the pending bills would do, to consider a challenge to the law's constitutionality by a person against whom enforcement is sought.

Another due process principle limiting Congress' power over judicial jurisdiction is the requirement that all persons receive equal treatment under the law. Statutes that would eliminate jurisdiction to hear narrow categories of constitutional claims violate this principle by invidiously discriminating against those who assert the particular claims thus singled out. All of the bills presently under consideration save one (H.R. 114) suffer this infirmity. They each single out narrow categories of constitutional claims for jurisdictional oblivion—those involving public prayer, abortion, school desegregation, and sex discrimination in the military.

Since closing off federal judicial redress to persons claiming violations of specific constitutional rights impinges upon fandamental liberties, such jurisdictional limitations should be subjected to strict scrutiny by the courts and can satisfy the equal protection component of the Due Process Clause only where they are "shown to be necessary to promote a compelling governmental interest." Yet it is doubtful that these jurisdictional limitations would satisfy even the lower standard applicable where fundamental rights are not involved: a statutory classification must bear a reasonable relationship to a permissible governmental purpose. No legitimate, let alone compelling, governmental interest is served by curtailing federal court jurisdiction to hear specified constitutional claims. No serious argument can be made that jurisdictional limitations are intended to promote judicial efficiency or any similar interest legitimately within Congress' purview under Article III. And a desire to alter some judicial interpretations of the Constitution with which a majority of the Congress may disagree is not a licit governmental purpose that will satisfy the constitutional standard.

(b) Specific constitutional rights

Statutes that would eliminate federal court jurisdiction to hear specified constitutional claims, as proposed in the present bills, may well be held to be impermissible abridgements of the constitutional rights underlying the claims as to which jurisdiction is denied. For example, the bills that would eliminate any federal judicial remedy against govenmental violations of the First Amendment through school prayer programs would themselves be an abridgement of the First Amendment rights.

It is established that, where the purpose and effect of a law is to obstruct judicial protection of constitutional rights, the law is unconstitutional unless it is necessitated by compelling and legitimate governmental interests. As shown above, no such showing of justification can be made for bills like those here considered. Indeed, the present bills appear to have no purpose other than limiting constitutional rights as those rights have been enforced by the courts.

In Faulkner v. Clifford, a district court invalidated a statutory provision that purported to deprive all federal courts of jurisdiction to review selective service classifications except in criminal prosecutions of registrants for violation of the Military Selective Service Act. There, a registrant was punitively classified 1-A for returning his registration card as a protest against the draft. The registrant commenced a civil action to challenge the punitive classification, arguing that his First Amendment right to protest the draft had been infringed. The Government moved to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction based on the statutory prohibition against judicial review. The court held that denying the registrant a judicial forum for his constitutional claim impermissibly chilled his exercise of First Amendment rights, and ruled the jurisdictional limitation to be unconstitutional as so applied.

(c) Structural provisions

As discussed above (Part II), depriving the federal judiciary of jurisdiction to hear constitutional claims threatens the basic structure of our government and particularly the principle of separation of powers. As Chief Justice Burger wrote in 1976,

"Long ago, this Court found the ordinary presumption of constitutionality inappropriate in measuring legislation directly impinging on the basic tripartite structure of our Government. . . .

"Our role in reviewing legislation which touches on the fundamental structure of our Government is therefore akin to that which obtains when reviewing legislation touching on other fundamental constitutional guarantees. Because separation of powers is the base framework of our governmental system and the means by which all our liberties depend, [the statute in question] can be upheld only if it is necessary to secure some overriding governmental objective, and if there is no reasonable alternative which will trench less heavily on separation-of-powers principles."

We have already discussed how jurisdictional limitations of the sort proposed would offend one important structural provision of the Constitution, the Supremacy Clause (Part IIB above). Such jurisdictional limitations, by seeking indirectly to alter authoritative judicial interpretations of the Constitution, may also be regarded as an impermissible attempt to circumvent the process of constitutional amendment.

We do not take issue with those who point out that, ultimately, legislative supremacy is at the heart of our democratic system. But the established constitutional mechanism for resolving a profound and lasting disagreement between the judicial branch and Congress, as the elected will of the people, as to the meaning of a constitutional provision, is amendment of the Constitution, not tampering with the jurisdiction of the courts. Under Article V, an amendment to the Constitution can be proposed by two-thirds of both houses of Congress or the application of legislatures of two-thirds of the states, and such amendment becomes effective when ratified by three-fourths of the states. The process of amending the Constitution was not intended to be a simple matter, but rather one that required great deliberation. Much more was required than the simple majority vote necessary for ordinary legislation.

The proposed jurisdictional limitations also implicate another important structural provision of the Constitution, the one governing impeachment. As noted above, the Framers intended impeachment to be the sole check on the judiciary. Impeachment was intended to be much harder to achieve than ordinary legislation. High crimes and misdemeanors must be proven, and a two-thirds vote by the Senate is required for conviction.

Were Congress able to act by simple majority upon every disagreement with the judiciary's constitutional interpretations by divesting the courts of jurisdiction, both of these carefully constructed safeguards—constitutional amendment and impeachment—requiring supermajority action by Congress and the people would be wholly avoided. Such a result would impair the tripartite balance of power in our constitutional system and would be inconsistent with the intentions of the draftsmen of the Constitution.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons here discussed, the Committee concludes that legislation to divest the federal courts of jurisdiction to hear constitutional claims, such as proposed in the pending bills, is probably unconstitutional and certainly unwise. The basic constitutional plan of separation of powers, and judicial constitutional review as an essential part of this plan, have served the nation well for two centuries. The plan should not be tampered with because some Supreme Court constitutional decisions are perceived to be out of step with public favor or even wrong.

We believe that, when faced with proposals to divest the federal courts of jurisdiction or to undermine their independence, Congress should be guided by the example of self-restraint exhibited by the 75th Congress when it rejected President Roosevelt's court-packing proposal. As the Senate Judiciary Committee put it in 1937:

"Shall we now, after 150 years of loyalty to the constitutional ideal of an untrammeled judiciary, duty bound to protect the constitutional rights of the humblest citizen even against the Government itself, create the vicious precedent which must necessarily undermine our system?

". . . Let us now set a salutary precedent that will never be violated. Let us, of the Seventy-fifth Congress, in words that will never be disregarded by any succeeding Congress, declare that we would rather have an independent Court, a fearless Court, a Court that will dare to announce its honest opinions in what it believes to be the defense of liberties of the people, than a Court that, out of fear or sense of obligation to the appointing power or factional passion, approves any measure we may enact. We are not the judges of the judges. We are not above the Constitution.

". . . Exhibiting this restraint, thus demonstrating our faith in the American system, we shall set an example that will protect the independent American Judiciary from attack as long as this Government stands."

Mr. WEICKER. I shall just read an excerpt, and this will be the conclusion of my remarks:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, we seem to get lumped in with a lot of other anticivil rights movements when we talk about this bill.

I quite agree with the Senator from Connecticut in what he says about the restoration of the tax exemption for segregated schools. I think that was all the bad things he says it was. I think many of these other things are. But let us not mix that up with busing.

Let us remember that busing, according to the latest NBC poll, is opposed in the black community as well as in the white community.

There was an interesting article by the distinguished black journalist, William Raspberry, not too long ago, September 4, 1981, in the Washington Post. He described what happened over in Prince Georges County. He says:

They drew up bus routes and pupil-assignment plans that, at least at the beginning, had the effect of ending official segregation.

A couple of things have happened since the plan was implemented in 1972. First, a large number of whites have left the public schools while a large number of black families have moved into the county, most of them in areas near the District of Columbia. Second, housing patterns in 1981 are not what they were in 1972. Whites have been moving farther out into the county, in many cases selling their homes to black newcomers.

He goes on to say that:

The school system that was 13 percent black a decade ago is some 40 percent black today. One result of all this is the busing patterns that enhanced integration when they were established now often involve the absurd phenomenon of black children traveling great distances from their neighborhood only to wind up in schools that are overwhelmingly black.

Mr. President, we could go on and on.

Listen to what the Urban League says in "The State of Black America In 1980." It says:

Many urban school desegregation decrees involve little more than the shifting of bodies from one location to another with little regard for the consequences and the effects on the quality of education and human relationships . . . increasing numbers of black parents, after years of seeing the burdens of desegregation placed disproportionately on black children, are questioning the benefits of desegregation. Many black parents, instead, argue for improving the quality of education their children receive wherever the children attend school.

Mr. President, we are not going to be able to improve that quality of education if wholesale numbers of white children, indeed black children, usually the more affluent, leave the system, and that is just what is happening. They are leaving the school system. In my hometown, they are either going across the river to Bossier Parish, or they go to a whole group of new private schools that they have started, and we can rant and rail how terrible it is and how we wish they would stay in the school system, but we cannot make them stay. It is still a free country.

When that happens—erosion of that public school system and its support is happening at an increasingly rapid rate—there is something we can do, and that is to pass this amendment. It will improve education. Indeed, it will be a more effective remedy to get our schools desegregated.

As Mr. Justice Powell stated "In the rush to try to accomplish one thing, that is desegregation, we have created another evil or," as he says, "out of a zeal to remedy one evil courts may encourage or set the stage for other evils.

"By attempting to get rid of one-race schools you may get one-race school systems," says Mr. Justice Powell.

We have the right, we have the power, indeed we have the mandate from the American public to act and to act now, Mr. President, and I urge my colleagues to act affirmatively on this amendment.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I am strongly opposed to forced school busing. I am voting against this amendment because I believe it is unconstitutional.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired.

Under the previous order, the Senate will now recess until——

Mr. WEICKER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has no time.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to suggest the absence of a quorum at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order of the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, it is my understanding that all time has expired under the previous order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

RECESS UNTIL 1:25 P.M.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess until 1:25 p.m.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 12:34 p.m., recessed until 1:25 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. GRASSLEY).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, it is my understanding that at 1:30 p.m. there will be a rollcall vote on the pending amendment.

Have the yeas and nays been ordered on that amendment yet?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. STEVENS. Immediately following the vote on that amendment, it is my further understanding that there will be a rollcall vote on the distinguished majority leader's motion to proceed with the consideration of Senate Resolution 20; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is not correct. That has not been ordered. The yeas and nays have not been ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. The yeas and nays have not been ordered but there is an order that there will be a vote immediately following the vote on the amendment to S. 951; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. STEVENS. As soon as there is a sufficient second I will ask for the yeas and nays and will alert the Members of the Senate that there will be a rollcall vote on the majority leader's motion to proceed with consideration of Senate Resolution 20.

Mr. President, I will ask that there be a quorum call and I intend to call it off at 1:30 p.m.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Under the previous order, the hour of 1:30 p.m. having arrived, the question is on agreeing to the amendment, as amended, of the Senator from North Carolina. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), and the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS), are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS) would vote "yea."

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS) is absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 58, nays 38, as follows:

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

TELEVISION AND RADIO COVERAGE OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, it is my understanding that we will now have a rollcall vote on the motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 20. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr President, before that rollcall commences, the distinguished majority leader is absent today. He is not feeling well. It is my intention, following the rollcall vote on this motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 20, to recess the Senate, unless there is some Senator who has pressing business he wishes to discuss following the rollcall vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 20. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, on this vote, I have a live pair with the distinguished Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER). If he were present and voting, he would vote "aye." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay." Therefore, I withhold my vote.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), and the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS), are necessarily absent.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, there has been a request for a period for routine morning business. I do ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for routine morning business for the next 15 minutes, during which Senators may speak for not to exceed 2 minutes each.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I wish to make some remarks that are going to take a little longer than 2 minutes. I can do it in this period or on the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. How long does the Senator wish, Mr. President?

Mr. CHILES. Ten minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. Under the circumstances, Mr. President, I amend that request and ask unanimous consent that there be a period for routine morning business to expire at 2:45 p.m., during which Senators may speak for not to exceed 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FIDEL CASTRO; A CONTINUING PROBLEM

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, in affairs of state as in human affairs, we tend with the passage of time to learn to live with a situation no matter how abhorrent and dangerous that situation may be. We can become complacent and even tolerant of the status quo. At times the American public and the American Government have seemed to fall into that trap with respect to the Castro dictatorship in Cuba.

It has been 23 years since Castro imposed his rule on Cuba. During that time, Castro, hand-in-glove with the Soviet Union, has worked consistently and with some success in steadfast opposition to the policies and efforts of the United States. The Castro government, overtly or covertly, has remained in the forefront of the world's troublemakers and has indeed caused a great deal of trouble. Not only has he enslaved the people of Cuba and wreaked economic ruin on that nation but the Castro regime has played a leading role around the world in fomenting armed conflict and terrorism.

Yet, because Castro and his activities have been going on for some time, it is all somehow old news. Some people are simply no longer interested in the fact of a lawless regime 90 miles from our shores. Others see Castro as merely an irritant; a thorn in our side not worthy of a great deal of consideration. Still others would even maintain that Castro has moderated over the years and that the United States should seek to normalize relations with Cuba.

These viewpoints are, at best, naive and fail to recognize the present reality of Cuba and the threat it represents.

It is important to remember that Cuba, while a relatively small nation, is a significant military power. Supplied and bankrolled by the Soviets, Cuba is well-armed and disposed to use those arms. Cuban armed forces are the largest in Latin America, except for Brazil, which has 12 times the population. Cuba has 225,000 people in the armed forces, plus several hundred thousand in paramilitary organizations. The Soviet Union's military transfers have given them mobility and the capacity to project armed forces beyond Cuba's shores. It has the potential to mount and sustain military operations throughout the Caribbean and the northern tip of Latin America. In short, Cuba represents a serious problem for the United States of growing magnitude.

I am convinced that Castro is not moderating or curtailing his violent, destructive actions in any way. Rather, the evidence becomes clearer and clearer that Castro is intensifying his efforts and enlarging his role as the stalking horse of the Soviet Union.

Mr. President, the disturbing and—I can think of no other word—evil nature of the Castro threat is vividly illustrated by new revelations indicating the active participation of the Cuban Government in organized drug-smuggling activities. The complete story is not yet known and I hope that the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigation will soon be undertaking an effort to bring the entire story to light. But enough is now known and confirmed to show that the Cuban Government itself is now in a partnership with the worst criminal element to facilitate the smuggling of illegal drugs into the United States.

This Nation has faced and continues to face an overwhelming crisis with respect to the flow of illicit narcotics into our country. These drugs poison our population and have spurred a resurgence of criminal activity so widescale it is difficult to fully comprehend. My State of Florida is experiencing a crime wave that threatens the social structure, the economy, and every individual who lives there. The key element in this surge of crime and corruption has been the drug trade with its billions in profits and ruthless violence.

I, and other Members of this body, have been searching for ways to combat the narcotics trade; looking for every resource of the Federal Government that might contribute to a more effective drug law enforcement effort. Now we come to find that another government, if one can use that term for the Castro regime, is aiding and abetting the drug traffickers. We find that Cuba has entered into a cynical bargain with the drug merchants.

The State Department has confirmed that Cuba is giving sanctuary to drug-smuggling ships for refueling and maintenance. It is allowing mother ships, laden with illegal drugs from Latin America, to operate within Cuban waters while unloading onto smaller vessels for drug runs into Florida. In return, the drug dealers are transporting Cuban arms and money to aid guerrilla operations.

We are faced with a situation that is nothing short of diabolical. In the thrust of one operation, Castro is able to strike viciously at U.S. society by aiding the drug traffickers to spread their poison and, in turn, use the smugglers to help arm and fund insurrection and terrorism. The sheer effrontery and total disregard for the dictates of international law would be shocking if it were not so consistent with the Castro pattern of behavior.

As profoundly disturbing as these revelations are, they merely build on the record of international crimes by this outlaw regime. For over 20 years, Castro has sought to promote violence and destabilize other nations. Cuba has been the armed surrogate and the agent of terrorism for the Soviet Union throughout the world.

Over the past several years, these activities have reached a new level of intensity. The investment of time, manpower, energy, and Soviet money is staggering. In the mid-1970's, Cuba turned to direct intervention in Africa. To this day, Cuba's military and political activities in Africa are major and range throughout the continent. Cuba still maintains large armed contingents in Angola and Ethiopia to do the Soviets' bidding.

The African adventures have been followed by a renewed and full-scale assault on the Caribbean and Central and Latin America. Since 1978, Cuba has embarked on a well-organized and well-financed campaign to incite violence and armed conflict throughout the region. It has supplied arms, training, and other forms of assistance to aid armed insurgencies in country after country. The State Department has documented the range and scope of Cuban involvement, not only in Nicaragua and El Salvador and Guatemala, but also in Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Colombia, and Chile. The extreme gravity of these activities and the potential consequences for U.S. policy are evident in Nicaragua, Grenada, and in the ongoing struggle in El Salvador. The Cuban interference is having a devastating impact.

All indications are that the impact will grow as the militarization of Cuba continues to escalate at an alarming rate; 1981 witnessed the largest volume of Soviet military deliveries to Cuba since 1962, twice that of 1980. This Tuesday, Secretary Haig indicated that Cuba recently received a second squadron of Soviet Mig-23 warplanes. Unclear is whether these are models that can carry nuclear weapons. Other reports disclose that Cuban airfields now operate as a base for Soviet TU-95 bombers, the primary Soviet heavy bomber, which has a nuclear capability.

Some reports have indicated, Mr. President, that the Bear is being used as a reconnaissance plane. We know that it is overflying our ships. We know that it is flying very close to our coastline. However, to say the Soviet bomber, the Bear, is a reconnaissance plane is to say that the B-52 would be primarily a reconnaissance plane.

These reports raise disturbing questions about the potential use of these armaments and aircraft. Clearly at issue is whether Cuba is building an offensive capability in violation of the United States-Soviet agreement following the Cuban missile crisis. It appears to me that the agreements are being violated. Do not the Mig-23's and the Soviet Bears constitute violations? The Senate must be informed as to the complete contents of the 1962 agreements and whether violations are occurring.

Mr. President, in addition to the prohibition against having weapons that have an offensive capability, that being a part of the 1962 agreements after the missile crisis, there was another provision that was widely discussed. It was that Cuba would not be used to foment revolution and armed conflicts in other countries. Nothing could be further from a breach than what Cuba has been doing in regard to insurgent actitivies, the fomenting of revolution, the furnishing of arms and supplies, and the training of terrorists.

Mr. President, Cuba's reckless and provacative behavior, which appears to know no limit, mandates that the Cuba problem be brought to the forefront of our foreign policy agenda. Its illegal activities cannot be allowed to continue unchecked. As past experience dictates, there are no easy answers with Cuba. For over 20 years, we have struggled with this dilemma and the administration faces an extremely difficult challenge. But past experience also shows that only a position of strength and firmness of purposes will work to curtail Cuba. Somehow, we must make Cuba understand that we will extract a heavy price if it continues on its present course. Cuba must understand that we will not tolerate its participation in criminal activitiy directed at our very social fabric. I am glad the administration is sounding the alarm about Cuba. I hope we will see realistic and effective action to back up those words of alarm.

Mr. President, another thing that must be noted is the situation with the refugees who were sent out from Mariel. We know some were criminals. Some were mentally ill and some were emptied out of institutions. Others were simply poor people, people who were unemployed.

But we also know that some of them were provocative agents; and as they have come to our country, they have been trying to stir up discord. They have been trying to foment strife in our country.

This is one more evidence of what Castro has been trying to do and what he continues to do and this is something that we cannot tolerate any longer.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will my knowledgeable colleague from Florida yield?

Mr. CHILES. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I wish more Senators were present. I am in no wise critical of the absence of Senators from this Chamber. They are at work elsewhere. The Senator who has been speaking, and the Senator from West Virginia who is now commending his colleague, for what he has spoken understand that. I hope and believe that the Members of the Senate will give not only a careful reading, but also a factual understanding, of the reality of the words that our colleague has addressed not only to the Members of Congress, but also to the people of the United States of America.

I have known of the Senator's commitment in this critical problem for a long period of time. I have recognized his efforts in bringing to the attention of his constituents within the State of Florida and to men and women in other States, of the appalling situation which we continue to tolerate, if that is the word, in reference to Cuba in relationship to the United States of America.

I well remember that day when Castro came into this Chamber and was in the Capitol of the United States and, with wide-spreading hands, he declared: "We come as your friends. We are your friends."

Twenty years come and go, and that promised friendship between the Cuban regime of Castro and the Soviets who work with him, has never been exhibited insofar as I know even in one iota. The conditions worsen. There is a tragic relationship that is festering between Cuba as it relates to the United States of America and the well-being not only of our own people but freedom-loving people throughout the world.

I hope that through the media, the Senator's words will be carried to the public, to men and women who are not only intensely interested in the validity of the truth that the Senator speaks, but of the need now to have affirmative action programs of many types to cause Castro if possible, and those who join with him, to realize that we no longer will take a passive position in reference to these violations. We will stand together. We will move together. We will do what is necessary for the United States of America, the well being of our own people and the free world.

Mr. CHILES. I thank the distinguished Senator from West Virginia for his kind remarks and also for the cogent observations that he had made.

I well remember that he has been one that has been following this situation over a number of years and has attempted to raise his voice many times to warn this country and to warn the Senate of the potential dangers.

I also wish not to let this opportunity to go by without saying that the Senator from West Virginia has also been tremendously sympathetic to the problems that have been visited on my State by the refugees who have fled from Cuba seeking freedom. Florida is the closest point to their homeland. It has a similar climate. It also became an area where they can find a cultural heritage and family connections. And, of course, they have worked very hard in my State and in the main have assimilated themselves very well.

Up until the Mariel boatlift we were reducing the number of refugees added. The Senator from West Virginia has always been helpful and understanding of the problems of my State. The problems are not of our making. We did not develop the policy. It was the national policy or absence of national policy that caused this to come about. Yet continually Florida and the local government of south Florida have had to carry a very severe burden in trying to help these people get their feet on the ground, and then after the Mariel boatlift it has all started over again.

One of the great difficulties that the Senator from Florida and the whole delegation from Florida have is that every day further away from the Mariel experience the tendency is to say: "Well that is your problem down there. You all handle it."

But the Senator from West Virginia has always recognized that it was a national problem and he has been very sympathetic in that regard. I thank him for it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONFERENCE ON ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, this past weekend there was a conference on the administration of justice in Williamsburg, Va., attended by the Committee on the Judiciary of the U.S. Senate, the Committee on the Judiciary of the U.S. House of Representatives, and the Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court at which time a number of useful subjects were discussed.

One of the highlights of the conference in my opinion was the speech made by the president of the Pennsylvania Bar Association, Robert M. Landis who, coincidentally, was my partner when I was in the practice of law with Dechert Price & Rhoads in Philadelphia. Mr. Landis made a speech on a subject which is especially timely today and that involves the effort to limit the jurisdiction of the Federal courts on a variety of issues including busing, a subject upon which this body voted a few moments ago.

At this time I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the remarks of Mr. Landis.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF ROBERT M. LANDIS

The 97th Congress now has before it more than thirty bills designed to curtail the jurisdiction and remedial powers of the federal courts in federal constitutional cases. The bills focus on substantive issues that are politically sensitive: prayer in public buildings; methods of achieving school desegregation; abortion; and sex discrimination in the armed forces. Their purpose, as their sponsors bluntly proclaim, is to "be a healthful corrective to further excesses by the Supreme Court," to teach the Court "a salutary lesson so that future excursions by the Court beyond its proper bounds would be avoided."

All of the bills would place restrictions on the lower federal courts; most would affect the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court; some would completely remove federal court jurisdiction over particular subjects; and some of the bills dealing only with remedy are so broad they would effectively preclude all federal court review of the substantive areas involved.

This array of legislation, generated, as Senator Hatch claims, by "substantial constituencies" who oppose particular constitutional rulings is a nearly unprecedented attempt to circumvent the constitutional safeguards provided by the amendment procedures. Those procedures, with the participation of state legislatures, and subject to requirements of concurrence by extraordinary majorities, would be bypassed through ordinary statutes purporting to limit federal court jurisdiction enacted by a mere majority of the House and Senate.

This is an alarming challenge: to the fundamental principle of separation of powers; to the application of the supremacy clause; and to the precious historical tradition in the United States of elaborating and enforcing constitutional provisions through an independent judiciary, a practice sanctioned since Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803). This legislative incursion of the federal judiciary may be the gravest threat to its independence and to the principle of separation of powers since the court packing plan in 1937.

On this venerated 100th anniversary, listen to the overtones of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's court-packing Fireside chat:

"I am in favor of action through legislation:

"First, because I believe that it can be passed at this session of the Congress.

"Second, because it will provide a reinvigorated . . . Judiciary necessary to furnish quicker and cheaper justice from bottom to top.

"Third, because it will provide a series of Federal Courts willing to enforce the Constitution as written, and unwilling to assert legislative powers by writing into it their own political . . . policies.

". . . The balance of power between the three great branches of the Federal Government, has been tipped out of balance by the Courts in direct contradiction of the high purposes of the framers of the Constitution. It is my purpose to restore that balance."

These words were spoken on March 9, 1937. They will surely echo in the Senate Chamber next Tuesday in the executive session of the Judiciary Committee.

This is not a time for scholarly debate. The peril of abstract debate on questions of constitutional power is that it leads nowhere. We heard the parade of constitutional scholars last summer in the Senate hearings. Some of them upheld Professor Hart's famous structural hypothesis of the essential role of the Supreme Court in the constitutional plan; others questioned its historical assumptions. Some of them, like my friend, Professor Charles Rice, advocated facile experimentation with statutory jurisdictional withdrawal; others found this abhorrent. Some of them thought Congress can do almost anything it wants to the jurisdiction of the lower federal courts or even to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court; others found such power bound by external and internal limits of the Constitution.

If there was any consensus at all, it was on these two points: that so long as federal courts have federal question jurisdiction, they always have the power to decide the constitutionality of any congressional jurisdiction limitation; and that the senators and representatives were treading on treacherous grounds of social policy as they ventured over this constitutional terrain.

It is time now to look hard at the principles that are at risk in this elemental struggle.

The policy reasons for resisting this legislation are compelling: First, the proposals seek to circumvent the established amendment procedures with their extraordinary safeguards for changing the provisions of the Constitution. Second, the premise of the legislation is pernicious, that state courts and state judges will be less hospitable to existing constitutional precedent and more likely to respond to popular notions of constitutional rights because they are more accountable to citizens who elect them. Third, transient and vagrant interpretations of constitutional law would spread among the fifty states without the unifying values of one Supreme Court exercising the traditional powers under Article III, undergirded by the Supremacy clause of Article VI. Fourth, and most alarming, once let loose upon unpopular interpretations of constitutional rights, this process of jurisdictional gerrymandering may not be contained.

It was this portent that prompted Fred W. Friendly in Chicago last week to sound an alarm of the peril to the press in these words: "The public and the media," he said, "must be made aware that once the floodgates are opened, all of our liberties and rights can be placed in jeopardy. Pressure will grow to withdraw jurisdiction every time a lobby group receives what it perceives to be an adverse ruling [from the federal courts]. For the media, this means that the First Amendment is also subject to congressional mutation."

Friendly sketched a plausible scenario, tracking the history of Near v. Minnesota, in which a state enacts a Public Nuisance Law, decreeing that a newspaper or broadcaster which twice suffers a final judgment for libel, published with knowledge or with reckless disregard that it was false, is guilty of a public nuisance and may be enjoined from publication within the state. A newspaper loses two cases in the statutory period and is enjoined. The appellate courts of the state uphold the injunction, declaring the Public Nuisance Law constitutional. The United States Supreme Court grants certiorari and strikes down the state Public Nuisance Law as unconstitutional, as it did in the historic Near case.

The majority whip of the Senate, who cames from that state and voted for judicial preclusion statutes like these, introduces a bill "to teach the court a lesson," a bill which delcares that neither the Supreme Court nor any other federal court shall have jurisdiction over any such case. The bill passes; the state re-enacts the Public Nuisance Law; the newspaper is enjoined from publication and the newspaper carries the case to the Supreme Court.

In a landmark decision the Supreme Court holds that the act precluding the high court from jurisdiction is unconstitutional. Friendly foresees such a constitutional crisis as "a national tragedy of the most radical implications . . . a constitutional gridlock," as he calls it.

If this scenario sounds fanciful, who could have foreseen the deluge of legislation poured into the Congress last year with these draconian measures to carve up to jurisdiction of the federal courts?

But if it is said that all Congress is doing here is legislating on remedies, not jurisdiction, let us look more closely at what some of this remedial legislation really does.

The beguiling notion inherent in Congressional freedom of choice in fashioning remedies for violations of federal law has its own constitutional infirmities. The right to a judicial hearing in a school desegregation case is meaningless unless the court is empowered to grant reasonably effective relief. Denying to the federal judiciary all reasonably effective remedies is as fatal to litigant in vindicating his constitutional rights as is denying the litigant a judicial forum at all.

While the present proposals might leave state courts nominally free to fashion relief for constitutional wrongs, any defendant in a state court action can thwart the state court remedy by removal to the federal court. Armed with the power of removal, defendants will expliot the federal judicial impotence. This is what happened to the Norris-LaGuardia Act's ban on federal antistrike injunctions and promoted the Supreme Court to shut off that route to evasion. When the Congress fatally inhibits the federal court's power to grant a crucial remedy, it denies that remedy effectively.

Beyond this, the selective deprivation of effective remedies, as in school desegregation cases, or public prayer cases or abortion cases, besides creating a political climate hostile to those constitutional rights, runs athwart of the constitutional objection that Congress cannot proclaim outcome determination: giving the federal courts jurisdiction to adjudicate cases while directing them to reach a particular result. That is what United States v. Klein, was all about. "What is this," said the Supreme Court of the law it held unconstitutional in that case, "but to prescribe a rule for the decisions of a cause in a particular way?

This is not an issue that should divide conservatives and liberals or Democrats and Republicans. It should not divide those who support or disagree with one or another constitutional decision of the Supreme Court. The issue at stake is our fundamental constitutional plan, the basic allocation of powers in our political system.

From its earliest decisions the Supreme Court has explicitly recognized that its indispensable function under the Constitution is to resolve conflicting interpretations of federal law and legislative power under the Constitution and to maintain the supremacy of that law when it conflicts with state law or is challenged by state authority.

Tampering with this fundamental responsibility as a political expedient to satisfy popular opposition to Supreme Court decisions is a treacherous legislative experiment. It challenges the spirit of the Constitution. Its legitimacy is suspect. Its invitation to vagrant, disparate constitutional interpretations among the high courts of the fifty states could fragment the integrity of the Constitution that has bound this nation for nearly two hundred years into a coherent legal establishment.

Responsible lawyers and concerned citizens should not stand silent while Congress fashions constitutional rights and remedies in the transient image of what an imagined popular majority would like them to be or reduces the Constitution to what those in power would like it to mean.

I am presenting to this seminar today the formal statement of position of the American College of Trial Lawyers declaring its opposition to this legislation. Hardly a band of hot-eyed zealots, these leading trial lawyers of the country have expressed the concerns of responsible lawyers and citizens everywhere when we said:

"Curtailment of federal judicial authority in federal cases would undermine the consistency, predictability, and supremacy of federal constitutional law. . .

"The doors of the federal courts must remain open to litigants whose claims arise out of the federal Constitution. . . The issue at stake is our fundamental constitutional plan, the basic allocation of powers in our political system. Preservation of the independence of the federal judiciary is essential to the principle of separation of executive, legislative and judicial powers."

Congressional forbearance in the past, supported by a Department of Justice with allegiance to the established processes of the federal judicial system, has avoided a constitutional confrontation between the federal courts and the Congress over legislative efforts to gut the capacity of the Supreme Court and the lower federal courts to preserve the unity and supremacy of federal law.

Let us here work together to accomplish such forbearance.

If there is one thing worse than being wise after the event, it is being courageous after the danger is past.

Mr. SPECTER. There was at the same time presented at the conference the statement of the American College of Trial Lawyers on pending legislation affecting the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States and the lower Federal courts. I similarly ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD this material.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE AMERICAN COLLEGE OF TRIAL LAWYERS

The 97th Congress now has before it more than thirty bills designed to curtail the jurisdiction and remedial powers of the federal courts in federal constitutional cases. The bills focus on substantive issues that are politically sensitive: prayer in public buildings; methods of achieving school desegregation; abortion; and sex discrimination in the armed forces. Their purpose, as their sponsors acknowledge, is to "be a healthful corrective to further excesses by the Supreme Court," to teach the Court "a salutary lesson so that future excursions by the Court beyond its proper bounds would be avoided."

All of the bills would place restrictions on the lower federal courts; most would affect the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court; some would completely remove federal court jurisdiction over particular subjects; and some of the bills dealing only with remedy are so broad they would effectively preclude all federal court review of the substantive areas involved.

The bills attempting to limit federal court rulings on questions of prayer in public schools and public buildings generally provide that neither the Supreme Court nor the District Courts would have jurisdiction to hear any case arising out of a state law or regulation relating to voluntary prayer in public schools or buildings. They would simply withdraw jurisdiction of this subject matter from the lower federal courts and the Supreme Court.

The bills relating to school desegregation generally seek to limit remedies available to the federal courts rather than to remove them from the courts' jurisdiction entirely. Although dealing with remedy, some of them have such broad prohibitions that they are essentially denials of the courts' jurisdiction.

The abortion bills are largely like the school desegregation bills, purporting to limit remedies rather than jurisdiction, although one of them withdraws jurisdiction from both the Supreme Court and the District Courts over any case arising out of a state law relating to abortion. Some abortion bills invoke the power given to Congress by the Fourteenth Amendment to prevent deprivation of life without due process of law: they purport to redefine when human life exists, declaring that it begins at conception.

Although the various bills do not present identical constitutional and policy problems, they share a common purpose. All attempt, by ordinary legislation, to control or influence the substantive interpretation of Federal constitutional provisions. The consequences are clear and disturbing. The bills would permit constitutional changes without following the amendment procedures detailed in the Constitution. They would fundamentally alter the checks and balances in the 178-year-old American doctrine of judicial review. And they would have far reaching and disruptive effects on the American political system.

Article V of the Constitution embodies what may well be the most distinctive aspect of the American political system. It reflects the Framers' view that ordinary legislation should never be used to change the substance of the Constitution. It permits Congress to initiate constitutional changes only by two-thirds votes of both Houses, and even then requires ratification by three-fourths of the States. This process is deliberately intended to take substantive interpretation of the Constitution beyond the reach of a mere legislative enactment—to protect against transitory simple-majority excesses. A great strength of the American political system, in comparison with the parliamentary democracies of Europe, has been precisely in the gradual and deliberative character of constitutional changes.

It is the function of the federal courts "to decide on the [federal] rights of individuals," and "It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is". Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch (5 U.S.) 137 (1803). That is nowhere more true than with respect to the Constitution. The federal judiciary is the "living voice of the Constitution."[1] Once a federal court has interpreted the Constitution in a particular case, the rights and duties declared may thereafter be altered only if the decision is judicially overruled or by a pertinent constitutional amendment.

The bills in question would establish as a governing principle of our political system that the final word on constitutional interpretation is the word of a bare majority of Congress. If that principle were to prevail, the judiciary would have no ultimate role in constitutional interpretation and thus no check on the other branches of government. That is not what the Framers intended.

Curtailment of federal judicial authority in federal cases would undermine the consistency, predictability and supremacy of federal constitutional law. Leaving the matter to the state courts for final decision can only lead to national chaos. There are few easy cases in constitutional interpretation, and perhaps even fewer that can be decided unanimously. Inevitably diverging interpretations of federal constitutional rights by fifty different jurisdictions would threaten the integrity of the Constitution itself. If there are to be different classes of constitutional rights and a corresponding division of authority between federal and state courts, those differences are matters of constitutional interpretation that should be declared by constitutional amendment.

The doors of the federal courts must remain open to litigants whose claims arise out of the federal Constitution. This issue should not divide conservatives and liberals or Democrats and Republicans. Nor should it divide those who support or disagree with one or another constitutional decision of the Supreme Court. The issue at stake is our fundamental constitutional plan, the basic allocation of powers in our political system. Preservation of the independence of the federal judiciary is essential to the principle of separation of executive, legislative and judicial powers.

Accordingly, the American College of Trial Lawyers declares its opposition to legislative curtailment of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States and the lower federal courts for the purpose of effecting changes in constitutional law.

President, American College of Trial Lawyers.

Mr. SPECTER. The conference also received a resolution relating to proposed legislation to restrict the jurisdiction of the Federal courts which was passed by the Conference of Chief Justices which were assembled coincidentally at the same time in Williamsburg. I understand a copy of that resolution has already been inserted in the RECORD by the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN).

I thank the Chair.

I yield the floor and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

VETERANS BURIAL BENEFITS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues, Senators CRANSTON, DECONCINI, MATSUNAGA, and RANDOLPH in cosponsoring S. 2048, a bill to store the $300 burial benefit to destitute wartime veterans.

Last year the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee, of which I am a member, worked diligently to report savings of $110 million in the Veterans' Administration budget for fiscal year 1982. In deciding where to recommend savings, the committee placed a high priority on maintaining benefits for living veterans with service-connected disabilities.

As such, one of the recommendations the committee made was to save $75 million by eliminating the $300 burial benefit for those wartime veterans not in need. Prior to this time, any wartime veteran, regardless of need, was eligible to receive the benefit. To insure that indigent veterans remained eligible, the committee recommended, and the Senate approved, a provision requiring the VA to conduct an "income-eligible" test in determining eligibility. Under this test, a wartime veteran who was either in receipt of, or eligible to be in receipt of, a VA pension would still be eligible to receive the burial benefit.

This provision was dropped in conference with the House, however, when it became apparent that the administrative costs involved in determining the income eligibility of each veteran on a case-by-case basis would far exceed the total amount of benefits paid. As a result, current law limits the burial benefit to those wartime veterans who, at the time of death, were in receipt of either VA service-connected disability compensation or a VA pension.

Since this provision went into effect on September 30, 1981, there have been numerous reports of indigent wartime veterans not being able to receive a proper funeral, simply because they were not in receipt of a VA pension when they passed away. Clearly, this was not the intent of either the committee or the Senate when it passed the Omnibus Reconciliation Act last summer.

Mr. President, we can never fully repay those wartime veterans who risked their lives to defend the ideals of this great country. I believe, the very least we can do, is insure that these veterans receive a decent burial.

This bill would insure that indigent veterans receive a proper burial and would avoid the problem of the "income-eligible" test mentioned earlier by providing that a wartime veteran be deemed to be in receipt of a VA pension at the time of death provided that: no next of kin claims the body; a State or political subdivision assumes responsibility for the burial of the veteran; and, sufficient funds do not exist, other than from the State, to cover the cost of the burial. In such cases, the lesser of $300 or the actual expense incurred will be paid to the State or political subdivision which assumed responsibility. In addition, the bill would be retroactive to September 30, 1981.

Although no comprehensive cost estimates have been developed, S. 2048 would address this problem for substantially less than the $75 million needed to completely restore the benefit.

Mr. President, I believe this bill would address a gross injustice in a fair and equitable manner—and at a minimum cost. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this important bill and to work to insure its swift passage.

JOB SERVICES

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, one of the harshest, and most unwise, of the recent budget cuts was the crippling blow dealt by the December continuing resolution to Job Services offices nationwide. At a time when more than 9 million Americans are unemployed—and millions more are so discouraged that they are no longer seeking work—the forced closures of 1,000 Job Services offices nationwide is unconscionable.

The primary function of Job Services offices is job placement. Cutbacks impact on both job applicants and employers. In Maine more than 50 of the State's largest employers use Job Services as their exclusive recruiting agent. Many smaller businesses that cannot afford extensive personnel departments rely heavily on Job Services to find qualified employees. Maine Job Services placed 24,000 job applicants in productive employment last year.

Of these 24,000 many were receiving unemployment benefits. Placing these individuals in jobs reduced the cost of unemployment insurance far in excess of the operational cost of Job Services. Is the layoff of 64 more Maine Job Services employees cost-efficient government? Of course not. People put back to work are not only not drawing unemployment insurance but they are paying income tax dollars back to the Government.

And what about job seekers in our rural areas? Many of the 14 Job Services offices that may be forced to close in Maine are located in our rural areas where unemployment is often the highest. Job seekers in these areas will be even more hard pressed to find productive employment if we allow these closings to occur.

Revenues coming into the Federal Treasury decline as unemployment rises. President Reagan has explained his record budget deficits by noting that a 1-percent increase in unemployment puts the Government $25 billion further in the red. As we face record deficits, can we really afford to abandon one of the few methods we have to put people back to work?

Apparently, President Reagan thought so. His proposed funding level, contained in the December 15 continuing resolution, cut $264 million from the administrative expense account for both employment and unemployment insurance activities. Eighty percent of that cut—$210 million—was earmarked for employment services. During the debate on the continuing resolution assurances were given that layoffs would not result from these reduced spending levels. The administration promised a supplemental budget request if their calculations proved incorrect and layoffs became necessary.

And what happened? The funding level for Job Services proved woefully inadequate. Job Services employees were laid off and Job Services offices were closed all across the Nation. The administration sat idly by.

Mr. President, it is imperative that we restore that $210 million immediately. We must remove the dark cloud from over the head of the dedicated Job Services employees whose jobs are threatened. We must offer the unemployed our assistance in getting them back to work. We must assist the beleaguered small businessman, struggling to survive in a hostile economy, in finding qualified employees to fill his open positions.

I was prepared to offer an amendment to the first suitable appropriations bill to restore funding for Job Services. It now appears that House Joint Resolution 391 will accomplish my objectives. This funding measure is now before the House Appropriations Committee with belated administration support.

I urge the leadership to insure prompt consideration of this bill and I implore my colleagues to offer their full support in its passage.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

TENTH ANNUAL REPORT ON THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE FEDERAL RAILROAD SAFETY ACT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 108

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith the Tenth Annual Report on the Administration of the Federal Railroad Safety Act of 1970 (45 U.S.C. 421 et seq.) as required by that Act. This report was prepared in accordance with Section 211 of the Act and covers calendar year 1980, preceding my term of office.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 4, 1982.

BILL HELD AT DESK—H.R. 5379

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H.R. 5379) to amend Public Law 97-76 to extend the period during which authorities provided under the Department of Justice Appropriation Authorization Act, fiscal year 1980, are continued in effect, be held at the desk pending further disposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE AND OTHER COMMUNICATIONS

The following communications were laid before the Senate, together with accompanying papers, reports, and documents, which were referred as indicated:

EC-2584. A communication from the Acting Assistant Secretary of the Army (Manpower and Reserve Affairs), transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend title 10, United States Code, to authorize ordering reserve commissioned officers of the Army on active duty (other than for training) to serve on active duty in a grade to which promoted; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-2585. A communication from the Assistant Secretary of the Army (Installations, Logistics, and Financial Management), transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on a study with respect to converting the office equipment repair activity at Fort Richardson, Alaska, and the decision that performance under contract is the most cost-effective method of accomplishment; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-2586. A communication from the Acting Assistant Secretary of the Army (Manpower and Reserve Affairs), transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend title 10, United States Code to revise and standardize the provisions of law relating to the authority of the Secretaries of the Military Departments to order certain retired and other similarly situated members of the Armed Forces to active duty; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-2587. A communication from the Assistant Secretary of the Army (Installations, Logistics, and Financial Management), transmitting, pursuant to law, a report with respect to converting the guard services function at Fort Greely, Alaska, and the decision that performance under contract is the most cost-effective method of accomplishment; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-2588. A communication from the Assistant Secretary of the Army (Installations, Logistics, and Financial Management), transmitting, pursuant to law, a report with respect to converting the refuse collection and disposal function at Fort Bragg, N.C., and the decision that performance under contract is the most cost-effective method of accomplishment; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-2589. A communication from the Assistant Secretary of the Army (Installations, Logistics, and Financial Management), transmitting, pursuant to law, a report with respect to converting the furniture repair activity at Fort Bragg, North Carolina, and the decision that performance under contract is the most cost-effective method of accomplishment; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-2590. A communication from the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense (Facilities, Environment, and Economic Adjustment), transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on eight construction projects to be undertaken by the Army Reserve; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-2591. S. 2063. A bill to amend the Naval Petroleum Reserves Production Act of 1976 to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to permit local entities to extract and use coal from lands within the National Petroleum Reserve in Alaska for heat and generation of electricity; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

NORTH SLOPE COAL

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation to grant to the Secretary of the Interior the authority to permit local governmental entities on the North Slope of Alaska to extract coal from the National Petroleum Reserve in Alaska ("NPR-A") to use as a fuel within the North Slope area for heating or for the generation of electricity.

The cost of transporting refined petroleum products by airplane and by barge to the remote villages in the North Slope area is extremely expensive. In the village of Wainwright, for example, fuel oil sells for $2.06 per gallon and gasoline is selling for $2.60 per gallon.

The North Slope Borough is currently assessing the feasibility of using local deposits of coal for space heating and for the generation of electricity in some of the villages on the North Slope. The economics of operating a small-scale, coal-fired project in a Native village will make it necessary to obtain the coal at the cost of mining and transporting the coal to the site of use.

The Department of the Interior has in the past interpreted its responsibilities to Alaska Natives living in and near the NPR-A to include granting the right to extract coal from the NPR-A in quantities sufficient for single-household use. The Department believes, however, that it does not have authority to permit an Alaska Native village to extract sufficient quantities of coal from the NPR-A to fill the heating needs of the village or fuel an electrical generation station. I am attaching to my statement a copy of a letter which sets forth the position of the Interior Department.

If the fuel needs of the Natives for heating and electric generation could be supplied by coal rather than oil, the economic burden now being borne by the Native villagers could be significantly lessened. In addition, use by the villages of coal rather than oil would be a contribution toward reduction of the country's dependence on foreign oil.

The measure I am introducing today would amend section 102 of the Naval Petroleum Reserves Production Act of 1976 to grant to the Secretary of the Interior clear authority to issue whatever permits, licenses, leases, easements, or rights-of-way are needed to permit the extraction of coal from lands within the NPR-A for local use. The authority would permit coal to be taken by the North Slope Borough, any other local governmental entity, or any Native organization within the North Slope Borough, without the payment of any royalty. The purposes for which the coal could be utilized would be limited: to provide fuel for heating or for the generation of electric power within the North Slope Borough.

The NPR-A was created in 1923 as a source of oil for the ships of the Navy in time of war. Jurisdiction over the reserve was transferred to the Department of the Interior in 1977 by the Naval Petroleum Reserves Production Act of 1976—Public Law 94-258. The known reserves of coal within the NPR-A are very significant, and the speculative reserves are estimated to equal a significant portion of the entire Earth's reserves. Identified coal reserves within NPR-A are estimated to be 44 billion tons, while total reserves are probably several times this figure.

The feasibility study prepared for the North Slope Borough estimates a requirement of approximately 3,000 tons per year for this project. At present, however, and for the immediately foreseeable future, there is not a commercial market for the coal which could be mined within the NPR-A. The primary reason for this is the lack of a transportation system which could economically move commercial quantities of coal from the North Slope to potential export markets.

The North Slope Borough had a feasibility study prepared to examine the feasibility of constructing a coal-fired generating plant for the village of Wainwright. The recommended site for coal development is only one-half mile from the village of Wainwright. The coal at this site is approximately 6 feet thick, comprised of subbituminous and lignite coal with an approximate Btu content of 12,000 Btu's per pound, a sulphur content of approximately 0.4 percent, and an ash content of between 10 and 12 percent.

As required by the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977, the National Academy of Sciences completed an in-depth study of surface mining conditions in Alaska in the fall of last year. This study concluded that only small-scale operations should be allowed on the North Slope until more is known about the effect of mining on the fragile Arctic environment, but recognized that mines of a limited size might not be economical. The bill I am introducing today would permit the development of small-scale mines, as recommended by the National Academy of Sciences. The development of limited-size mines would serve the dual purposes of providing the residents of the North Slope with energy from a local resource and providing a site, as recommended by the National Academy, for the testing and developing of mining and reclamation techniques which can be used on the North Slope.

The Congress, as well as the executive branch, have approved numerous actions over the last several years so that the energy resources of Alaska could more expeditiously be explored and developed in order to contribute to the energy needs of the rest of the country. However, none of those developmental activities has or will serve to assist the Native people of Alaska in reducing their dependence on expensive petroleum products. The energy resources of Alaska which are being tapped are being transported to the lower 48 States for the heating of homes and fueling of the Nation's industry. While use of those resources in the rest of the country is desirable and beneficial, it seems that it would be a small step to make available to the Alaska Natives an energy source which exists, literally, in their backyard and which is present in far greater quantities than will ever be commercially developed.

I am hopeful this bill will receive rapid consideration so that planning for the village generating stations can proceed expeditiously and the isolated citizens of the North Slope of Alaska can thus begin to recognize a measure of energy independence.●

By Mr. MATHIAS:

S. 2064. A bill to amend title 5, United States Code, to provide that retired administrative law judges may be reappointed under regulations prescribed by the Office of Personnel Management; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

REEMPLOYMENT OF RETIRED ADMINISTRATIVE LAW JUDGES

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which would amend the statute governing reemployment of retired Federal employees to permit temporary reemployment of retired administrative law judges in certain situations.

Under present law, as found at section 3323(b) of title 5, United States Code, a reemployed annuitant serves at the will of the appointing officer or agency. Believing such service to be inconsistent with the intent of Congress in enacting the administrative law judge provisions of the Administrative Procedures Act, the Office of Personnel Management, and previously the Civil Service Commission, have barred reemployment of administrative law judges. This determination applies to reemployment even on an occasional or temporary basis, except in strictly limited or emergency situations such as the need for a retiring judge to complete cases assigned to him before retirement. The Office of Personnel Management's position is based on the clear intent of Congress to maintain the independence of administrative law judges from the administrative management of their employing agency.

The effect of the Office of Personnel Management's ruling has been to deprive our Government of the special skills and unique experience of its most senior administrative law judges, many of whom are able and willing to continue Government service. Authorizing the temporary recall of these judges will relieve shortages of judges in active service and greatly ease delay in disposition of cases by agencies with large caseloads.

This legislation, identical to that which has already been introduced in the House, gives the Office of Personnel Management authority to prescribe rules under which reemployed administrative law judges may be appointed and serve, thereby insulating such judges from agency control and pressure. The Office of Personnel Management would be permitted to determine the rehired annuitant's pay within the limitations of law, provide for temporary utilization of retired administrative law judges without regard to the regular supergrade manpower ceilings, and establish other necessary regulations.

Mr. President, I believe enactment of this legislation will promote more efficient operation of the Federal regulatory process within which administrative law judges play so vital a role, and result in substantial savings of both funds and manpower. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to consider this matter promptly.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2064

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3323(b) of title 5, United States Code, relating to reappointment of retired Federal employees, is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "; except that a former administrative law judge appointed under section 3105 of this title may be reappointed under section 3105 and shall serve pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Office of Personnel Management.".●

By Mr. SYMMS:

S. 2067. A bill to amend the Trade Act of 1974 in order to authorize the President to respond to foreign practices which unfairly discriminate against U.S. investment abroad; to the Committee on Finance.

FAIR TREATMENT FOR U.S. OVERSEAS INVESTMENT

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I am today introducing a bill to amend section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974.

Section 301, which Congress last amended in the Trade Agreements Act of 1979, allows the President to retaliate against foreign nations which engage in unfair practices that discriminate against or that otherwise harm U.S. trade. My amendment would insure that such practices which injure U.S. investments are covered as well. That is, the President will be empowered to take retalitory investment-related measures when other countries discriminate against American investments.

Mr. President, my bill gives the President a power that he will be able to use in his discretion. It does not require that he use it. My bill is not a weapon to be used in a trade war. It is an instrument to be used with care in trade negotiations.

We live in a world in which unfair treatment of U.S. investment capital is proliferating. Canada's energy policies, which effectively deprive American oil companies of their investments at fire sale prices, are one clear example. The increasingly frequent performance requirements insisted upon by developing countries are another.

An especially troubling—although still prospective—instance is the legislative program of the European Communities. The seventh and ninth company law directives, and the so-called Vredeling proposal, would impose unreasonable and extremely burdensome requirements upon U.S. companies of information disclosure, consultation with trade unions, and even personal liability of U.S. directors.

I believe this program is unfair and unreasonable. Mr. President, my bill would provide a mechanism whereby American companies can protest such programs as this, and can enlist the aid of our Government in making those protests effective. I urge my colleagues to join with me in cosponsoring this measure.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of these remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2067

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2411) is amended as follows:

(1) Subsection (b) is amended—

(A) by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (1);

(B) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and"; and

(C) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) restrict, through such means as he deems appropriate (including, but not limited to, the suspension of investment agreements), direct investment within the United States by such foreign country or instrumentality or by persons who are citizens or nationals of, or are organized or existing under the laws, of such foreign country or instrumentality.".

(2) Subsection (d)(1) is amended—

(A) by inserting "(A)" immediately before "services associated"; and

(B) by inserting ", and (B) investment" immediately before the period.●

By Mr. DODD:

S. 2068. A bill to amend the National Housing Act to authorize the insurance of certain shared appreciation mortgages; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

SHARED APPRECIATION MORTGAGES

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today to authorize the Federal Housing Administration to insure shared appreciation mortgages for the purpose of assisting first-time homebuyers, with a priority for residents of rental housing facing involuntary displacement as a result of the conversion of their units to either condominium or cooperative ownership. A shared appreciation mortgage involves a reduced, below-market interest rate for the borrower in return for the lender receiving a commensurate share of the net appreciated value of the property.

I am concerned particularly with the urgency of developing tools to mitigate involuntary displacement resulting from conversions. While already a significant problem in certain markets, the conversion phenomenon will intensify so long as the supply of rental housing is constrained. My State of Connecticut witnessed a 400-percent increase in conversions from 1977 to 1979. Even if the net loss of rental units resulting from this process is relatively low as some national data suggest, the pace of conversions in combination with rental vacancy rates in many larger cities of close to 1 percent paints a very dismal picture for those of limited means or on fixed incomes, such as senior citizens and the disabled. We must find ways to keep monthly housing costs in line with our citizens' ability to pay and we should not foreclose the benefits of homeownership for our people.

The measure I am offering today is not a panacea for either the problems of potential conversion displacees or unsuccessful first-time buyers. It is merely one tool that could ease the problems of housing affordability confronting these groups. In my opinion, our prior efforts at fashioning solutions to housing problems have been hampered by a desire to structure single, grand solutions to multifaceted conditions and needs. Inevitably, programs have been judged to fail because the accomplishments never measure up to the goals or the assistance was not sufficiently focused so as to have a concerted impact. I have attempted to learn from experience in developing this bill which is highly targeted both in terms of purpose and intended beneficiaries.

The FHA must continue to encourage innovation in addressing the housing needs of our lower and moderate income citizens. While I believe that the FHA should continue, without credit restraints, to emphasize the long-term, fixed-rate mortgage, we must recognize that other means must be found to allow the FHA to continue to reach its traditional share of the potential homebuying population. In addition, the FHA historically has provided a leading influence in the housing finance industry. In short, by designing alternative mortgage instruments which are sensitive to consumer needs, the FHA can and should spur a broader acceptance of these instruments throughout the private sector.

In reviewing the testimony from the September 19 hearing by the Subcommittee on Housing and Urban Affairs on this general subject, I find myself in agreement with the testimony of the consumer representatives who argued both for continuation of the basic FHA mortgage instrument and cautioned against certain alternative instruments with unpredictable terms. It is my belief that the limited proposal I am offering responds to these concerns as well as the legitimate need to allow the FHA to continue to perform its historic mission. In order to succeed, these new instruments will require broad-based consumer acceptance which can only be accomplished with an approprate equating of risk and benefit and strong consumer protections and disclosures.

Mr. President, certain elements of this bill are drawn from a demonstration which is ongoing in California. I want to extend my appreciation to Donald Terner, director of the California Department of Housing and Community Development for his assistance in the development of this proposal. By all reports the demand for assistance under this demonstration has been overwhelming and the mortgage form has been well received by participants. I want to emphasize the following elements of the bill I am proposing:

To assure that there is a balanced risk sharing between the lender and the consumer, the reduction in the effective interest rate must be at least one-half of the lenders' share of the net appreciated value of the property.

Mortgages will be amortized over 30 years with a term of at least 10 years. The mortgagee must offer to refinance or arrange financing under FHA programs or other sources based on the credit worthiness of the borrower.

With respect to conversion displacees, this insurance will be limited to families or individuals with incomes which do not exceed 120 percent of local area median. While the Secretary is given some discretion to exceed this level, it is imperative that this assistance be utilized in conformance with the antidisplacement objectives of this proposal and not lead to any increase in conversions.

Mortgages are limited to owner-occupants and other FHA requirements on downpayments and mortgage amounts are made applicable.

Most importantly, the Secretary must establish adequate consumer protections and disclosures with respect to these mortgages. While not spelled out in statute, it is my intent that these should closely parallel the notices and disclosures contained in recent California law.

In conclusion, I believe that we must give our immediate attention to this and other potentially promising ideas for addressing the various aspects of our Nation's housing problems. It is possible to fashion creative, alternative solutions which contribute to a national housing policy without spending enormous sums or putting the Federal Government in an area best reserved for other governmental entities or the private sector. The situation is growing increasingly desperate in both human and economic terms and the responsibility to respond expediently is ours.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2068

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That title II of the National Housing Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"SHARED APPRECIATION MORTGAGES

"SEC. 247. (a) The Secretary is authorized to insure a shared appreciation mortgage which is secured by a first lien on real property. In carrying out the provisions of this section, the Secretary shall give a priority to tenants who may be involuntarily displaced by the conversion of rental housing to condominium or cooperative ownership.

"(b) For the purpose of this section—

"(1) the term 'shared appreciation mortgage' means a loan or mortgage made upon the security of an owner-occupied one-to-four family dwelling, including a condominium unit or the stock allocated to a dwelling unit in a residential cooperative housing corporation, in connection with which the lender has a right to receive a share of the appreciation in the value of the security property upon sale, refinancing, or acceleration upon default, whichever occurs first, and as a condition of which the lender agrees to a reduction in the interest rate from the prevailing market rate by a percentage which is not less than one-half of the percentage share acquired by the lender in the net appreciated value of the property;

"(2) the lender's share in the net appreciated value of the property may not exceed 50 per centum; and

"(3) in calculating the amount of net appreciated value, the Secretary shall make provision for sales costs, closing costs, and the cost of capital improvements made by the unit owner.

"(c) To be eligible for insurance under this section, a mortgage shall—

"(1) be amortized over a period of not to exceed 30 years, but the actual term of the mortgage (excluding any refinancing) shall be not less than 10 nor more than 30 years, and the commitment for the mortgage shall include an offer by the lender or mortgagee to refinance or arrange for refinancing of the principal balance of the mortgage and any contingent deferred interest at an interest rate generally available in the market under any other section of this title or privately prior to the conclusion of the actual term, subject to qualification of the borrower;

"(2) be executed by a purchaser who has not owned a home during the three years preceding the date of application for insurance;

"(3) in the case of insurance provided pursuant to the second sentence of subsection (a), be executed by a borrower whose income at the time of application for insurance does not exceed 120 per centum of the median income for the area, except that the Secretary may in his or her discretion, increase such percentage of median income limitation where necessary to minimize housing displacement, where appropriate in high-cost areas, or in the case of families with two wage earners;

"(4) have a principal amount which does not exceed the maximum amount of a mortgage which is secured by the same type of property and which may be insured under any other section of this title; and

"(5) be executed by a borrower who shall have paid on account of the property the same percentage of the value of the security property which the borrower would be required to pay under such other section of this title.

"(d) The Secretary shall prescribe adequate consumer protections and disclosure requirements with respect to mortgages insured under this section, and may prescribe such other terms and conditions as may be appropriate to carry out the provisions of this section.".●

By Mr. HART:

S. 2069. A bill to amend the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 to require that each congressional budget resolution fix the level of tax expenditures for the fiscal year involved as well as the recommended aggregate level of Federal Government; jointly, to the Committee on the Budget and the Committee on Governmental Affairs, pursuant to the order of August 4, 1977.

TAX EXPENDITURE BILL

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to significantly improve congressional control over the Federal budget. This legislation will amend the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 to require the establishment of ceilings on tax expenditures in congressional budget resolutions. This legislation was originally drafted and introduced by Representative DAVID BONIOR, in the House last year.

Under current law, the 1974 Budget Act prevents anything more than a perfunctory review of tax expenditures. The Finance and Budget Committees draft revenue floors and spending targets respectively. However, neither of the two adequately consider the total revenue forgone due to tax expenditures. This legislation, will require the incorportion of tax expenditure ceilings in the first and second budget resolutions and the reconciliation process each year.

Tax expenditures, as defined by the Budget Act are those "revenue losses attributable to provisions of the Federal tax laws which allow a special exclusion, exemption, or deduction from gross income or which provide a special credit, a preferential tax rate, or a deferral of tax liability." They are designed to encourage particular economic behavior, such as productive investments, for a targeted segment of the population.

In practice tax expenditures are another form—an uncontrolled form—of Federal spending. They are realized in the form of tax deductions for the elderly and the blind as well as the expensing of exploration and development costs for oil companies. They include the deductibility of interest on home mortgages and the preferential tax treatment of capital gains.

Mr. President, this indirect Federal spending is growing at an alarming rate. The Congressional Budget Office reports that in 1967, when the Treasury Department first began keeping track of expenditures, there were a total of 50 expenditures amounting to roughly $37 billion in uncollected Federal revenues. In 1968, that amounted to just over 20 percent of the entire Federal budget. Today, the CBO indicates there are 110 expenditures totaling nearly $266 billion in forgone revenue or just over one-third of the entire Federal budget. And, for the most part, this Federal spending is uncontrolled Federal spending. At this rate we can expect to see tax expenditures become among the biggest slices of the Federal budget pie—second only to the interest paid on the Federal debt—by the early 1990's.

Mr. President, we have barely completed one of the most arduous budget processes ever undertaken by Congress. In doing so, we battled over the direction and depth of nearly $130 billion in funding cuts to both foreign and domestic Federal programs. Ironically, while we were battling over this $130 billion in cuts, we were also indirectly spending over $80 billion in tax expenditures.

Some may argue that the budget process adequately controls tax expenditures through the revenue floors established each year. However, it is worth pointing out that the required revenue floors take into account primarily revenue from general tax policy and make only general assumptions about the amount of revenue lost to tax expenditures. Beyond this general assumption, nothing is done to quantify or control this aspect of Federal spending. The legislation will highlight the two very distinct parts of the revenue floor process and mandate equal consideration of both the revenue from general tax policy and revenue forgone due to tax expenditures.

This legislation does not in any way limit the amount of money spent through tax expenditures. Rather, it requires Congress pay due attention to the amount of money spent indirectly through Federal subsidies, preferential tax rates, tax deferral, and special credits. We cannot merely assume the amount of money spent through these channels each year and expect to maintain adequate control over the budget process—a significant element in the Nation's economy.

Congress must take every step possible to insure the fiscal integrity of the budget process. This legislation will help do that finally bringing tax expenditures into account in the budget.

I request that the fact sheet prepared by Congressman BONIOR's office on the Bonior/Hart bill as well as the text of this legislation be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2069

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 301(a)(4) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 is amended to read as follows:

"(4) the recommended level of Federal revenues; the recommended level of tax expenditures; and the amount (if any) by which the aggregate level of Federal revenues, and the level of tax expenditures, should be increased or decreased by bills and resolutions to be reported by the appropriate committees;".

(b) Section 303(a)(2) of such Act is amended by inserting ", or in tax expenditures," after "revenues".

(c) Section 310(a)(2) of such Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "the total amount by which revenues are to be changed" and inserting in lieu thereof "the total amount by which revenues or tax expenditures (or both) are to be changed"; and

(2) by striking out "the revenue laws" and inserting in lieu thereof "the applicable laws".

(d) Section 311(a) of such Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "or reducing revenues" in the matter preceding paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof "providing additional tax expenditures for such fiscal year, or otherwise reducing revenues"; and

(2) by striking out "or would cause revenues to be less" in the matter following paragraph (3) and inserting in lieu thereof "would cause the recommended level of tax expenditures so set forth to be exceeded, or would otherwise cause revenues to be less".

SEC. 2. The amendments made by the first section of this Act shall apply with respect to fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1982.

FACT SHEET—TAX EXPENDITURES AND THE BUDGET PROCESS

Tax expenditures, which are defined in the Budget Act of 1974, are special exceptions to the generally prevailing tax schedule. Already a major share of total federal spending, they are growing at an alarming rate with important implications for both budget and tax policy.

Despite their growing importance, tax expenditures are not directly subject to the budget process. No ceiling is established for tax expenditures in the budget resolutions, and tax expenditures are not directly controllable through reconciliation. The Bonior/Hart measure would amend the Budget Act to include tax expenditures.

THE GROWTH OF TAX EXPENDITURES AND THE FEDERAL BUDGET

Tax expenditures already constitute one-fourth (25 percent) of all expenditures and they are growing faster than direct spending. Tax expenditures will constitute an increasing, not decreasing share of all expenditures:

Before the 1981 Tax Act, tax expenditures were projected to cost $266 billion in fiscal year 1982.

Since 1975, tax expenditures have increased at an average annual rate of 14 percent in contrast to 11 percent for direct spending. (Tax Expenditures: Current issues and five year budget projections for fiscal years 1981-1985, CBO, April, 1980)

Failure to subject tax expenditures to the budget process allows them to expand even during periods of otherwise tight fiscal constraints. The result is that the growth of tax expenditures is not only high, but accelerating:

Tax expenditures increased 69 percent from fiscal year 1978 to fiscal year 1980 alone. (CRS, Growth in Tax Expenditures, fiscal year 1978 to fiscal year 1980, November 3, 1981).

The 1981 Tax Act added eight (8) new tax expenditures and expanded twenty-two (22) more at a cost of $227 billion through fiscal year 1986, according to a provisional CBO estimate.

THE IMPACT OF TAX EXPENDITURES AND TAX EQUITY

The normal deducting procedures concentrate the benefits of tax expenditures for individuals among those in the highest marginal income tax brackets. Over one-fifth of all tax expenditures go to corporations at a cost equal to 72 percent of the total tax actually paid by corporations in fiscal year 1981.

A CRS study (Tax Expenditures: The Link Between Economic Intent and the Distribution of Benefits Among High, Middle and Low Income Groups, May 22, 1980, CRS Report No. 80-99E) has demonstrated the impact:

For those making over $50,000, 22.3 percent of their total adjusted gross income is shielded in tax loopholes, compared to only 6.1 percent for those making $20,000 to $30,000.

"For the highest income group, over $50,000," the study concluded, "tax expenditures appear deeply regressive." (Page 32).

THE BONIOR/HART BILL IS A RESPONSIBLE SOLUTION CONSISTENT WITH EARLIER CONGRESSIONAL REFORMS

Under the present budget procedures, each budget resolution sets a limit for total spending and a floor on revenues. While the aggregate spending is broken down by function, no limit is set for tax expenditures even though the total cost of tax expenditures now exceeds $266 billion. Similarly, reconciliation bills do not provide direct instructions to decrease tax expenditures.

The Bonior/Hart bill will prompt regular review of tax expenditures and will bring tax expenditures under the overall constraints of budget policy:

It will require Congress to set and live with a yearly ceiling for tax expenditures.

It will subject tax expenditures directly to reconciliation.

In achieving these results, the Bonior/Hart bill refrains from setting a permanent absolute ceiling on tax expenditures either as a percentage of GNP, revenues or direct spending. It also does not disrupt traditional committee jurisdiction by mandating coreferral of tax expenditures.●

By Mr. HEINZ (for himself, Mr. DOLE, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. SPECTER, and Mr. MOYNIHAN):

S. 2071. A bill to amend the Trade Act of 1974 with respect to reciprocal market access; to the Committee on Finance.

RECIPROCAL TRADE

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, today I am introducing, together with Senators DOLE, MOYNIHAN, SPECTER, and SYMMS, the Reciprocity in Trade Services and Investment Act of 1982. At the same time, Congressman BROD-HEAD is introducing an identical counterpart in the House of Representatives.

This bill is the result of several years of intensive experience with our existing trade laws and many months of consultation and legislative drafting with interested Members of Congress and other experts in the field. Before describing the purpose and details of our legislation, I would like to clarify the context in which this or any other trade proposals must be considered.

Mr. President, the multilateral trade negotiations were a watershed in the development of recent trade policy. The culmination of years of negotiations in the Tokyo round, the MTN produced hundreds of tariff reductions and numerous separate agreements on a wide range of codes of behavior for conducting international trade. Some of these codes broke new ground—as in government procurement and standards. Others, subsidies and antidumping, revised old concepts and, theoretically, at least tightened old loopholes.

Subsequently, the Congress passed the Trade Agreements Act of 1979 to implement these new agreements. I supported that bill. In fact, I cosponsored it, after considerable work on it, because I believe it and the MTN represented a major step forward in our efforts to establish a common set of international trading rules and to bring U.S. law in compliance with them. And I believe that still.

Our goal in setting up those trade rules has been and must continue to be establishment and preservation of the free market system. That is usually abbreviated as free trade. But in using that term I think we have to be very clear about what we mean. Free trade means the operation of the system according to free market principles and the law of comparative advantage. It implies a rejection of tariffs, quotas, and other restrictions on market access. It also implies a rejection of subsidies and artificial incentives that give one nation's industries an advantage over others, even though they might be less efficient or productive. Such subsidies distort the law of comparative advantage and divert scarce resources into relatively unproductive industries at the expense of their more efficient competitors elsewhere in the world.

Unfortunately, some analysts choose to ignore this second half of the equation and define free trade only in terms of the United States removing its barriers. The result of that position is a world in which our doors are open and everyone else's are closed; where we struggle to export while other nations dump their less efficiently produced goods here, and along with them, their economic problems. This is not free trade. It is a policy which guarantees the survival of the unfit at the expense of the efficient.

The MTN and the Trade Agreements Act made substantial progress in setting up more uniform rules based on free trade principles. But they neither solved nor anticipated all the problems.

Historically, the most well-known means of deterring imports was the use of a tariff to raise the price of imports as high or higher than that of the domestic competition. However, more than 20 years of negotiations have reduced tariffs to relatively low levels and focused attention on other kinds of barriers. Some of these have existed for years and went unnoticed in the concentration on tariffs. Some are newer and are intended essentially to replace other barriers no longer permitted.

Regardless of type, these nontariff barriers on goods, services, and investment are proliferating in number and variety. In the largest sense they are intended to restrict market access, either by effectively preventing it, such as through discriminatory health or inspection standards, or by deterring it through the imposition of unpalatable performance requirements like mandatory investment in production facilities and required export levels for such plants. The fact that these restrictions apply to both goods and services as well as investment is particularly important to a service-oriented economy like ours.

Considerable research has been done and much has been printed recently about this growing problem. Only last week, the Wall Street Journal, in a front page story, went into considerable detail on Japanese trade barriers. Equally important in that article is the fact that, despite endless negotiations and discussions with Japan, nothing ever changes. Agreements may be reached, meetings are held, changes are announced, but when all is said and done, everything stays the same. As of the weekend, we have a new announcement from Japan. Only time will tell if it will produce significant change. Few of us in the Senate, however, are holding our breath.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of that article appear at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AT A CROSSROADS: JAPAN NEARS A CHOICE OF EASING TRADE CURBS OR FACING WEST'S IRE

PROTECTIONIST PRESSURE RISES, BUT THE JAPANESE CRITICIZE FAILINGS OF UNITED STATES, EUROPE—APOSTROPHE DELAYS AN IMPORT

(By Art Pine)

TOKYO.—When a blue-ribbon Japanese trade mission made the rounds of West European capitals last October, its leaders came home jolted by the anti-Japanese feeling they found.

In London, British Chancellor of the Exchequer Geoffrey Howe read a list of complaints about Japanese Trade practices and then disclosed bitterly that it was the same paper the British had presented in the early 1970s. In Paris, French trade Minister Michel Jobert told the delegation acidly that if push came to shove, "there's nothing we really need" to import from Japan.

Complaints from the U.S. have been less rancorous, but frustration with Japan's import barriers is increasing, and so is the chance that the U.S. may move to close its doors to some Japanese goods. Congress is aflutter with draft bills to retaliate against Japan's import restrictions, and the Reagan administration is fast losing patience with the Japanese. "We got to this point a lot sooner than most administrations do," a U.S. policy maker says.

AT A CROSSROADS

The pressure from Japan's major trading partners has become so heated that Japan may be approaching a crossroads—where it must reduce the remaining trade barriers that shelter its industry or face mounting protectionism from the West.

Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki has promised that Japan will act to ease some of its import restrictions; he has ordered a series of top-level councils to produce recommendations by Thursday. (The prime minister has just renewed his pledge to ease trade frictions. See story on page 39.) But most analysts say any progress will probably be slow and painful by Western standards. And they see a substantial risk that trade frictions will intensify before the major trading blocs reach any accommodations, as powerful elements in Japanese government and business remain opposed to significant change.

Predicts Leslie Fielding, the European Common Market's senior representative in Tokyo: "You can be well certain that by spring a package will have been evolved which will be judged in the U.S. and Western Europe as inadequate."

The U.S. and European complaints center on Japan's reluctance to alter its post-World War II trade policies—an aggressive worldwide export drive along with a web of complex restrictions on imports. Businessmen say these policies make it far more difficult for Westerners to crack the lucrative Japanese market than it is for the Japanese to sell in the West.

U.S. LISTS COMPLAINTS

The U.S. has compiled a list of 51 separate tariffs and "nontariff barriers," which include import quotas on 24 agricultural products ranging from citrus fruits to beef. They also include restrictive standards and inspection requirements that effectively shut out such American exports as cosmetics, food additives, autos, tobacco, medical supplies, semiconductors and high-technology products.

Among these restrictions: Japanese refusal to accept U.S. certification that American pharmaceutical exports are safe; insistence on different-from-U.S. standards for electrical appliances and pressurized containers; requirements that importer-distributors of foreign autos submit each car shipped for painstaking emissions-testing rather than, say, one out of every 10.

American businessmen also want Japan to improve Westerners' access to its closely controlled distribution system and to encourage more local companies to abandon their traditional buy-Japan mentality. And the Reagan administration wants Tokyo to make it easier for U.S. corporations to buy Japanese companies and to enter still-restricted fields such as banking, financial services and insurance.

CONGRESSIONAL PRESSURES

If the Japanese don't open their markets further, the administration has warned, it may go along with congressional pressures for "reciprocity" legislation—laws denying access to some U.S. markets to countries that don't open their own markets to American businesses. Sen. John Danforth, the chairman of the Senate subcommittee on international trade, has indicated that he is considering such legislation. Congressional aides say the pressures now are so intense that some sort of protectionist legislation is likely this year. "It's a damage-control operation," one says.

The West Europeans have submitted their own set of demands. These call for a reduction in Japan's import barriers to products including confectionery, whisky and leather goods. European Common Market officials also want the Japanese to restrain their shipments of high-priced, politically sensitive exports such as autos and machine tools. And they are prodding Japan to sanction more direct investment abroad and more joint ventures in Europe between Japanese and European companies.

But both the American and the European demands face heavy opposition here—from the government's conservative finance and transportation ministries, from the well-entrenched and influential bureaucracy, from some business and farm groups and from the Japanese public. All tend to see U.S. and European complaints as exaggerated and the West's trade troubles as largely its own fault.

"We aren't totally convinced of our wrongdoing, or our evils," says Tadashi Yamamoto, the director of the Japan Center for International Exchange. Adds Yukihiko Ikeda, Prime Minister Suzuki's deputy chief cabinet secretary: "We aren't the only ones to be blamed; Europe and the U.S., too, have something to do."

Indeed, Japan's spectacular economic success has spawned a self-confidence that makes many Japanese openly scornful of American and European society—and quick to blame the West's economic troubles on sloth and decay instead of unfair competition from Japan. They contend that rather than ask Japan to restrain its exports or open its markets wider, Western governments should strive to increase productivity.

"The responsibility lies partly in Europe and the U.S.," says Saeki Kiichi, the director of the prestigious Tokyo-based Nomura Research Center. "If their competitiveness hadn't declined, there would be no problem now." Scoffs Hyogo Fukazawa, a Tokyo importer, in an oft-proffered view that inevitably raises Western hackles: "Mr. America is partly in the hospital. Europe is sick. The Europeans are trying to bring the healthy Japanese into their bed."

Many Japanese argue that the frictions with Japan actually stem from the West's current problems of recession and high U.S. interest rates, along with Westerners' failure to work hard and put aside their preoccupation with short-term profits. They contend that Western discontent will abate as the recession ends and as the Japanese yen rises in value—making imports more attractive here and Japan's exports more costly abroad. Akio Kohno, the chief economist for Daiwa Securities Co., predicts that the yen will appreciate by year-end from its current 229-to-the-dollar rate to a more realistic 180 to the dollar.

Few Japanese accept the widely held Western view that their markets are closed to foreign goods. Mr. Fukazawa charges, "Your businesses aren't finding any trouble selling here; they're just not working enough." He says Japanese businessmen wanting to compete in the U.S. start out by learning English and slowly courting potential customers. "Here, the Americans say, 'We can't sell, we can't sell. But how many of them have really tried?"

THE JAPANESE WAY

Moreover, Japanese tend to look at such barriers as their distribution system and company-takeover restrictions as simply Japan's peculiar way of doing business—something that foreigners ought to accept. "Here, to buy a company is almost considered immoral," explains Saburo Okita, the chairman of the Tokyo-based Institute for Domestic and International Policy Studies. "It's related to the notion that companies should guarantee their workers lifetime employment."

American businessmen with long experience in Japan concede that some of the Japanese contentions are valid, but they argue that Japan still is a closed market by most Western standards. "If you're willing to make the commitment in terms of people, money and time, this is a profitable investment," says retired Gen. Lawrence F. Snowden, the president of the American Chamber of Commerce in Japan. "But there are a lot of barriers that U.S. firms just shouldn't have to meet. There's no doubt that some change is in order."

Admittedly, Japan has come a long way in liberalizing its trade practices from the "Japan Inc." days of the 1960s. Partly as a result of international negotiations in 1978, Tokyo has sharply reduced or eliminated many of its tariffs and some import quotas. But many nontariff barriers remain.

A MISSING APOSTROPHE

For example, Givenchy Japon complained recently that its application to import l'Interdit perfume was held up by the welfare ministry—because the company left out an apostrophe between the L and I. Golfclub parts made in America and assembled in Taiwan can't come in unless the manufacturers gouge out the "Made in U.S.A." stamp engraved in the shafts. Korean-made electric fans that have passed rigorous U.S. tests can't be sold here unless their cords are replaced with Japanese substitutes. Grain accepted in one Japanese port is rejected in another—even though it is in the same shipload.

Western demands that Japan alter its trading practices may well have a familiar ring. Twice during the 1970s the U.S. and Western Europe raised a similar clamor—and got some satisfaction. Says Ryutaro Komia, a Tokyo University professor of international trade: "Now we have experienced the third wave."

This time, all sides agree, the pressures are stronger: Western complaints now involve the whole spectrum of Japanese products and services, not just one or two categories, such as textiles or autos; all of Western Europe, even usually free-trade-minded West Germany, is joining in; Western countries are suffering from high unemployment—and so more likely to turn protectionist—and the anti-Japanese feeling is visibly more strident than it has been before. The feeling in Europe is "approaching the 'yellow-peril' stage," says one U.S. official there.

SORE POINT FOR UNITED STATES

The basic sore point for the U.S. is America's burgeoning foreign-trade deficit with Japan, which hit $18 billion in 1981 and is expected to top $25 billion this year—with little relief in sight. Ironically, all sides agree that even if Japan did everything the U.S. is asking, the trade deficit wouldn't disappear; rather, it would be pared only by a scant $800 million. But, U.S. Ambassador Mike Mansfield told a Tokyo audience this month, "At least the political problems would disappear."

Precisely what steps the Suzuki government will take still isn't clear. But top Japanese leaders obviously recognize that they have a problem. "To the external world, we are in the position that we cannot make excuses any more," says Masumi Esaki, the elder statesman assigned by Mr. Suzuki to coordinate development of a package of trade changes.

As a result, Japan probably will come up with some serious measures to deal with specific U.S. and European complaints, though most observers doubt that Tokyo will make the kind of sweeping "reforms" sought by the U.S.

Mr. Esaki hints broadly that of the 51 specific complaints that the U.S. has lodged about Japanese trade practices, 31 will be resolved "as the U.S. wants." The Japanese think that another 10 practices either are fair or involve easily correctible misunderstandings. The remaining 10, Mr. Esaki says, "still need discussion."

SOME EXAMPLES

Included among the 31 steps to ease existing standards, inspection requirements and import procedures now routinely inhibiting Western sales of products such as cosmetics, pharmaceuticals and auto parts. Officials say U.S. demands for elimination of the remaining import quotas—including two dozen on agricultural products—are apt to receive only token relief.

The remaining items, such as overhaul of Japan's complex and difficult-to-penetrate distribution system, "are touchy, and I don't think we can get early answers," says Yukihiki Ikeda, Prime Minister Suzuki's deputy chief cabinet secretary, who holds a position similar to that of Edwin Meese, counselor in the Reagan White House. Adds Tomio Tsutsumi, a trade-ministry official: "That kind of thing is difficult for the government to handle. If it's easy, we already did it."

The policy makers here are planning other moves, in any case. As a concession to the European Common Market, Japan is expected to slow its exports to Western Europe. Prime Minister Suzuki has indicated that he may install a top-level ombudsman—with broad powers to penetrate the Japanese bureaucracy—to run down specific complaints by U.S. companies. Mr. Esaki says Japan also will "make procedures easier to understand."

PLAN DUE SOON

Mr. Suzuki's strategists say their trade package will be put in final form in early February and timed to hit the U.S. just before members of Congress go home for the Lincoln's Birthday recess; the hope is to have maximum effect on protectionist lawmakers.

Whether the Japanese concessions will be enough to satisfy either U.S. or European officials remains to be seen. During a visit to Japan earlier this month, a group of U.S.

lawmakers headed by Sen. Danforth seemed unlikely to be assuaged. And the administration continued to step up the pressure during a visit by Japanese Trade Minister Shintaro Abe to Washington last week.

All sides are apparently trying to resolve their differences in time to avert a new round of protectionism. But, says Saburo Okita, the chairman of the Tokyo-based Institute for Domestic and International Policy Studies, "Things are getting emotional—and not well-grounded in facts."

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, this article also points out the Japanese view that Americans and Europeans do not approach their market properly and that the root of the problem lies in our practices rather than theirs. There is an element of truth in this, and the record no doubt contains examples of American and European failure for the reasons cited; but it is also replete with standards, barriers, and informal practices which make success virtually impossible. Following are some examples of such barriers, taken from practices in a number of different countries:

Restrictive standards and/or inspection requirements on goods like cosmetics, food additives, autos, tobacco, medical supplies;

Refusal to accept U.S. certifications on the safety of pharmaceutical exports;

Emissions testing—or other testing—of each imported auto—or other product—rather than testing a sample;

Prohibitions or restrictions on U.S. entry into key service fields like banking, financial services, and insurance;

Linking market access to a requirement to build production facilities in the country;

Requiring such production facilities to maintain a specified level of exports;

"Unexpected" or unannounced delays in unloading freight, including perishable products;

Limitations on the showing of U.S. films;

Discriminatory airport user charges or less advantageous airport locations for foreign airlines;

Exclusion from airline travel agency reservation systems;

Licensing requirements; and Local content rules.

There are, of course, numerous others, but the above should serve as an illustrative list.

To better judge the frequency with which such restrictions are imposed, it is useful to look at "The Use of Investment Incentives and Performance Requirements by Foreign Governments," published by the Commerce Department last October. Its conclusions are based on data gathered by the Bureau of Economic Analysis for its Benchmark Survey of U.S. Direct Investment Abroad in 1977. The information is a bit old, but comprehensive, since the 1977 survey covered 3,540 U.S. companies and their 24,666 affiliates. With respect to performance requirements, the study showed that on the average 14 percent of U.S. affiliates were subject to them, although this varied widely by country and region. In South America, for example, every country but Argentina imposed one or more performance requirements on at least one-third of U.S. affiliates. India's rate was the world's highest—60 percent. The sectors most often affected were mining and manufacturing, particularly transportation equipment. Significantly, the use of performance requirements was greater among developing nations, an area where we will be increasingly concentrating in the future.

There is no question, of course, about the growing importance of U.S. investment abroad. U.S. direct investment outflows from 1948 to 1980 were $81.5 billion. Comparing that to the $231.1 billion in earnings suggests a net balance-of-payments gain of nearly $150 billion. The same benchmark survey I referred to shows that 34 percent of U.S. exports go to U.S. nonbanking affiliates abroad, illustrating clearly how the flow of exports is related to foreign investment. Performance requirements or other restrictions that impinge on investment have an immediate and obvious impact on our exports.

Mr. President, I could go on, as ample additional material is available. One particularly useful document I would commend to Senators' attention is the Ways and Means Committee Trade Subcommittee's recent report on its trade mission to the Far East—December 21, 1981—which discusses Japanese practices in some detail.

Clearly, it is past time we gave the President the tools he needs to act against these barriers. If we believe in the free market system as I have described it above, then it is our responsibility to promote such a system on a worldwide basis. Such an effort will not be easy, and it cannot be pursued in an arbitrary manner. While in some cases the practices in question have been deliberately developed to deter foreign access and to promote domestic industries, in others they are the product of long-standing cultural or social traditions and ways of doing business which are integral parts of the society. Belief in the free market does not mean recasting other economies in our image, even if it were possible. It does mean working together with other countries to establish mutually acceptable rules for trade and then insuring that those rules are enforced. Sometimes, it must be recognized, some countries will need encouragement to get to the bargaining table, and we should not shrink from providing that kind of incentive in the form of verbal encouragement or, if necessary, substantive retaliation. But our goal, nevertheless, must remain the reaching of agreement on trade rules and not simply the creation of matching trade barriers on our part.

In attempting to reach that objective, we should give some consideration to the principles of reciprocity and national treatment, the ideas, simply put, that we should expect from others the same treatment we provide them and that U.S. entities operating in a foreign country should be treated the same as comparable domestic entities in that country. Obviously such concepts, clear in broad principle, can be difficult to work with in specific circumstances, and allowance must be made for that. But the concepts themselves are sound.

Accordingly, I am today introducing legislation designed to give the President additional authority to achieve these objectives. This authority is in essence discretionary. It does not depend exclusively on a mechanical process outside the administration's control. It is largely discretionary because I believe that this is the method which will be most likely to produce the fastest, most tangible, and beneficial results.

My bill amends section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974, which is the section providing for U.S. use of the international dispute settlement process centered in the GATT. Under current law the President on his own initiative or via the acceptance of a petition from the private sector can initiate an investigation into another country's unfair trade practice, begin the GATT consultation and dispute settlement process, and ultimately take retaliatory action after the conclusion of the GATT process. My bill would clarify this section to permit the President to use this process to establish or further the principles of reciprocal market access or national treatment for U.S. goods, including agricultural goods, services, or investment. Further, the 301 process could be initiated by resolution of the Finance or Ways and Means Committees, in addition to the private petition or Presidential initiative routes in current law.

Once an investigation was underway under my bill, it would proceed according to current law, with the following differences:

First, the President would be permitted, but not required, to utilize GATT process, which would give him additional latitude for emergency action or action emphasizing the gravity of the situation, if needed;

Second, roughly midway through the GATT process, if it is utilized, the U.S. Trade Representative would have to publish a list of legislative alternatives being considered in the case, in order to make public what options are available to the Government if negotiations fail;

Third, in these cases involving reciprocity or national treatment, the President would have additional retaliatory authority beyond what is in the present statute, including:

(a) Entering into bilateral or multilateral negotiations;

(b) Adjusting Government procurement policies;

(c) Instructing the U.S. directors to the IMF and World Bank to vote against loans to countries against whom a complaint is pending;

(d) Requesting Federal regulatory agencies, such as the FCC or ICC, to consider another country's adherence to reciprocity or national treatment principles in acting on applications from that Government or its nationals;

(e) Proposing mirror image legislation, to be handled under special fast track rules, that would match the nonreciprocal practice.

These additional actions are discretionary and subject to the procedures established in current law.

In my view, Mr. President, this is a responsible way to proceed. Ample opportunity is provided for the administration to consider each case as it is presented by the private sector, and the opportunity remains for presidential self-initiation, should that be appropriate. Equally ample opportunity exists to utilize existing international dispute settlement procedures to bring the matter to a successful conclusion. But in order to help that process along the bill clarifies and specifies existing authority and provides additional authority for the President—and thereby additional negotiating leverage—to retaliate if necessary.

Senators should be aware, Mr. President, that my bill is not the only one on this issue under consideration. I understand that the distinguished Chairman of the International Trade Subcommittee, the Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH), will shortly be introducing his own bill. Senator DANFORTH has been a leader on this issue for some time, particularly with respect to our longstanding problems with Japan, and I anticipate this bill will reflect his long study of the reciprocity problem, including insights gained from his recent trip to Japan.

While I believe our bills will be materially different, I anticipate they will be in many respects complementary, and I look forward to working with Chairman DANFORTH in developing a comprehensive approach to this problem.

It is my view that we need legislation that will strengthen our own laws, strengthen the GATT process, focus world and national attention on the reciprocity problem, and help develop trading rules more consistent with free market principles. I look forward to the Finance Committee's rapid consideration of this bill, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD, along with a fact sheet detailing the bill's provisions.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2071

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. FINDINGS; STATEMENT OF PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—

(1) TRADE IN SERVICES.—The Congress finds that—

(A) trade in services (including banking and other financial services, insurance, information and data processing, communications, transportation, advertising, shipping, construction and engineering, and entertainment) is becoming an increasingly important part of the United States economy;

(B) many nations, for various reasons, are increasingly erecting nontariff barriers to the import of United States and other foreign goods and services;

(C) such barriers include, but are not limited to, national monopolies, personnel restrictions, discriminatory restrictions on licensing and foreign exchange, local content requirements, local investment requirements, minimum export requirements, local equity participation requirements, discriminatory health, safety, or environmental standards, restrictions on the flow of information, restrictions on the repatriation of funds or profits, discriminatory tax policies, and other discriminatory restrictions on, or requirements of, foreign entities operating in the host country;

(D) the effect of such barriers has been to discriminate against imported goods and services and to provide for trade on a nonreciprocal basis; and

(E) such discrimination—

(i) results in a less open trading system and a distortion of the market system, and

(ii) works to the disadvantage of all countries, particularly countries (including the United States) which adhere to a free market system.

(2) INTERNATIONAL INVESTMENT.—The Congress further finds that—

(A) international investment flows should not be restricted or impaired by uneconomic or artificial barriers or restrictions which exist in many developed and developing countries;

(B) uneconomic and artificial barriers to direct investments, or restrictions on such investments, cause inefficiencies in the international production and distribution process which result in increased costs of production of goods and services to the consumers of the world;

(C) such barriers and restrictions should be removed to enhance the benefit to both investors and consumers of the limited resources available for international direct investment;

(D) arbitrary and nontransparent investment review procedures (other than with respect to certain industries critical to a nation's security interests), and unreasonable or otherwise arbitrary limitations on foreign currency exchange by non-nationals, adversely affect foreign direct investment by nationals or citizens of the United States;

(E) the consumers and producers of the world would benefit by the development of an effective multilateral agreement (under the auspices of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) which limits unreasonable, discriminatory or burdensome restrictions on foreign direct investments;

(F) multilateral negotiations on such a multilateral agreement, under the authority vested in the President by section 102 of the Trade Act of 1974, should be concluded as soon as practicable; and

(G) such an agreement should, to the extent possible, guarantee reciprocal direct investment access among the developed countries of the world and in no event provide less than national treatment for foreign direct investors in developed or developing countries.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act to encourage—

(1) adherence to the principles of the existing international trading system, and

(2) the operation and development of a free and open international trading and investment system, by promoting the principles of reciprocity and national treatment through multilateral and unilateral means.

SEC. 2. AMENDMENT TO THE TRADE ACT OF 1974.

(a) AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 301.—

(1) DETERMINATIONS REQUIRING ACTION.—Section 301 (a) of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2411 (a)) is amended—

(A) by striking out "or" at the end of paragraph (1);

(B) by inserting before the semicolon at the end of paragraph (2) (B) thereof the following: ", including restrictions on direct investments by citizens or nationals of the United States";

(C) by inserting "or" at the end of paragraph (2);

(D) by inserting immediately after paragraph (2) the following new paragraph:

"(3) to establish or further the principles of national treatment or reciprocal market access with respect to United States goods (including agricultural products), services, and foreign direct investment by nationals or citizens of the United States;"; and

(E) by striking out "or services" in the last sentence thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following: ", services, or direct investments".

(2) OTHER ACTION.—Section 301 (b) of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2411 (b)) is amended—

(A) by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (1);

(B) by inserting "or direct investment in the United States by nationals" after the word "services" in paragraph (2);

(C) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (2) and inserting a semicolon; and

(D) by inserting at the end thereof the following:

"(3) with respect to subsection (a) (3), also—

"(A) enter into bilateral or multilateral negotiations to further such principles;

"(B) adjust government procurement policies and practices to provide for procurement from nations which provide reciprocal market access to comparable United States producers, but only if such procurement is consistent with the provisions of the Code on Government Procurement or similar bilateral arrangements;

"(C) instruct the United States directors of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund to vote against loans or other assistance from their respective institutions to countries which do not adhere generally to principles of national treatment and market access;

"(D) request Federal regulatory agencies (including the Civil Aeronautics Board, Office of the Comptroller of the Currencies, Federal Communications Commission, Federal Reserve Board, Interstate Commerce Commission, Federal Maritime Commission, and Federal Energy Regulatory Commission) to consider (if such consideration would not violate any multilateral agreement) a country's adherence to principles of national treatment and reciprocal market access in making any decision or taking any action with respect to an application or request from such country or nationals of such country; or

"(E) propose legislation which would impose equivalent restrictions or requirements within the United States on goods or services from countries that do not adhere to the principles of national treatment or reciprocal market access, such legislation to be treated as an implementing bill pursuant to the provisions of section 151 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2191); and

"(4) take any other action which the President determines appropriate, including action to obtain the elimination of such unjustifiable, unreasonable, or discriminatory barriers or restrictions on foreign direct investment by citizens or nationals of the United States.".

(3) PRESIDENTIAL PROCEDURES.—Section 301 (c) of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2411 (c)) is amended by inserting "resolution or" before "petition" in the first sentence of paragraph (1) thereof.

(4) DEFINITIONS.—Section 301 (d) of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2411 (d)) is amended—

(A) by inserting before the period at the end of paragraph (1) thereof the following: "and foreign direct investment by citizens or nationals of the United States"; and

(B) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) DEFINITION OF NATIONAL TREATMENT.—For purposes of this section, the term 'national treatment' means the treatment by a government of foreign investment or foreign establishments operating within its borders in the same manner as domestic investment or comparable domestic establishments are treated.".

(b) AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 302.—

(1) FILING OF RESOLUTIONS BY COMMITTEES OF CONGRESS.—Section 302(a) of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2412 (a)) is amended by inserting ", or the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives or the Committee on Finance of the Senate may file with the Trade Representative a resolution,".

(2) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(A) Section 302 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2412) is amended—

(i) by inserting "or resolution" after "petition" each place it appears in the last sentence of subsection (a), subsection (b), and the heading for subsection (a),

(ii) by inserting "or Committee" after "petitioner" each place it appears, and

(iii) by inserting "or resolutions" after "petitions" in the section heading and the heading for subsection (b).

(B) The table of sections for chapter 1 of the table of contents of the Trade Act of 1974 is amended by inserting "or resolutions" after "Petitions" in the item relating to section 302.

(c) AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 303.—

(1) NO CONSULTATION, ETC. IN CERTAIN CASES.—Section 303 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2413) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "This section shall not apply to an affirmative determination described in section 301 (a) (3).".

(2) RESOLUTIONS.—Section 303 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2413) is amended—

(A) by inserting "or resolution" after "petition" each place it appears; and

(B) by inserting ", the appropriate committee of Congress," after "petitioner".

(d) AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 304.—

(1) RECOMMENDATIONS.—Section 304 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2414) is amended—

(A) by striking out "or" at the end of subparagraph (C); and

(B) by striking out subparagraph (D) and inserting in lieu thereof the following new subparagraphs:

"(D) one month in the case of a petition involving allegations which relate to section 301 (a) (3) in which the President has not requested consultations or initiated proceedings; or

"(E) 12 months after the date of the investigation initiation in any case not described in subparagraph (A), (B), (C), or (D).".

(2) RESOLUTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE PRESIDENT.—Section 304 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2414) is amended—

(A) by inserting "or resolution" after "petition" the first place it appears in subsection (a)(1) thereof; and

(B) by adding at the end of subsection (a) the following new paragraph:

"(4) LEGISLATIVE RECOMMENDATIONS OF PRESIDENT.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this chapter, the President shall within 120 days after an affirmative determination is made under section 302(b) with respect to a petition or resolution or a decision by the President to take action under section 301(c), make preliminary recommendations to the House of Representatives and to the Senate with respect to what alternative actions the President is considering under this chapter to the extent that any consultation or dispute settlement procedure provided under this chapter does not result, in his judgment, in the enforcement of such rights as the United States may have under any trade agreement or the elimination of any unjustifiable, unreasonable, or discriminatory burden or restriction on the commerce of the United States. Notice of such alternatives shall be published in the Federal Register."

(C) by striking out "or service" each place it appears in subsection (b) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: ", service, or direct investment".

SEC. 3. MULTILATERAL NEGOTIATIONS ON RESTRICTIONS ON FOREIGN DIRECT INVESTMENT.

Section 102(b) of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2112(b)) is amended by inserting "(including any restrictions on foreign direct investment)" after "United States" the first place it appears.

SENATOR HEINZ' RECIPROCAL MARKET ACCESS LEGISLATION

This legislation clarifies the President's current authority and gives him new authority to deal with problems of reciprocal market access or discriminatory treatment of U.S. goods, services, or investment abroad. It is an amendment to section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974.

HOW IT WORKS

Present Law: Section 301 creates a process whereby private parties, or the President on his own initiative, can make a complaint about other nations' violations of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) rules or the GATT's various codes, or other discriminatory actions, and seek redress, first through the GATT consultation/dispute settlement process and ultimately through direct retaliation.

Under the law an interested private party could file a petition (or the President could directly initiate a case), which the U.S. Trade Representative (USTR) would then have 45 days to consider and either accept or reject.

If accepted, an investigation into the allegations is begun, and GATT consultations are requested simultaneously. If the consultations do not resolve the matter and a GATT issue is involved, then USTR would initiate GATT dispute settlement proceedings, which could last from 6 months to more than one year, depending on the nature of the case.

At the conclusion of the proceedings, the USTR makes a recommendation to the President, who then has three weeks to decide what action to take. While a recommendation and a Presidential decision are mandatory, there is no requirement that either be positive, and there is no Congressional override.

Permissible actions include suspending or withdrawing existing trade agreement concessions or imposing duties, fees, or restrictions on the goods or services of the country in question.

Proposed bill: The legislation would make the following changes in the present procedures:

(1) In addition to GATT and code violations and "discriminatory" actions, the bill clarifies that non-reciprocal market access or non-national treatment are grounds for a complaint and Presidential action, whether they involve a GATT violation or not. (National treatment means treating foreign entities operating in one's country in a manner equivalent to the way comparable domestic entities are treated).

(2) In addition to initiation of a case through petition or Presidential request, the bill would also permit it by resolution of the Ways and Means or Finance Committee.

(3) With respect to cases involving reciprocity or national treatment, the President is given specific additional authority in addition to the general retaliatory authority in present law. The new authority includes:

(a) specific authorization to engage in bilateral or multilateral negotiations to resolve the problems;

(b) adjusting government procurement policies;

(c) instructing the U.S. directors, the World Bank and the IMF to oppose loans or other assistance from countries not providing reciprocal market access or national treatment;

(d) requesting specific federal regulatory agencies, including bank regulators, to take reciprocity issues into account when considering applications from foreign entities;

(e) proposing "mirror image" legislation to impose equivalent restrictions, which would be considered by Congress under "fast track" procedures;

(f) specific authorization to take any other action he determines appropriate.

(4) In these cases the President is also given the option of not using the GATT consultation/dispute settlement process, though it would be open to him. If he chose not to go to the GATT, the USTR recommendation to the President would be due one month after the case was initiated.

(5) Midway through the GATT process (no later than 120 days after the initiation of the case) the President would be required to make public a list of actions he is considering in the event the GATT process fails.

(6) Specific authorization is also provided to negotiating an international agreement on direct investment.

REASONS FOR CHANGE

This bill is intended to clarify, focus, and in some respects expand existing law, without removing either its discretionary base or its centralization in the Executive Office of the President.

The practices that could be subject to complaint, while sometimes blatant cases of discrimination, are also sometimes simply representative of the development of different cultural or economic practices than cannot be easily removed. As a matter of policy, the President should be encouraged to negotiate our differences on these matters rather than be required simply to retaliate. He should be given maximum flexibility to conduct such negotiations along with adequate leverage to obtain results; and control of this process, because of its delicacy, should be centralized in his office rather than throughout the various agencies.

This bill meets that standard by:

(1) clarifying present law to include specific references to reciprocal market access and national treatment as principles the President can act to maintain or promote;

(2) clarifying present law to insure that it applies to goods, services, and investment;

(3) focusing attention on reciprocity/national treatment issues through specific references to them in the statute and through the special procedures and authorities created for them;

(4) providing new retaliatory authority in the form of provisions on federal procurement policies, "mirror image" legislation using expedited procedures, and Presidential requests to regulatory agencies;

(5) increasing our negotiating leverage through the requirement that retaliatory actions under consideration be made public midway through the GATT process;

(6) broadening the base of the law by permitting Congress, by committee resolution, to file a complaint.

NEED FOR THE BILL

The bill is necessary because:

(1) It is not sufficiently clear in existing law that non-GATT violations involving reciprocity or national treatment are proper subjects for a 301 inquiry. Examples of probable non-GATT issues are the Canadian energy policy, the Canadian foreign investment review process (FIRA), and investment-related performance requirements generally, including equity ownership limits, and forced licensing or research and development transfers. The GATT process, of course, would also not be applicable, even in the case of a violation, to cases involving countries that do not belong to the GATT, like Mexico.

(2) Barriers to investment are not adequately reachable under current law, nor does the President have authority to retaliate against investment in this country.

(3) The President lacks explicit negotiating authority to deal with these matters on a bilateral basis.

(4) Presidential retaliatory authority in present law is not sufficiently clear, and there are few precedents to provide guidelines.

(5) Present law contains no authorization to begin negotiations on an International Investment Code.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 140

At the request of Mr. MATHIAS, the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. EAST), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND), and the Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS) were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 140, a joint resolution designating February 11, 1982, "National Inventors' Day."

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 63—THE ALL TAXPAYERS ASSISTANCE RESOLUTION

Mr. ROTH (for himself, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. SPECTER, and Mr. SARBANES) submitted the following concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

S. CON. RES. 63

Whereas the Internal Revenue Code is becoming increasingly complex and difficult to understand for the average American taxpayer:

Whereas the Internal Revenue Code has become so complex that the Internal Revenue Service currently provides a free program, known as the "taxpayer's assistance program", to aid taxpayers in preparing their annual federal income tax returns;

Whereas the taxpayer's assistance program provided service to over 43 million American taxpayers in preparing their federal income tax returns in fiscal year 1980;

Whereas, in fiscal year 1980, the equivalent of 5,591 staff years was devoted to assisting taxpayers in preparing their federal income tax returns;

Whereas the program served 100 percent of all taxpayers requesting tax assistance in fiscal year 1980;

Whereas it is currently estimated that the number of taxpayers requesting tax assistance in fiscal year 1982 will increase by 7 percent over fiscal year 1980 levels, from 43 million to 46 million taxpayers;

Whereas the proposed appropriations for the taxpayer's assistance program for fiscal year 1982 will substantially reduce both the number of staff and the amount of time that will be available for the IRS to assist taxpayers;

Whereas the Internal Revenue Service will only be able to assist some 76 percent of all taxpayers requesting tax advice because of the proposed reduction in fiscal year 1982 appropriations;

Whereas the taxpayer's assistance program is the basic and only means of tax advice available to the majority of American taxpayers who simply cannot afford to retain private tax consultants;

Whereas the proposed reductions in appropriations for the taxpayer's assistance program would explicitly minimize taxpayer services and revenue collection efforts: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the budget and appropriations for fiscal year 1982 of the Internal Revenue Service's taxpayer's assistance program shall not be reduced below the level required to permit a full 100 percent response and service by the Internal Revenue Service to all taxpayers requesting assistance and service in fiscal year 1982.

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I am submitting today a concurrent resolution of Congress which will insure that American taxpayers continue to receive free tax advice and service from the Internal Revenue Service.

Mr. President, our current tax law has become so complex and difficult for the average American taxpayer to understand that the Internal Revenue Service provides a free program known as the taxpayer's assistance program. This program aids taxpayers in preparing their annual Federal income tax returns and also serves as the basic source of tax advice for most of working America.

In fiscal year 1980 this program provided assistance to over 43 million American taxpayers in preparing their tax returns. In that year the equivalent of 5,591 IRS staff-years was devoted to assisting taxpayers in preparing their returns. The IRS responded fully to 100 percent of all taxpayers requesting aid in 1980.

This year the number of taxpayers requesting tax assistance is expected to increase by 7 percent over the 1980 level from 43 to 46 million taxpayers.

It is therefore important that the taxpayer assistance program be maintained at its current level. It is there to serve the vast majority of low- and middle-income citizens who make up over 75 percent of the taxpaying public. The program is quite possibly the only positive perception of the Internal Revenue Service these citizens have.

However, the Treasury, Postal Service, and general appropriations bill for fiscal year 1982, as revised by the administration, would significantly reduce the funding for this invaluable program. Moreover, it appears likely that unless Congress acts to prevent it, the entire program will be discontinued by the end of fiscal year 1983.

At a time when our Tax Code is becoming increasingly complex, we should provide greater, not fewer, services to our Nation's taxpayers. Indeed, how can the Government expect the average working man or woman to comply with the system and pay his or her taxes when it takes an expert in the field of taxation to first decipher what is expected.

On December 14, 1981, the Finance Committee unanimously approved a sense of the Senate resolution to preserve the taxpayer's assistance program.

Today, I am introducing an identical concurrent resolution, the all taxpayers assistance resolution, which will maintain the program at a level that will permit the IRS to fully respond and provide assistance to all taxpayers requesting advice in fiscal year 1982.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 313—RESOLUTION RELATING TO EMPLOYMENT SERVICES

Mr. HEFLIN (for himself, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. BOREN, Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, Mr. CHILES, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. EXON, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. LONG, Mr. NUNN, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. STENNIS, and Mr. ZORINSKY) submitted the following resolution; which was ordered held at the desk until the close of business on February 9, 1982:

S. RES. 313

Whereas, unemployment in the United States has risen to 8.9 percent with over 9 million Americans out of work; and

Whereas, Employment Service offices throughout the United States have been closed or are scheduled to be closed in the near future because of appropriation reductions in the area of employment services; and

Whereas, it is essential that employment services be used to help people find jobs; and

Whereas, the President has recognized the need to restore adequate funding to this vitally needed service and has therefore requested a $2.3 billion supplemental appropriation for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Congress should expeditiously consider making an urgent supplemental appropriation to the Department of Labor for the restoration of employment services for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982.

THE CRITICAL NEED FOR EMPLOYMENT SERVICES

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am today submitting a resolution expressing the sense of the Senate that the Congress should expeditiously consider making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982. One of the major purposes of this appropriation would be to restore adequate funding for employment services, which was drastically reduced by the continuing resolution this Congress passed during the final hours of the last session. The reduction in funding for employment services contained in the continuing resolution, has brought employment services to a standstill in every State. This is certainly unwise at a time when nearly 9 million Americans are unemployed.

The drastic rise in unemployment in our country has become a problem of the highest priority. Our Nation's unemployment reached 8.9 percent in December, which is one of the highest monthly levels our country has experienced in recent decades. Even more alarming is the fact that a drastic reduction in this rate is not foreseeable in the immediate future. The administration yesterday revealed that it is projecting 8.9-percent unemployment to become commonplace and be the average monthly rate for 1982.

My home State of Alabama has been hit very hard by high unemployment which has resulted from the economic decline of several key industries. The northern part of Alabama has suffered the consequences of massive layoffs as a result of slumping automobile sales which has caused manufacturing facilities to close their doors. The automobile industry decline has also resulted in higher unemployment among related industries, such as the tire industry in Gadsden, Ala., where unemployment rates have recently exceeded 17 percent. In addition, the depressive decline in new construction starts has resulted in a higher jobless rate within the construction industry throughout the State of Alabama. Another major factor in the high unemployment in Alabama has been the decline in the steel industry which has played an integral role in the economy of Alabama. These are but a few examples of the decline in economic prosperity in Alabama which has reulted in such a high rate of unemployment for the State. In one town, as many as 1 out of every 6 employees was unemployed at the end of 1981. That is an unemployment rate in excess of 17 percent. The overall unemployment rate for Alabama in December was an alarming 12.1 percent.

The effects of an unemployment rate of this magnitude are devastating. In the State of Alabama alone, the reduction in funding for employment services has resulted in staff reductions of 441 persons. In terms of employment service personnel alone, this represents a 47.6-percent reduction in staff since midsummer of 1981 and the closing of some 25 employment service offices throughout the State. Budget reductions in this vital area have clearly gone beyond the intended purpose of eliminating waste and fraud in the Federal bureaucracy, but rather have encroached upon the soundness of a valid program which renders a worthy service for those Americans who are unemployed. It is unwise to reduce funding for a program which is needed now more than it has been in recent years to address one of the greatest ills facing America today.

High unemployment has a tremendous impact on the stability of our economy and therefore affects us all. Accordingly, we must do all that we possibly can to see that the spiraling unemployment we are experiencing today is halted. One way to address this problem is through a sound employment service program.

The recent reduction in employment services will not serve to provide relief for the unemployed; rather it will result in the virtual elimination of a valuable service to the unemployed of this country. The employment service program provides valuable State assistance to the unemployed through job placement activities, counseling, testing, and other services which are direly needed during times of high unemployment.

In the coming days, the House of Representatives is expected to enact legislation restoring adequate funding to employment services. The President has called for a supplemental appropriation to take care of this situation. By custom, appropriation bills originate in the House of Representatives and pass there first. The purpose of my sense of the Senate resolution is that when it does reach the Senate we can give expeditious action to the proposed supplemental appropriation to restore employment services to the Department of Labor.

At a time when nearly 9 million Americans are unemployed, I wholeheartedly pledge my support to this effort to restore the backbone to one of the few programs we have which serves the function of placing people in jobs and removing them from the increasing ranks of the unemployed.

I trust that this legislation will receive prompt action in the House of Representatives and I urge my colleagues to place their undivided support behind this legislation when it comes before the Senate.

I ask unanimous consent that this resolution stay at the desk until the close of business on Tuesday of next week while exploration is undertaken to see whether or not we can agree to this sense of the Senate resolution without going through the regular committee process.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I am sponsoring this resolution with Senator HEFLIN to express the crucial need for this urgent supplemental of $2.3 billion for employment services and unemployment extended benefits. Like many of my colleagues, I have been alarmingly aware of effects on employment services in Florida due to the substantial cutbacks in funds for unemployment programs in 1982. In my State, there was a good possibility that all of our branch employment service offices could have been closed. This comes at a time when unemployment in Florida has risen over 2 percent in a year and is as high as 14 and 12 percent in the Lakeland and Panama City areas.

During this trying recession, Florida has had a continually growing number of skilled and lesser skilled workers in the unemployment ranks. It is true that the general trends of growth in industry and the labor market will open up jobs in the workforce for some of the more skilled workers. However, the lesser skilled workers are more likely to remain unemployed and, therefore, an increasing burden on the unemployment insurance program and public assistance. These lesser skilled workers are not going to find jobs in the classifieds. Many of them need the special training and placement provided by the employment service programs. Florida's employment service offices have been successful in providing training, counseling and placement for many lesser skilled workers, disadvantaged workers and veterans. In fact, Florida has ranked first among the southern region States and second in the Nation in placement productivity. These efforts would be at least cut in half if the present budget cuts continue. We cannot afford this significant regression.

Mr. President, the recession hits Florida a little later than it hits the rest of the country, but we are not immune to its problems. It hits us hard especially when coupled with our special problems with staggering numbers of refugees, the citrus freeze, and declines in tourism. Like most States, our chief industries have been shocked by the skyrocketing interest rates and economic growth has been crippled. The slack in these industries has been the catalyst for our high unemployment.

That is why it is absurd for budget cuts to be directed at efforts designed to curb unemployment. We must continue to provide the necessary programs to assist with training, retraining and placement of the unemployed. We must utilize every economic defense we can muster to combat unemployment while we also strive to bring down the deficits and inflation. The employment service programs have been helping the unemployed. We must continue to help them. This is the worst of times to abandon any efforts to fight unemployment.

I urge my colleagues to support this urgent supplemental so that the funds can be expedited to the States. Many employment offices are scheduled to close this week and this must be avoided.●

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, statistics to be released tomorrow will reveal that almost 10 million Americans are unemployed. Economists suggest that we are in a recession, but for each of those 10 million people who are out of work, our economic situation is an intense personal disaster.

I believe one of our highest national priorities must be to put our people back to work in productive, private sector jobs. That is why I am pleased to join Senator HEFLIN in cosponsoring Senate Resolution 313 which expresses the sense of the Senate that necessary Federal funds should be restored to State employment service programs. At a time of record unemployment our efforts to assist people to return to productive participation in our Nation's work force makes eminent good sense. It is a sound investment in our future.

So, Mr. President, even at a time of tight fiscal discipline, I am fully prepared to support the President's request for additional Federal funding to help respond to the unemployment crisis.

I want to make it clear, however, that my support for this initiative includes the expectation that the Secretary of Labor will exercise his discretionary authority to allow each State maximum flexibility and discretion in allocating its share of these funds between the administration of unemployment benefits and placement services.

In the State of Texas, for instance, the employment commission has a proven record of successful performance in finding jobs. The Texas Employment Commission is one of the 10 largest State employment agencies nationwide. It ranks first in the number of individuals served and second in job placements made. In carrying out its responsibilities the TEC makes a special effort to assist small businesses and those unemployed workers for whom job placement can be especially difficult.

During 1981, for example, TEC found employment for some 47,000 veterans, more than 100,000 youth, close to 29,000 older workers, more than 12,000 food stamp recipients, and some 14,000 disabled or handicapped individuals. Equally significant, TEC records indicate that Texans drawing unemployment benefits remain on the rolls an average of 12.7 weeks, as compared to a nationwide average of 14.6 weeks. In short, the Texas Employment Commission has demonstrated that it can reduce the drain on our unemployment trust fund by putting people back to work. That is a goal I know we all share, and I want to be sure that we do not place restrictions on these funds that will inhibit the TEC and other such agencies in doing their jobs.

Mr. President, the administration is to be commended for its commitment to increasing State and local control over Government programs and tax resources. Permittting local employment commissions to exercise their best judgment in allocating these additional funds will insure that agencies such as ours in Texas will make the most efficient and effective use of available resources.

I urge my colleagues to cast their votes in favor of the pending resolution.●

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

SUBCOMMITTEE ON LABOR

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, the Labor Subcommittee of the Labor and Human Resources Committee had scheduled a hearing on February 10, 1982, on S. 1748, the Multiemployer Pension Plan Stabilization Act of 1981. It is necessary to change the date for the hearing to March 11 and 17, 1982. The hearings will begin at 9:30 a.m. in room 4232 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building. Members of the public wishing to testify should submit a written request as soon as possible.

COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, the Senate Committee on the Budget will hold a hearing on the credit task force on Wednesday, February 10, at 2 p.m. in 6202 Dirksen Senate Office Building. Alan Greenspan, Clifford Hardin, Center for Study of American Business; Miner Warner, Solomon Brothers; and Jim Fralick, Morgan Guaranty are scheduled to testify.

For further information, contact Nancy Moore at 224-4129 of the Senate Budget Committee staff.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH AND GENERAL LEGISLATION

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Senate Agriculture Subcommittee on Agricultural Research and General Legislation has scheduled a series of hearings in February and March to consider legislation authorizing the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. A number of witnesses have been invited including representatives of the CFTC, various segments of the commodities industry and other interested parties.

The hearings schedule will be from 9:30 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. on February 26, March 1, 2, 10, and 11 in room 324 Russell Senate Office Building.

Anyone wishing further information should contact Denise Alexander or John Cozart at 224-2035.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AGRICULTURAL POLICY

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I wish to announce that an additional hearing date has been scheduled for the Senate Agriculture Subcommittee on Foreign Agricultural Policy's hearing on the economic impact of agricultural embargoes. In addition to the hearing today, the subcommittee will meet on Friday, February 5, to hear Secretary of Agriculture, John Block, discuss USDA's estimate of the costs of the 1980-81 grain embargo for both the United States and the Soviet Union. The Friday hearing will begin at 9 a.m. in room 324 Russell Building.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND MINERAL RESOURCES

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the public that the subcommittee hearing to review the capacity, distribution and status of the strategic petroleum reserve previously scheduled for Monday, February 8 at 10 a.m. has been postponed and will be rescheduled at a later date.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

CRIMINAL CODE REFORM ACT OF 1982

AMENDMENT NO. 1248

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. JEPSEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1630) to codify, revise, and reform title 18 of the United States Code, and for other purposes.

SENATE RADIO AND TV BROADCAST RESOLUTION

AMENDMENT NO. 1249

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. PRESSLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. Res. 20) to permit public and private broadcasting of Senate proceedings.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

S. 2027—ACID PRECIPITATION ACCELERATED REVIEW AND REPORTING ACT

● Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, on January 28, my colleague from West Virginia, the able minority leader, ROBERT C. BYRD, introduced the Acid Precipitation Accelerated Review and Reporting Act (S. 2027). This proposal is similar to one previously introduced in the House of Representatives by our concerned colleague from West Virginia, Representative NICK J. RAHALL.

This measure by Senator ROBERT C. BYRD gives to the Senate another approach to the questions raised by the intense interest in acid precipitation in many parts of our country and in Canada. I am today asking to be included as a cosponsor of S. 2027 to emphasize another approach to a complex legislative and environmental problem. I do not necessarily agree with every detail.

The Committee on Environment and Public Works is considering possible amendments to the Clean Air Act and will review proposals relating to acid precipitation in this context. At this time I do not support any specific approach, but I will continue to work with other Members to examine various recommendations, including that of Senator ROBERT C. BYRD. Out of this process I hope that we can develop amendments that realistically address this problem in a way that is soundly based scientifically and do not unnecessarily affect our ability to increase the production and use of coal. Such a balanced response to environmental and economic questions has long been a guiding principle of my work in these areas.

I commend Senator ROBERT C. BYRD and Representative RAHALL for their sensitivity to the need for more information on acid precipitation and to their concerns for the interests of our State. I am eager to cosponsor S. 2027 and to be actively involved with him, and other Senators, in the successful resolution of this difficult issue.●

● Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, on Tuesday an article on the plight of the Environmental Protection Agency was printed in the Washington Post. With the increasing amount of attention being focused on the Agency's state of affairs, the appearance of such an article is not particularly remarkable.

This statement, however, is remarkable in one significant way: It was written by Russell Train, former Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency and former Chairman of the Council on Environmental Quality under Presidents Ford and Nixon. I personally found his article to be extremely thoughtful and well written and ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The article follows:

THE DESTRUCTION OF EPA

The Environmental Protection Agency is rapidly being destroyed as an effective institution in the federal government. Current and planned budget and personnel cuts, if continued, will inevitably reduce the agency to a state of ineffectualness and demoralization from which it is unlikely to recover for at least 10 years, if ever. While some may greet this situation with enthusiasm, I am convinced that the business community, among others, has very little to gain and a great deal to lose.

I see EPA's mission as a critically important one. I am convinced that, in the long run, our free enterprise system can only prosper and grow within the context of adequately protected public health and environment. I am also convinced that responsible business leadership knows this and asks only that regulatory requirements be reasonable, cost-effective, have an adequate scientific basis, and be fairly and uniformly enforced.

Corrected for inflation since 1981, President Reagan's expected 1983 budget request for EPA will represent a reduction of approximately 45 percent. Administrator Anne Gorsuch has reportedly been working on 1984 numbers of $700 million, or a cut of 61 percent. EPA's research branch would be cut by two-thirds, far more than any other basic research program.

In the personnel area, the cuts are equally drastic. If Gorsuch is allowed to carry out plans that have been circulating within the agency for some time, by this coming June—one year and four months after the Reagan administration took office—80 percent of EPA's headquarters staff will have quit or been fired, demoted or downgraded.

It is hard to imagine any business manager consciously undertaking such a personnel policy unless its purpose was to destroy the enterprise. Predictably, the result at EPA has been and will continue to be demoralization and institutional paralysis. Attrition within the agency is running at an extraordinary 2.7 percent per month or 32 percent a year.

From an administration that quite rightly emphasizes the need for good management, what we are seeing at EPA is its very antithesis. Permits that businesses need do not get issued. Required rules and regulations do not get promulgated. Enforcement has ground practically to a halt. The most competent, technically proficient, professional staff have either already left or are looking for jobs. If one believes that effective environmental protection is essential it is tragic. If one is not necessarily an environmentalist but believes that our environmental programs need to be managed efficiently, scientifically and less burdensomely, the current situation is equally disastrous.

Congress and the courts will effectively impede the ability of the administrator to bring about substantial change by administrative action alone. But they will provoke an upsurge in lawsuits and more decisionmaking by confrontation. While adversarial approaches to conflict resolution seem to be deeply ingrained in American society, there have been encouraging signs lately of growing appreciation of economic realities within the environmental community and a greater environmental sensitivity on the part of the business community. A return to the early days of polarization benefits no one.

Many of EPA's difficulties over the years can be traced to the fact that Congress loaded the agency with far more statutory responsibilities within a brief period of time than perhaps any agency could effectively perform. Surely, those problems can only be compounded by drastically reducing its resources while its responsibilities remain the same or grow. When EPA came into being in 1970, it took over the air pollution, water pollution; solid waste, pesticide and radiation programs scattered around the federal government. Since then those programs have been broadened and improved, and Congress has added major new responsibilities—including the Toxic Substances Act, the Safe Drinking Water Act, the Noise Control Act, the hazardous waste control program, and Superfund. These are not hangovers from the concerns of prior generations. EPA has been on the frontier of today's concerns, and there is every indication in the polls that environmental protection remains high on the public agenda.

Environmental protection needs are not going to lessen if EPA becomes ineffectual. The kepone problems and the Love Canals will continue to crop up from time to time. Unless the public institutions charged with responsibility for handling such problems, there is real danger of a backlash developing against business. The pendulum will swing once more and in even more violent oscillations. EPA will be forced to react and will do so without adequate staffing and with a reduced research base. Business needs greater stability and predictability of policy, and for that it needs a credible EPA. The tendency of our political system to ignore the need for reasonable continuity in institutions and policies is one of it most serious failings.

As one who served two Republican administrations from 1969 to 1977 and who voted for President Reagan, I must record my profound concern over what is happening at EPA today. The budget and personnel cuts, unless reversed, will destroy the agency as an effective institution for many years to come. Environmental protection statutes may remain in full force on the books, but the agency charged with their implementation will be a paper tiger.●

THE "NEW FEDERALISM"

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, in President Reagan's state of the Union address, we heard his proposals for a "New Federalism." The President has proposed that we "swap" certain programs and responsibilities between the States and the Federal Government.

Hon. Ted Schwinden, Governor of the State of Montana, discussed these, "New Federalism" proposals in his state of the State message last month.

If the administration truly intends to forge a new partnership with the States, it is essential that we listen to what State leaders have to say about these proposals and work with them to find the best solutions. Governor Schwinden points out that "in fact, the New Federalism has yet to provide to the States either the flexibility, or the resources, essential to responsible decisionmaking."

These issues cannot be addressed piecemeal simply to help us cut the Federal budget deficit. Rather, we must work with State and local leaders and address difficult issues like the management and disposal of federally owned land, State energy severance taxes, the protection of our environment and our remaining wilderness and park lands, and providing for our national networks of roads, highways, and railroads.

I urge my colleagues to consider Governor Schwinden's remarks and to listen to other State and local leaders across the country. If we are to forge a New Federalism, we must go beyond cosmetic program-swapping.

I ask that Governor Schwinden's address be printed in the RECORD.

The address follows:

1982 STATE OF THE STATE MESSAGE

(By Governor Ted Schwinden)

1982—is it a crossroads in Montana history, or a year of business as usual? Today, I hope to identify the major issues that will affect us in Montana—this year and in the future. Tomorrow, and throughout the months and years ahead, Montanans will determine our response to those issues. That is the way it should be.

This Nation is experiencing a remarkable political transformation—a dramatic change in the relationship between State and Federal Governments. And we cannot ignore the long-term impacts of that change. America's Great Depression produced a political "solution" that, for nearly a half century, increasingly centralized decisionmaking in Washington, D.C. That process, and the public reaction to it, has produced a new "solution."

In a reform effort now labeled the "New Federalism," the Federal Government is returning decisionmaking and administrative authority to the 50 States. The initial transfer of program responsibilities has been accompanied by some relaxation of Federal control, and significantly lower levels of Federal funding.

The jury is still out on the long-term significance of the "New Federalism"—after all, who would have dared project the ultimate implications of the "Hundred Days" of Congressional activity in 1933! But "New Federalism" is real enough in 1982 to make it the single most important factor in Montana's future.

Federalism may be novel rhetoric, but as a philosophy, it's as old as Alexander Hamilton. For years, State and local officials have advocated a more equal relationship between State and Federal Governments. A major goal of the National Governors' Association since 1978 has been the restoration of a genuine federalist partnership. In theory, federalism—new or old—should offer Montanans the potential to design our own future, to tailor government programs to fit Montana needs, to set priorities consistent with Montana aspirations. In fact, the New Federalism has yet to provide to the States either the flexibility, or the resources, essential to reponsible decisionmaking. And it is increasingly apparent that Washington is much more anxious to transfer program responsibilities than to provide funding. Through direct cutbacks or by the preemption of revenue sources traditionally used by the States, the Federal Government can, and is, creating fiscal distress in many States. Last year, 30 State legislatures met in special sessions; at least 20 of the sessions were held specifically to deal with the impacts of Federal budget actions. And the reluctance on the Potomac to loosen Federal strings has denied the States the necessary flexibility to structure programs to meet State needs.

Montana has already experienced a few of the consequences of the New Federalism. They dramatically underscore the link between national political change and the State's economy. Between October 1, 1981, and January 1, 1982, 1,875 Montana families were taken off the rolls of the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program. The December 1981 unemployment rate is projected at 7.2 percent—the highest December level since 1975. Thirty-five new car dealerships closed last year in Montana. Federal highway dollars adjusted for inflation show that, in real dollars, we received only half as much Federal highway aid in fiscal year 1982 as we did in 1971.

What will the New Federalism mean for Montanans in 1982? First, proposed additional Federal funding cutbacks, combined with a depressed national economy, will mean more tough times ahead for all of us. Tough times and tough choices. Our managerial skills will be tested as we seek to maintain essential programs in the face of shrinking budgets and fewer public employees. Already, State agencies have taken steps to further trim budgets and payrolls in anticipation of further budget cuts. Last year, we eliminated nearly 400 positions in State government; not a pleasant task, but a necessary one. We have taken cost-cutting initiatives ranging from such major actions as the administrative reorganization of the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, which saved the State $1.6 million over the biennium, to my minor personal decision to remove the telephone from the Governor's car at a cost-savings of $1,855 a year. In short, we are proving to the skeptics that State government can identify waste, reduce fraud and minimize the inefficiencies that have too often characterized the public sector. A year ago, I pledged this administration to "cost-conscious, people-sensitive" government. I intend to keep that pledge.

Second, the New Federalism should provide us the philosophic foundation and the political opportunity to successfully assert Montana's right to participate in all decisions within our own borders, including those associated with the nearly one-third of this State under Federal jurisdiction. Federal decisions on wilderness designation, coal leasing goals, grazing regulations or timber harvest must reflect Montana's concerns, as well as national policy. And as the U.S. Supreme Court verified last year, Montana's battle to preserve the coal tax is firmly rooted in the State's protection of its sovereign rights.

Finally, a fully implemented federalism would provide the opportunity for leadership that I, and 49 other Governors, are anxious to accept on behalf of our States. Some doubting Thomases question the ability of States to meet the needs of their people. Those critics do not believe that the States can handle additional responsibilities. They are wrong, and the States ought to be given the chance to prove it. After all, if the Federal Government had done the job right, the public frustration that mandated an end to Federal arrogance and Federal domination would not have occurred.

A recent survey in the Helena Independent Record found, not surprisingly, that the average Montanan has little respect for government. Montanans believe that "people in Washington are out of touch with the rest of the country;" that "what you think doesn't count for much anymore;" and that "most people with power try to take advantage of people like yourself." While most mistrust is still aimed at Washington, State governments also suffer from a lack of credibility with the people. A well-run, responsive State government is needed, not only to minimize the tax burden on the public, but also to restore public confidence in government itself.

We made management of State government a top priority in 1981, and significant efforts were taken to increase the efficiency of program administration. In 1982, we plan to expand those efforts by enlisting the support and the expertise of the private sector to help us identify additional program inefficiencies and other opportunities for improvement in the executive branch. By working closely with the private sector to improve government operations, the State will also strengthen public/private relationships—an accomplishment that will be essential in realizing the other major goal of this administration in 1982—encouraging economic development in Montana.

Montana is a good place to do business, and last year we took steps to make it better. The new Department of Commerce has begun to improve Montana's business image. We have established a better working relationship with Montana's business community. In the process, we are easing the long-standing animosity and friction between public and private sectors. This administration is sending a clear signal to entrepreneurs, in- and out-of-state, that Montana State government is aggressively pursuing economic growth and job creation.

Let me make it clear—we expect no miracles. Economic growth is elusive in good times; during these uncertain economic times the problem is compounded. The expansion of existing business, or the attraction of new ones, is not an overnight accomplishment, but the pay-offs are well worth the wait. The pay-offs are jobs—jobs that will provide Montanans a decent wage—jobs that will allow them to stay in the State they prefer to call "home"—jobs that will permit our graduating students an alternative to leaving this State. The commitment of this administration to promote economic development is firm, and it is coupled to our determination to protect those values that make Montana a good place to live. Among this State's most valuable attributes in attracting new business are the relative absence of traffic jams and street crime, the abundance of breathable air and recreational opportunities. We can have progress, and retain our pride.

The Montana of 1981 was a Montana in flux. The Montana of 1982 must rise to the challenge of national political reform. We must accept the new responsibilities and, together with the other States, insist on partnership, not paternalism, in our dealings with Washington. The opportunity lies ahead to make the 1980s "the best of times" for Montana. The alternative is to abdicate our responsibilities and invite "the worst of times."

Those choices are ours, choices long sought as the inherent right of States. The choices we make will measure the sincerity of our past rhetoric, and establish the standards for our future generations.●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

● Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, the great American essayist and poet, Ralph Waldo Emerson, wrote that:

The sun will be taken out of the skies before the love of freedom will be removed from the human breast.

Nowhere is that more true today than in the Communist-dominated state of the Ukraine. For more than half a century now, the dark clouds of oppression have obscured the warm sunrays of freedom in that long-suffering land. But the quest for freedom continues to burn brightly in the breasts of the Ukrainian people.

Recently, Ukrainian Americans all across the country paused to observe the 64th anniversary of the Ukrainian declaration of independence, proclaimed in Kiev on January 22, 1918. As always, it was a bittersweet commemoration—a sad reminder of ongoing Communist domination coupled with a rededication to the goal of freedom for all Ukrainian people.

It is also a time for Ukrainian Americans to renew their commitment to preserving their rich culture in this country and to strengthen the bonds that exist between themselves and their oppressed brethren behind the Iron Curtain.

Mr. President, during the past few months, events in Poland have shown the world how quickly and brutally repression can replace freedom in Eastern Europe. As our thoughts and prayers go out to the people of Poland, so too should we express our solidarity and pay tribute to the 50 million Ukrainians under Soviet rule.

The love of freedom does indeed burn brightly in their breasts. And it will not be extinguished while those of us here remember and call attention to their plight.●

TAIWAN IS FREE CHINA

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, there is an old axiom of politics that one should never ignore one's base. However desirable it is to reach out to new constituencies, you should never forget the people who got you there.

I would like to apply that axiom to foreign policy, if I may. In the field of foreign policy, America's base can be considered to be those nations who are relatively free, relatively democratic, and relatively friendly. It is unfortunately true that there are few nations in the world that can meet the standards of the New York Times for the conduct of civil rights, but that does not mean that we cannot make distinctions.

Making those distinctions clearly reveals that the Chinese living on Taiwan are part of our base, while the Chinese living on the mainland are part of the constituency we are reaching out to. I have no objection to base-broadening in this context. I would like to have better relations with the mainland government, providing we can do so without eroding our base. After all, we used to call Taiwan—and some of us still do—Free China. No one has ever applied that adjective to the mainland nation.

I suggest, Mr. President, that in keeping our base from eroding across the Straits of Taiwan, the very least we can do is to provide the Free Chinese the defensive weapons they require. It was very disappointing, therefore, that over the recess the administration denied to the Taiwan Government the FX fighters it had asked for. I very much fear that we are ignoring our base for chimerical promises of broadened bases.

Mr. President, the syndicated columnist George Will has written very persuasively about this subject, and I ask that his remarks be printed at this point in the RECORD. Perhaps the administration will read them and rethink its political course. If not, my colleagues should be aware that we have a responsibility to keep the Nation's few friends on our side.

The article follows:

REAGAN NEEDS TO HELP TAIWAN

(By George F. Will)

Here we go again.

China (like some NATO nations, and Saudi Arabia) is acting as though it is doing America a favor by having mutually advantageous relations with America. China says the American proposal to sell arms, and especially the FX advanced fighter, to Taiwan is "a severe test" of whether America "truly values" relations with China.

Even in the State Department there is no obsession as incorrigible as the obsession of some persons with placating Peking. In December some members of that faction sent Secretary of State Haig the sort of awful memo he should have rejected with his famous testiness. It concerned "how to move urgently toward resolution of the Taiwan arms sales problem in light of the Polish crisis."

Seizing upon Poland as a pretext for doing what this faction is determined to do anyway, they suggest sending a delegation of themselves to urge the Chinese to do unspecified things against Russia. But, they say, the delegation's success would depend on a "favorable" (that is, unfavorable to Taiwan) decision on the FX. By "removing the specter of the aircraft," America could prevent a "precipitous Chinese reaction" to even the sale of spare parts to Taiwan, which could "unravel" and "rupture" U.S.-China relations. There should be no sales "exceeding Carter levels."

These dispensable (but, alas, not dispensed with) Carterites now serving Haig are urging Carter's policies on Carter's successor. They must think President Reagan does not remember candidate Reagan noting that Congress, "reflecting the strong support of the American people for Taiwan," forced changes in Carter's proposed Taiwan Relations Act. Carter's proposal did not even mention defense cooperation with Taiwan. The final act (Congress' preemptive leash on the State Department's appeasement reflex) committed America to providing Taiwan with defense arms "in such quantity as may be necessary to enable Taiwan to maintain a sufficient self-defense capability." This act obligates the President and Congress to determine appropriate arms "based solely upon their judgment of the needs of Taiwan." That is, based only on Taiwan's needs, not at all on Peking's desires.

Opponents of the sale argue that even with the FX, Taiwan's air force (currently 390 combat aircraft) could be overwhelmed by China's 5,000 combat aircraft. But it is tendentious to disregard the fact that deterrence is a function of the potential costs of aggression. And it is perverse to agrue that because Taiwan is vulnerable, America should make it more so.

China is too backward, economically, to cure its military weakness without the West's capital and technology. U.S.-China relations are rooted in that need, and in China's geography and culture (including ancient national and relatively recent ideological animosities that make it a counterweight to Russia). China is not apt to "rupture" relations with the United States in a fit of pique about an arms sale that is a matter of compliance with American law.

Candidate Reagan said: "I'm sure that the Chinese leaders would place no value on our relations with them if they thought we would break commitments to them if a stronger power were to demand it." Precisely right: by conforming to China's dictates regarding U.S.-Taiwan relations, America would prove that it is too pliable to serve China's interest in a cooperative balance of power against Russia.

Furthermore, the State Department's advocates of Peking's position are caught in a contradiction: if Reagan's refusal to allow Peking to veto American compliance with American law could cause an "unraveling" of U.S.-China relations, then those relations are too superficial to be important. The idea that selling FXs might provoke a rapprochement between China and Russia implies, implausibly, that the split is trivial, and that U.S. policy controls China's internal power struggle. This is a version of an apparently unsinkable fallacy, usually heard in this form: we must appease Moscow, lest the "hawks" lurking in the Kremlin's closets come to power.

The Taiwan issue waxes and wanes inversely with China's confidence in America as a partner against Russia. It waxes now in the wake of the Reagan administration's feeble response to Poland's crisis. Countering Russia is China's top priority, but if America is unserious about that, China probably reasons that it might as well gain ground on the relatively trivial issue of Taiwan.

Having sold to the uncooperative Saudis AWACS they did not need, Reagan will mock his past and undermine his future if he denies an ally aircraft it really needs. Peking recently failed to intimidate the Netherlands from selling two submarines to Taiwan, and then reduced its diplomatic representation in the Netherlands. America should be as unintimidated as the Netherlands, and should then see if Peking values relations with America as little as it values relations with the Netherlands. If Reagan does not sell the FX to Taiwan, he will have produced what he was elected to prevent: the continuation of Carterism.●

NATIONAL HARBORS IMPROVEMENT AND MAINTENANCE ACT OF 1981

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, much attention continues to circulate in this body regarding S. 1692, the harbor development legislation that I have been pleased to sponsor. This legislation was reported to the Senate by the Committee on Environment and Public Works on a vote of 13 to 3. This bill is now on the calendar.

Some outside interests, however, now seek to derail this bill, despite the need to develop our Nation's ports to increase exports. Much of this opposition appears totally unrelated to the merits or the specifics in this bill, or to the development of our harbors. Some other groups, I fear, appear to have grossly misrepresented the impacts of S. 1692, which are clearly laid out in the committee's report on the bill, Senate Report 97-301.

To help clarify just what S. 1692 does, and what it does not do, I ask that the general statement explaining the bill, which is contained in the committee report, be printed in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

[Excerpts from Senate Report 97-301]

GENERAL STATEMENT

S. 1692 redefines the Federal and the non-Federal role in harbor dredging. All new channel improvements will henceforth be financed entirely by the local sponsor. Maintenance dredging costs will be shared between the Federal Government and the local sponsor at more than 200 coastal and Great Lakes harbors.

The bill does not abrogate Federal responsibility. Rather it recognizes the value of a marketplace test on new construction dredging while reconfirming the Federal commitment to maintain all of our Nation's deep-draft harbors at their existing dimensions.

The Committee recognizes fully that this bill proposes dramatic changes in financing future harbor development work. But the Committee is convinced that such a change represents the only practical method to establish national investment priorities. The bill will encourage the dredging of the most economically sound projects in a timely manner and thus increase the Nation's capacity to handle world trade.

Shifting the cost of channel deepening projects to the private sector depends on the willingness of shippers to pay somewhat higher port costs, in gain for early action on projects providing a net economic gain to those same shippers. The cost to shippers and the economy of perpetuating the present cumbersome and inefficient system of congressional authorizations and appropriations for harbor projects far exceeds the added cost of such projects when paid for by the non-federal sector. Given limited Federal resources, the Committee concluded that the funds available should be directed toward maintaining existing ports at authorized depths.

While S. 1692 is based on these very practical considerations, the basis for its adoption transcends the reality of the Budget. It is the Committee's view that priorities for construction dredging work, essentially a commercial decision, are best set in the marketplace. Only by the establishment of investment priorities can the Nation expect to obtain, in a timely manner, the deep-draft harbors that are necessary to meet the rising demand for coal exports, while reducing the transportation costs of petroleum imports.

The bill also establishes an equitable system that will allocate the cost between Federal and local sponsors for on-going harbor maintenance, as distinct from construction dredging to new depths. As introduced, S. 1692 would have required that local sponsors pay 25 percent of all costs for maintenance on a port-by-port basis. However, many smaller ports have high costs of maintenance relative to the commercial cargo transiting the harbor. Therefore, the Committee adopted a limitation, called a "cap," on the level of cost recovery at these higher-cost harbors.

The Committee is convinced that the maintenance cost-sharing—at a maximum of 6.9 cents a ton, a negligible fraction of existing shipping or port costs—can be absorbed without any adverse impact on any particular port or to the shipping industry. To the contrary, it is anticipated that with the users of ports more involved in maintenance decisions, the port will work more effectively and efficiently.

DISCUSSION OF MAJOR PROVISIONS

A number of bills to alter current Federal policy on harbor development and maintenance have been introduced and referred to the Committee on Environment and Public Works. The Administration's bill (S. 809) would shift to each port the full cost of its annual maintenance dredging work, as well as future construction dredging still to be performed by the Army Corps of Engineers. Other bills offered variations on the existing policy, proposing authorization of specific projects or establishing differing levels of cost sharing.

S. 1692, as reported, addresses two distinct aspects of harbor dredging activity. Section

2 establishes policy for on-going yearly maintenance dredging that is necessary to keep harbor channels free of accumulated silt. Section 3 establishes a policy for construction dredging, where channels and harbors are dredged to dimensions deeper or wider than previously existed.

1. MAINTENANCE DREDGING POLICY

Since 1824, the Federal Government has dredged the main channels and harbors of the United States. Non-Federal interests have been responsible for certain other costs, such as diking for dredged disposal areas, and the dredging of access and berthing channels.

Expenditures on operation and maintenance usually vary from year to year at any given port. During one year, the Corps will often "overdredge" (still permitted under this bill) to a depth greater than authorized to alleviate the need for dredging the next year. Generally, this is a more cost-effective approach. However, with tight budget restrictions in recent years, a number of harbor projects have not been maintained at their authorized dimensions, and the backlog of maintenance dredging has increased. Occasionally, local authorities, not always satisfied with the level of maintenance provided by the Corps of Engineers, will undertake, at their own expense, additional maintenance dredging to increase the safety and utility of their shipping channels.

S. 1692 requires that the non-Federal interests pay a share of the actual cost of maintaining the main channels of each harbor. While the concept of direct cost-sharing is new to harbor maintenance, it is quite common in other areas of transportation and public investment. Federal-aid highways are constructed on a cost-sharing basis, with full maintenance responsibilities reverting to the State. The sewage treatment plant construction program, administered by the Environmental Protection agency, requires local sponsors to cover all operation and maintenance costs of the plant, after receiving a 75 percent Federal construction grant. Local sponsors of a Corps of Engineers flood control project must agree prior to the initiation of Federal construction to operate and maintain the completed project. The cost-sharing provisions of S. 1692 are not different in concept from these other existing cost-sharing arrangements in Federal public works programs.

The Committee considered a variety of alternatives for collecting the non-Federal share of the maintenance costs. The two basic options are:

(1) Local financing of all maintenance dredging at each port; and

(2) A national uniform fee, where each port, regardless of its own costs, would be assessed a uniform fee for each ton of traffic at the port.

The Committee rejected both of these extremes. Because a wide variation in maintenance costs relative to port traffic exists, a requirement that every port pay a flat percentage of its costs could prove detrimental to a smaller port and some with extremely high maintenance costs.

The Committee also rejected the uniform fee. It would force some ports to cross-subsidize others, encouraging economic inefficiency. Furthermore, the uniform fee concept assumes that all ports: (1) are in a state of equilibrium with one another; and (2) offer shippers identical charges for other port services rendered. If this were true, the differential in dredging fees among ports might produce some minor diversion of traffic. As the charts contained in the section of this report on local effects indicates, shippers do not offer identical charges and total transportation costs for the same commodity vary considerably.

Furthermore, ports which may be near each other do not necessarily compete with one another for the same traffic. Shippers at inland origins often choose between the Gulf Coast and the East Coast or the West Coast and the Gulf Coast, rather than between two adjacent ports on the same coast. Charges for all port services along the coasts now vary considerably. Maintenance fees will not alter the general flow of traffic to various ports any more or less than common fluctuations in these other transportation costs.

The Committee considered several alternatives and agreed to a compromise intended to protect the balance among ports, while fostering the discipline of port-by-port cost recovery. The Committee approved a 25 percent non-Federal share, but limited the non-Federal share for the higher cost ports. This limitation is referred to as the "cap."

The following steps describe the process:

1. The Corps of Engineers will annually calculate its total national maintenance dredging costs for channels and harbors over 14 feet in depth for the next fiscal year.

2. Using the latest available statistics, the Corps shall also calculate the total tonnage of import, export, coastwise and lakewise traffic moving through these ports aboard vessels engaged in commercial waterway transportation, drawing 14 feet or more.

3. By dividing the total national maintenance cost by the tonnage, the Corps will calculate the average national maintenance cost per ton of cargo.

4. After the average level of cost recovery is reduced to 25 percent of that national average, the maintenance "cap" is set at 150 percent of that reduced per-ton level.

Sample Computation of Average National Fee:

Total traffic in 1978=1,839,723,900 tons

Annual operation and maintenance cost of deep-draft channels and harbors (recent five-year average, stated in 1982 dollars)=$337,000,000.

Average national maintenance fee at 100 percent recovery. ($337,000,000 divided by 1,839,723,900 tons)=18.3 cents per ton.

Average cost under S. 1692 (25 percent recovery)=4.6 cents per ton.

The cap for any port under S. 1692 (50 percent above 4.6 cents per ton)=maximum recovery level of 6.9 cents per ton of cargo.

5. For each port, the Corps will establish the annual cost of maintenance. The Corps also would establish the theoretical non-Federal share of the annual maintenance, at 25 percent of the costs to be incurred by the Corps. For example, if the Corps intends to spend $1,000,000 annually at a particular port over the next five years, the non-Federal share of the cost would be $250,000 annually.

6. The Corps will calculate the seagoing and lakewise cargo moving through a specific port for the preceding calendar year. For example, the total annual tonnage at the port might be 10,000,000 tons. In this case, the Corps would compare the theoretical non-Federal share of the maintenance cost, $250,000, to the cost if the maintenance cap were applied (6.9 cents/ton times 10,000,000 tons equals $690,000). The non-Federal interest would then be required to pay the lower figure, or $250,000.

7. If the harbor's tonnage were only 1,000,000 tons (instead of 10,000,000 tons), the maintenance cap would take effect, and the non-Federal interest would be required to pay $69,000 annually, since that is the lower figure.

The Committee recognizes that the provisions for a cap will substantially reduce the overall non-Federal share. But the Committee is convinced that the cap represents a sound compromise, protecting all ports.

This bill does not require that the non-Federal interest utilize any specific mechanism to raise funds to cover its non-Federal share of maintenance. The Committee recognizes that each non-Federal interest is best able to determine how its share should be raised. If the non-Federal interest decides to impose cost-recovery user fees, it is free to establish a fee structure best suited to its traffic volume and commodity mix. However, to provide some perspective, if a port recovered all of its maintenance costs through a user fee imposed on all tonnage, the per-ton additional costs under S. 1692 range from less than a penny a ton at ports such as Portland, Me., Los Angeles, and Seattle, to a maximum of 6.9 cents a ton at ports such as Savannah, Ga., Charleston, S.C. and Portland, Ore.

The only exception to this approach would occur if a port undertakes construction dredging after January 1, 1981. If that occurs, the non-Federal interest would be required to pay 50 percent of the maintenance costs for the particular channel expended. This will likely occur at the low-cost, high-volume ports and the cost will be substantially offset by the savings to shippers which will result from port expansion. The 25 percent and the cap would continue to apply on the remainder of the harbor.

Tables in this report analyze a variety of costs now associated with the transportation of goods and commodities. For example, the following table represents a typcial movement of grain from Montana to a customer in Japan. It shows that the maximum maintenance dredging cost of 6.9 cents per ton is only 4/100 of 1 percent of the value of the grain at a foreign market.

Cost of transporting a ton of Montana wheat

Producers price	$133.32
Seller expenses: Country elevator	3.50
Inland transport:
Average railroad cost	26.99
or truck to Lewiston, Idaho	19.60
Transfer at Lewiston	1.75
Barge to Portland, Oreg	5.43
Total	26.78
Cash price, Portland	163.81
Buyer expenses:
Ocean freight and current vessel port charges	10.33
Current cargo port charges	4.45
Delivered price—Japan	178.59
Maximum added cost of S. 1692	0.069

Later tables show the total estimated cost of transporting a ton of various types of cargoes from their point of origin, through the specified U.S. port, to a harbor destination in Europe or Asia (or vice-versa). For general cargo, these overall transportation costs for containerized freight (where the greatest competition appears to exist among ports), range from $180 to $280 a ton. Similar costs for grain ranges from $27 to $34 a ton, while petroleum costs range from $3.39 to $10.47 a ton, assuming delivery to a distribution terminal.

These charts also identify the substantial difference that now exists among ports in charges for handling and processing identical shipments. While some ports have expressed concern over the potential of "diversion" caused by harbor maintenance fees and the disruption of "competitive equity," equity does not exist now.

Most significant, the charts illustrate that on any criterion—from a percentage of total transportation costs to a percentage of current port fees—partial cost-recovery of harbor maintenance expense represents a very small fraction.

2. CONSTRUCTION DREDGING POLICY

S. 1692 provides a new approach to future dredging to deepen or widen harbors. The bill requires that all new construction dredging be financed by non-Federal interests, allowing the market to determine the projects with the highest priority and greatest economic efficiency. S. 1692 also includes a fast-track provision that limits the processing and review of all necessary Federal permits to a period of two years.

Current Federal policy provides for new harbor dredging decisions to be made through specific Congressional authorizations and specific appropriations. Congress authorizes a study for a construction project, the Corps of Engineers performs the study, estimating the costs and economic benefits. If the project has benefits greater than its cost, the project is likely to be authorized, and perhaps funded.

Traditionally, Federal expenditures have been spread broadly, but thinly, among the nation's ports. Rather than target the Federal investment, funds and work have been distributed widely among many ports along the four coasts; 48 ports now have authorized depths of 40 feet or more. When one port obtains a deeper channel, many others have sought and received the same.

While valuable in the past, this approach now thwarts the nation's ability to develop the deep harbors needed to handle the larger, more cost-effective superships. Most studies set the cost of a typical 55-foot harbor at close to half a billion dollars. It appears highly improbable that the Federal government will finance work, in any timely manner, on any of the 34 ports that have been identified by the Federal Coal Export Task Force as potential sites for major coal export harbors.

In a recent study, the Office of Technology Assessment came to this conclusion:

Dredging projects presently take decades to progress through the various stages from project proposal to completion. This system is seen by authorities as seriously impeding the growth of U.S. bulk-cargo capabilities.

In testimony before the Committee, a panel of port representatives agreed that only one to four deep-draft ports were needed initially for coal exports. However, the port representatives agreed that if the Federal Government funded the full cost of development, as occurs now, there could be as many as several dozens ports interested in expanding their capabilities to coal port status. If the Federal Government continues to fund new development, a number of 55-foot ports may exist by the early years of the 21st century. However, the necessary one to four 55-foot ports are unlikely to be developed in this decade.

Unless Federal policy is altered to recognize and encourage local initiative, the slow and often fruitless pace of development seems certain to continue. This means that the vast opportunities for increasing export trade will be missed. Anything that involves Congress directly in the process of port-by-port authorization or appropriation is likely to significantly delay the process of development, while attracting more ports into the bidding for 55-foot channels.

There is a need to obtain those few deep harbors quickly. To accomplish this goal, a politically neutral force—the marketplace—should become the controlling factor in site selections. The Committee has concluded that a system of local financing, where a port authority or local government must go to the bond market and potential users to test the economic viability of the project, provides such a neutral force.

The new policy to require local interests to finance all future harbor improvements recognizes that any decision to expand a particular harbor is essentially a commercial decision. Therefore, the marketplace should be utilized to determine future actions. Harbor construction dredging projects will be achieved in a more timely and economical fashion when the decision is made by the interested parties, rather than the Federal Government.

Harbor expansion at a specific location in most cases provides marginal benefits to national commerce as a whole. The major beneficiaries are the commercial enterprises that ship through the particular harbor, as well as the ocean transport companies berthing there. This view is corroborated by the Corps of Engineer's own method of calculating the benefits of deep-draft improvements.

Under the Corps' regulations on the evaluation of navigation benefits, the basic economic benefits from the deep-draft features of water resources projects are the reduction in the cost to transport commodities and the offsetting increase in the value of goods and services. Transportation savings may result from the use of larger vessels, more efficient use of vessels, reduction in transit time, lower cargo handling and tug assistance costs, reduced storage costs, and the use of water transportation rather than an alternative land mode.

This is the method used by the Corps to justify navigation projects to the Congress. All of the so-called national economic development benefits are stated in terms of benefits to commercial users of the projects. If the Federal Government uses such an evaluation to justify a $300 to $500 million construction project to the Congress, a similar analysis should be as compelling to non-Federal financing bodies. Otherwise, the very basis of the Corps' evaluation procedures must be called into question.

Present transportation costs to move coal from the East Coast to Europe are about $18 per ton. According to studies by the Office of Technology Assessment, this cost is subject to a savings of 30 to 50 percent ($5.49 to $9) through the use of larger, more efficient vessels. Other studies estimate the per-ton savings from the use of larger ships at $6 per ton of coal.

This is part of the economic equation. The other part is the anticipated growth in coal export traffic. The Federal Coal Export Task Force has estimated U.S. exports of steam coal at 197 million tons by the year 2000. The following are coal export estimates made by the National Coal Association:

U.S. COAL EXPORTS

[In million tons]

	1980	1985	1990
Total exports	90	110	143
Steam coal exports	23	52	85

Assuming average savings of $6 a ton, and assuming 53 million ton growth in export coal by 1990, the annual savings from deep harbors would be $318 million. This, of course, assumes only the growth in traffic is carried on the more efficient ships. If by 1990 all 143 million tons go aboard deep-draft ships, the savings would be $858 million annually.

Testimony to the Committee indicated that the annual transportation savings by 1990, through the use of deep-draft vessels nationally, would be $1.15 billion, with a $5 a ton in savings in shipment from the East Coast, and $7 a ton from New Orleans.

A recent study indicates the substantial benefits to be realized from deepening the main channels in Norfolk, Va. The report of the Chief of Engineers was submitted to the Secretary of the Army on November 20, 1981. Under this proposal, the main channels would be dredged to 55 feet, from a presently authorized depth of 45 feet. The Corps estimates, as of October 1981, that the total first cost of the project would be $480,000,000. The annual amortized cost for the project, over 50 years, is estimated at $38,334,000, using an interest rate of 7⅝ percent.

The annual cost of $38 million, of course, is considerable. If bonded by local interests over a shorter period, using more realistic interest rates on tax-exempt bonds, the annual amortized cost is likely to be higher, although it may be partially offset by the lower costs often available in non-Federal dredging contracts. But the key consideration must be the comparison between that amortized cost and the direct benefits that would flow to the shipping industry as a result of the increased depth.

The primary export traffic presently moving through Norfolk is coal. In 1980, 48,600,000 tons of coal were exported from Norfolk: traffic should be considerably higher this year and in future years. In its study, the Corps of Engineers, assumed benefits for the Norfolk project only on the basis of existing coal traffic. With coal traffic of 50 million tons a year, the annual savings in shipping costs from Norfolk would be $132,860,000. Larger ships, ones that are more economical in per-ton operations, would haul the coal.

This "savings" is nearly four times the annual amortized investment.

If traffic at Norfolk increases to 90,000,000 tons of coal a year—a tonnage on which current landside expansion plans are based—the annual savings to shippers at Norfolk from that $38,000,000 annual investment would be $224,160,000. With a crude oil refinery, the yearly savings at Norfolk rises to $253,000,000, according to the Corps' calculation.

If these economic analyses are valid, even with an error of as much as 100 percent, the private sector, working through a non-Federal public body, should be willing to make this investment on the basis of the significant return. If the non-Federal interests are unwilling to make such an investment, there would appear to be no true need for the projects, no matter who financed it.

The Corps is in the process of studying the feasibility of dredging several ports to 50 or 55 feet. Those at the top of the list include: Baltimore, Norfolk, Mobile, and New Orleans.

Estimate of costs per ton for new port construction, based on Corps feasibility studies and traffic forecasts developed by the consulting firm of Temple, Barker, and Sloane are as follows:

Harbor	Annual amortized cost[1]	Deep-draft tonnage	Cost per ton[2]
Baltimore	$36,413,000	32,451,500	$1.12
Norfolk	42,099,000	45,302,500	.93
Mobile	36,652,000	9,365,700	3.91
New Orleans	43,874,000	65,852,200	.67

[1] Based on 50 years; repaid with 10 percent interest.
[2] Assumes all costs to be borne by deep-draft vessels, benefiting from deeper channels.

With respect to Norfolk, the figures differ somewhat from those stated previously for Norfolk due to the difference in interest rate assumed. The cost-savings to deep-draft ships of using a deeper channel outweigh any potential user fees; otherwise, the project should not be built.

More importantly, however, the market would determine which ports should be constructed, and in what order. As discussed previously, port representatives testified the Nation initially needed only one to four ports at a 55 foot depth. With full Federal funding, close to 50 ports would compete for construction funds. If the Federal Government were to commit 50 percent of construction funding, the witnesses estimated that about 10 ports would be willing to finance the additional 50 percent. With requirements for 100 percent non-Federal financing for new development, the witnesses estimated three or four ports would be likely to finance this development.

The requirement to finance harbor improvements for channels is based on the assumption that our existing ports, developed over the last 200 years, provide adequate capacity for any national security need that could conceivably arise. According to the Maritime Administration of the Department of Transportation, a "Ports for National Defense" program has been established to assure that our Nation's ports could adequately and rapidly respond to a national defense emergency.

The Department of Defense has designated 27 ports throughout the Nation as necessary for the transport of troops, vehicles, and other military materiel. Other Federal agencies have further advised the Maritime Administration of their need for shipping other vital government cargoes. Our existing ports are more than adequate to acommodate increased shipments necessary to respond to any conceivable national defense emergency. It is therefore the view of the Committee that local financing of future harbor dredging will in no way jeopardize our Nation's readiness for a national emergency.

Less attention has been focused on local financing mechanisms, but it is an important issue. A number of financing methods are available for port development, and have been used in the past to finance other types of port facilities.

Ports already obtain financing for various aspects of harbor improvements. This not only includes dockage and storage facilities, but also channel improvements. There are several ways a port can finance new development.

General obligation bonds, backed by the assets of the port authority or other public agency, and repaid by an increased mil levy imposed on property. Such an option is particularly viable for ports which are part of a municipality, which have substantial assets and a sound cash flow.

Revenue bonds, with specific fees and/or assets pledged against the bonds. These are viable for ports with a sound cash flow, and those which have recently issued other bonds. Most large ports now use revenue bonds to finance new facility development. It is also an option for those ports which have long-term contracts with specific port users, because the port can demonstrate that revenues to pay back a high portion of the bonds are virtually assured.

Industrial development bonds are a mechanism to raise funds for specific facilities which will be used by corporate customers. The port authority uses its tax free status to issue bonds, while the industry pledges its assets against the bond. Numerous ports have used this approach.

Many ports have recently floated large bond issues and should be able to obtain similar financing for dredging. Mobile, New Orleans, and Norfolk, have each recently floated bond issues in excess of $100 million for facility improvements. This is also true for ports which have customers willing to enter into long-term contracts, or pledge company assets against bonds. Larger ports which seek major expansion have the financial history and the private sector customers to finance extensive development. The partnership which already exists between ports and commercial users of the ports will be strengthened as the port finances new development.

Ports of any size, of course, will be able to expand in a similar manner. Financing would be possible if the port authority obtained long-term contracts from port users, revenues from which would assure repayment of a portion of the bonds. State loan guarantees, at least for a portion of the bonds, would also facilitate financing. If the economic benefits can be realized, then the port will be able to finance this development. The private sector, and State governments will be expected to take a more aggressive role than in the past. This is appropriate, because the commercial users and non-Federal governments benefit to the greatest degree from such development.

Ports have other options to finance new development. In States where budget surpluses exist, State funds could be used to finance development, to guarantee loans, or as front money to be reimbursed with port user fees. If a port has a prospective large industrial customer, private financing could be obtained for a portion of the development, or industrial bonds could be issued. The port could employ a combination of any of these options to finance development.

3. HARBOR USER FEES

This bill also authorizes non-Federal public interests to collect user fees to reimburse them for their expenses under this Act. The language does not mandate user fees; rather, it is intended to give each non-Federal public interest sufficient flexibility to make its own financing decisions, and to develop a fee schedule compatible with the characteristics of its users and the benefits they receive.

The question of the constitutionality of such charges was raised by some witnesses before the Committee. The relevant sections of the Constitution, all in Article I, are as follows:

Section 8, Clause 1: The Congress shall have the Power to lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defense and general Welfare of the United States; but all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Section 9, Clause 5: No tax or Duty shall be laid on Articles exported from any State;

Section 9, Clause 6: No preference shall be given by any Regulation of Commerce or Revenue to the Ports of one State over those of another; nor shall Vessels bound to, or from, one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay Duties to another.

Section 10, Clause 3: No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any duty of Tonnage.

The Committee rejected the assertion that the sharing of the costs of operating and maintaining the navigable waters of the United States, or the recovery of costs for harbor improvements, could in any way be construed as a tax, duty impost, or excise on commerce between States or other nations. The maintenance fees contemplated in, but not specifically required by, this legislation are not for the purpose of raising revenue. Rather, they are to pay the costs incurred by non-Federal public bodies in servicing commerce at individual ports. Maintenance fees recovering harborwide costs are for a service rendered to vessels and their cargo. Ships now pay substantial sums in return for services rendered; the provision of a channel and its maintenance by the Corps or another agency is as surely a service to the shipper as pilotage, dockage, wharfage, or the many other services provided to a ship.●

DETROIT DISTRICT RECRUITING COMMAND

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I would like to congratulate the Detroit District Recruiting Command for its fine efforts to recruit qualified young men and women into the U.S. Army. Their dedication to this important job has led to great success with the recruitment of individuals wishing to serve their Nation in the Armed Forces.

During 1981, the Detroit Recruiting Command was responsible for enlisting a total of 4,365 individuals of whom 2,538 were high school graduates. The remainder were prior service members along with comparatively few non-high-school graduates. This accomplishment resulted in the Detroit District Recruiting Command being rated the best recruiting command in the Nation.

Today's Army faces the arduous task of filling an increased number of positions that require highly technical skills. Although this situation necessitates more rigorous recruiting and requires higher standards for recruits, the young men and women entering the Army have a much greater opportunity to advance in an increasingly technical society because of the experience gained through service in the U.S. Army.

The Detroit Recruiting Command faces yearly this great challenge which I am sure the command will continue to meet and to exceed. It is because of the tenacious determination of Army personnel such as Lt. Col. Gunter Seibert and his entire command that the Army will always remain committed to producing good citizens as well as excellent soldiers.

Again, I would like to congratulate the Detroit District Recruiting Command for its exceptional recruiting performance which is a responsibility that will always be vital to keeping our country strong.●

COAL PIPELINE IMPERATIVE

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, shortly before the end of the session last year, I joined as a cosponsor of S. 1844, a bill to grant to interstate coal pipelines the right of eminent domain. A related bill, H.R. 4230, was favorably reported by the House Interior and Insular Affairs Committee on January 29.

Under the Senate version, the Department of Energy, or its successor agency, will review each proposed project and must find that it is in the national interest before a permit is issued. I will explain today why the early enactment of this legislation has become a national imperative.

As a native of the West, I am keenly aware of the water concerns of individual States, and I am totally committed to the proposition that each State must control the allocation of its water to interstate coal pipelines.

I am also aware of the great contributions railroads have made and must continue to make to our Nation, and I am committed to the economic viability of our Nation's railroads.

As a conservative, I am committed to the proposition that the Federal Government should not assume to itself power and responsibilities that are traditionally reserved to State or local governments.

When S. 1844 is carefully examined, I believe it will be seen to meet each of these interests. Above all, the bill promotes competition and the free enterprise system, the economic strength of our Nation and a more secure America. For these reasons, I am convinced that the time has come to extend Federal eminent domain authority to interstate coal pipelines, subject to approval of each specific project by a Cabinet-level officer, who finds the pipeline to be in the national interest.

STATE WATER LAW

Before deciding to join in sponsoring the bill introduced by the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON) I made a close study of the major arguments both for and against this measure. Primary in my review was a thorough examination of whether or not the bill would have any negative effect on State water rights. I am now completely satisfied that the bill in no way will damage, reduce, or interfere with State water law and rights.

Mr. President, it is an understatement to declare that water is the lifeblood of Arizona and most of the other Western States. And, it is true that coal pipelines require water, 1 ton of water for every ton of coal that is transported.

Coal pipelines require less water, however, than do coal gasification plants, which require 2 tons of water for every ton of coal used. Or we could look at mine electric generating facilities that require up to 7 tons of water for every ton of coal used.

The fundamental issue is not how much water is used, but who will make the decision concerning the use of a State's water resources. S. 1844 contains specific language providing as total protection of State control of water as it is humanly possible to write. Even my good friend, Secretary James Watt, who opposed the eminent domain proposal on misplaced States rights grounds, testified that the measure puts State authority over water "forever beyond reach of Federal officialdom."

The State water law protections in S. 1844 might fairly be considered a political and legal victory for the States, because these provisions may provide greater legal safeguards than the States now possess. Under the bill, each State will decide for itself whether, for how long, and under what conditions State water shall be allocated to coal pipelines.

Section 6 of S. 1844 provides that existing State water law shall not be modified or overriden by the new law, even after a pipeline is approved and starts receiving water.

Moreover, section 6 also spells out protection for State water law against any possible challenge on grounds of preemption or supremacy by the Federal Government under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution.

In addition, section 4(c)(2) provides that nothing in the eminent domain authority created by the bill "shall be construed to permit any person to acquire any right to take, use, or develop water through exercise of the power of eminent domain."

Mr. President, I have full confidence these safeguards of S. 1844 will be legally binding and enforceable on the Federal Government. The opinion of the Supreme Court in the recent case of California v. United States, 438 U.S. Reports 645 (1978), written by Justice Rehnquist of Arizona, gives assurance that congressional directives protecting State water rights are valid.

This case involved an interpretation of section 8 of the 1902 Reclamation Act, which provides a disclaimer to the effect that nothing in the act shall be construed as affecting or interfering with any State water law relating to water used in irrigation. The California State Water Resources Control Board attached 25 conditions to a permit for a Federal dam project, and the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation must observe the State water law as provided by Congress in section 8 of the Reclamation Act.

Since the language of section 4(c)(2) and section 6 of S. 1844 is more sweeping and stronger in protecting State water law than the language of section 8, which has already been upheld by the highest court in the land, I have no doubt about the effectiveness and validity of the water law protection language in S. 1844.

RAILROAD COMPETITION

Mr. President, I will now turn to the issue of how the bill might impact on the railroad industry. Actually, I believe the bill will create a healthy competition among railroads and pipelines without injuring the railroad industry. Reputable economic studies, such as one by Data Resources, project that coal demand will be so great in coming years that even if all coal slurry pipelines proposed were to be built, rail-coal traffic must still increase by 44 percent over the next 10 years.

Passage of the bill would be in line with the efforts of Congress recently to replace Government regulation of railroad rates with market regulation. I am referring to enactment of the Staggers Rail Act in 1980. But regulation by the marketplace only works when there is competition. Coal pipelines can provide that competition.

Let me give a specific example. In 1957, the first intrastate coal pipeline was developed by Consolidation Coal Co. to transport 1.3 million tons of coal per year a distance of 108 miles from Cadiz, Ohio, to the Eastlake Power Plant of the Cleveland Electric Illuminating Co. Shortly after the pipeline began operation, the rail-coal haulage rate in Ohio was $3.47 per ton, while the pipeline haulage rate was $2.20 per ton. Eventually, the competing railroad reduced its coal rate to $1.88 per ton. The pipeline was then mothballed in 1963. By September 1973, the rail-coal haulage rate in Ohio had risen to only $2.39 per ton, attesting to the beneficial effects of competition in coal transportation.

Mr. President, it is an interesting fact that the Black Mesa coal pipeline of Arizona, which is the only active coal slurry pipeline in the Nation, is owned by a railroad. Southern Pacific Pipeline Co. is a sister company to the Southern Pacific Railroad. So pipelines are not necessarily incompatible with railroads.

The Black Mesa pipeline transports up to 4.8 million tons of coal across 273 miles of some of the most rugged terrain in my State to a powerplant located a mile inside the State of Nevada. This line has proven to be a reliable and cost-effective method for moving coal from Arizona to the Nevada power station.

STATES RIGHTS

Mr. President, I now come to the question of whether the legislation improperly interferes with State sovereignty. This is both a legal and political question. From the legal standpoint, many States cannot approve an eminent domain statute. Their constitutions forbid the exercise of this power unless there is a direct benefit in the particular State. A State through which the pipeline crosses, but where no coal is used or mined, might not be able to grant right-of-way authority. Other States which may have such authority might burden any permit down with so many conditions that it would no longer be practical to build the pipeline.

After giving long consideration to the issue, I am persuaded that this is an area of overriding national importance, which the States cannot adequately deal with, often because of legal impairments in their own constitutions. There are precedents for the Federal eminent domain authority. For example, Congress amended the Natural Gas Act in 1947 to grant the right of eminent domain to certificated natural gas pipelines. Oil pipeline projects had been granted similar authority at an earlier time.

Coal, gas, and oil pipelines, like the railroads, are all national means of long-distance transportation for moving goods from the location where they are produced to their markets. The grant of Federal eminent domain to one of these industries is consistent with the grant of similar authority to related industries, when wrapped in adequate safeguards to protect the overall public interest.

BENEFITS

Now, Mr. President, I will discuss the major benefits of S. 1844. I would sum up these benefits as energy independence, economic gains, and export potential.

First, energy independence. One of the proposed pipeline projects alone would bring 54 million tons per year of coal from Illinois and West Virginia to Georgia and Florida. This would satisfy up to half of the utility coal needs of these two States by 1990 and reduce oil imports by 63 million barrels annually.

Our Nation is still too dependent on foreign crude oil and our dependence creates national security and defense weaknesses. Yet the United States has a vast supply of coal, the greatest supply in the free world. Our coal can replace much of the crude oil we are using today. But coal must be moved efficiently and economically from mines to powerplants and industrial facilities.

The high cost of transporting coal is delaying and preventing many industries and utilities from using domestic coal resources. In fact, testimony at a recent hearing of Senator WARNER's Subcommittee on Energy and Mineral Resources, revealed that some American utilities found it cheaper to import foreign coal than to use domestic coal. The hearing also disclosed the fact that it may be more economical during the late 1980's to use South American coal in portions of the Southeastern United States, than to use coal from our own eastern mines.

This trend must stop. The competition from pipelines will help reduce coal haulage rates and assure that our Nation makes maximum use of its coal resources.

This brings me to the second major benefit, economic gains. According to a report dated May 1981 by A. T. Kearney, a highly reputable consulting firm, the proposed Coalstream pipeline in the East would save $61 billion of transportation costs to energy consumers in the first 20 years of operation. The $3 billion cost of the pipeline would be raised entirely from private capital. No public moneys are required for construction, operation, or maintenance. This single project would give the economy a great boost and help contribute to lower coal transportation costs.

Third, there is the export potential. I will use the example of the Coalstream pipeline again. The second stage of this project includes an export facility along the southeastern coast. No harbor dredging would be required. The export potential would help our balance of payments substantially. More importantly, it would enable the United States to supply some of the energy needs of Western Europe in case the Soviet Union uses the new Siberian gas pipeline project as a political weapon.

The Soviet pipeline poses a clear economic and security threat to our Nation by making Western Europe increasingly vulnerable to Soviet pressure. Europeans need energy. We have energy, in the form of coal, to offer them. Yet Europeans see rising inland coal transportation in our Nation and the failure of our Government to assure competition in coal haulage rates. Europeans can only conclude that we are not serious about supplying coal to Europe and this contributes to driving the European nations elsewhere for energy supplies.

We must pass eminent domain legislation to assure our allies that we are serious about developing our coal resources. Otherwise, they will find themselves becoming more and more dependent on Russian fuel supplies.

For these reasons, we must grant interstate coal pipelines the right of eminent domain. This is a national matter. It is not an issue we can leave to scattered decisionmaking with different outcomes in different States.

Determining the policy under which interstate coal pipelines should have eminent domain authority is the responsibility of Congress. We must decide that issue in the affirmative at the earliest possible date and get on with the business of developing our Nation's resources to assure that we are strong both economically and militarily.●

PRAISE FOR SENATOR BARRY GOLDWATER'S COSPONSORSHIP OF COAL SLURRY PIPELINE BILL

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I am extremely happy to welcome my distinguished colleague as a cosponsor of S. 1844. Senator GOLDWATER and I share many of the same views concerning our Nation's economic system, the proper relationship between the States and Federal Government and the need for a strong and secure America. I am pleased that we agree that the Nation needs interstate coal pipelines and that the national interest requires that the Congress enact this legislation to allow the development of these important facilities.

As chairman of the Water Resources Subcommittee on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, I share Senator GOLDWATER's view that the State water law protections that are contained in S. 1844 provide greater legal safeguards than the States now possess and may fairly be characterized as a political and legal victory for the States. This legislation provides unequivocally that the States will decide whether and under which conditions water resources can be used by interstate coal pipelines—and protects those State decisions against judicial challenge on commerce clause grounds. Moreover, access to Federal eminent domain authority cannot be obtained by a pipeline until water resources for the pipeline first have been obtained pursuant to State substantive and procedural law. These important provisions now give the States the flexibility to determine the best methods for developing and transporting the coal resources in their States without compromising their control over their water resources.

Mr. President, I encourage each of my colleagues to join us in supporting S. 1844. We all agree that the United States must become more productive and must develop new technology and new methods of operating if we are to compete successfully in an increasing international marketplace. This legislation will allow a vigorous new industry to be developed in our Nation and will be of real assistance in helping U.S. coal to compete effectively for both our domestic foreign markets. We will be remiss if we do not enact this legislation at the earliest possible date.●

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I would like to echo the remarks of my two distinguished colleagues, Mr.

GOLDWATER and Mr. MURKOWSKI. We are all quite appreciative of the outstanding support they have demonstrated for this most worthwile legislation. I would also take pleasure in announcing the recent cosponsoring of the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. HUMPHREY). I believe his support of the bill is indicative of the broad-based consensus within the Congress that the time has come for coal slurry pipelines.

In addition, recent actions on the part of private enterprise indicated that Congress is not alone in holding to this view. On Thursday, January 28, a broad-based coalition was established to work for the adoption of Federal eminent domain legislation for interstate coal pipelines. The coalition is named the Alliance for Coal and Competitive Transportation (ACCT). Founding members include the Consumer Federation of America, the American Association of Retired Persons, five major labor unions, the three major electric utility associations, the National Coal Association and the Mining and Reclamation Council, several associations that have been formed to work for lower coal costs and coal transportation costs, the Slurry Transport Association, the American Consulting Engineers Council, Cajan Electric Cooperative, and several State and local coal associations, including the Kentucky Coal Association, the Illinois Coal Association, and the West Virginia Coal Association. Other groups are likely to join this formidable alliance.

Mr. President, this coalition illustrates well the broad group of Americans that will benefit from interstate coal pipelines. Coal producers will have more marketing opportunities; America's workers will benefit from the jobs created by the pipeline projects and by the lower costs that will result from the projects; electric utilities will benefit directly from lower coal transportation costs; and the ultimate consumers of electricity will benefit from lower electricity charges.

Mr. President, the truth is that interstate coal pipelines and the competition they will provide are good for our Nation. I encourage all of my colleagues to join Senators GOLDWATER, MURKOWSKI, HUMPHREY, WEICKER, HAWKINS, BUMPERS, BRADLEY, MATSUNAGA, and myself in cosponsoring S. 1844 which will assure that America's railroads can no longer insulate themselves from competitive with these pipelines.

Mr. President, I ask that the press release concerning the formation of ACCT and the list of founding members of ACCT be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The material follows:

COALITION IS FORMED TO PROMOTE COAL TRANSPORTATION COMPETITION

WASHINGTON.—Organizations representing consumer, labor and industry groups have formed a coalition to promote more effective competition for the transportation of the growing quantities of American coal being used both here and abroad.

The Alliance for Coal and Competitive Transportation (ACCT) will concentrate its activities in support of pending legislation to grant federal eminent domain authority necessary for the expeditious construction of interstate coal slurry pipelines.

Founding members of ACCT include the American Association of Retired Persons, American Consulting Engineers Council, American Public Power Association, Building and Construction Trades Department (AFL-CIO), Consumer Federation of America, Eastern Coal Transportation Conference, Edison Electric Institute, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, International Union of Operating Engineers (AFL-CIO), Laborers International Union of North America (AFL-CIO), Mining and Reclamation Council, National Coal Association, National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, United Association of Plumbers and Pipefitters (AFL-CIO), Slurry Transport Association, Western Coal Traffic League, and Western Fuels Association.

Carl E. Bagge, chairman of ACCT, said competition in the transportation of coal is essential today to insure that railroads do not abuse their present monopoly position in shipping coal. For 85 percent of coal moved by rail there is no feasible alternative mode of transportation, he said.

"Legislation to grant coal slurry pipelines federal eminent domain authority that would allow them to cross competing railroad tracks and other properties has been consistently blocked by railroads for the last 20 years," Bagge said.

"They argue that competition from coal slurry pipelines would seriously hurt the regulated railroads by taking away profitable business. However, since Congress enacted the Staggers Rail Act, which reduced regulatory controls over the railroads, it is now absolutely essential that competition be allowed," said Bagge, who also is president of the National Coal Association.

Frederick Webber, vice chairman of the ACCT and executive vice president of the Edison Electric Institute, said that coal transportation is dominated by the railroads.

"If we are to have efficient, dependable and cost-competitive coal transportation, the nation must have an alternative system to benefit coal consumers," he said.

"Nearly every consumer in the United States will be affected in some way by sharply higher rates for moving coal to electric power plants, steel mills or other industrial plants if the railroads are allowed to continue to raise their prices without sufficient competition," Webber said.

Eighty percent of coal produced in the United States is consumed by electric utilities for the generation of electricity.

Peter Hughes, legislative counsel, American Association of Retired Persons, said, "In recent years, retired persons have been especially hard hit by rapidly rising energy prices."

"Retired people and other consumers will benefit from the construction of coal slurry pipelines even if a particular pipeline is not proposed to serve their area, because railroads will hold down pricing for coal shipments to prevent construction of this competing mode of transportation," Hughes said.

"All consumers, and especially senior citizens on fixed incomes, have an interest in seeing this transportation option have a chance to operate," he said. "More than half of the nation's electricity is now generated by coal. If coal can be more economically shipped to market, we can help moderate the rising cost of electricity," he added.

"Organized labor in the construction industry views coal slurry pipelines as an important, new transportation alternative," Robert Georgine, president, Building and Construction Trades Department, AFL-CIO, said.

"When completed, these lines will provide reasonable prices for coal which, in turn, will be of great value to consumers in the United States and they will allow our country to market more coal overseas," Georgine said. "Most importantly, they will provide thousands of jobs for workers in construction and related industries, where in some areas unemployment is over 10 percent."

Legislation that would extend eminent domain rights to coal pipelines is presently before both houses of Congress. In the House, H.R. 4230 has passed the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee in December and is under consideration by the Public Works and Transportation Committee. In the Senate, S. 1844 has been introduced and hearings by the Energy and Natural Resources Committee are expected to be held soon.●

THE ELIMINATION OF NONESSENTIAL GOVERNMENT FUNCTIONS

● Mr. EAST. Mr. President, at a time when we are being asked to reduce projected deficits by making major cuts in defense and social spending, I would like to remind my colleagues that it is still possible to save billions of dollars every year simply by eliminating nonessential Government functions.

At all levels of our federal system, government is producing goods and performing services that it could obtain more cheaply from the private sector. This practice is self-defeating to say the least. We not only waste money by doing things "in-house," we undercut private firms that pay taxes.

Although this problem has been recognized for years, it has never been satisfactorily addressed. Recently, however, the Reagan administration has undertaken fresh initiatives in this area, and I will shortly introduce a major piece of corrective legislation myself.

The need for economy in government is attracting greater public attention now than it has in many years. I would like to call my colleagues' attention to two articles on this subject that appeared within the past few weeks.

The first of these, a column from the January 18 issue of the Wall Street Journal, argues persuasively for "privatization" of many services presently performed by government. The second, a book review by columnist and author Allan Brownfeld, maintains that the American people can have better government at half the price if they are willing to rely more on the private sector.

I ask that both these items be printed in the RECORD as a springboard to further discussion of this issue.

The article follows:

PRIVATIZATION: NOBODY DOES IT BETTER

(By Susan Lee)

No doubt the new lean look in government spending has prompted a lot of nervous interest in just how the services traditionally provided by public agencies will be, or even can be, provided. But some of this interest also comes from a growing awareness that the government really isn't a very cost-effective provider of many of its services.

The justification for letting government provide goods and services centers on the notion of "public goods"—things that are important for people's welfare but are too expensive or too ill-defined to bill their cost to the beneficiaries of those things. National defense or some public-health activities are illustrations of public goods. It all sounds straightforward and reasonable, right? It isn't. Public goods are the result of a market failure, and that means problems.

The problem with public goods now in vogue is the problem of cost. Paying the bill for public goods, especially over the last decade, has been a rather casual affair: Government decides on what services to provide and then pays for them out of general revenues, or, in some cases, by charging a user's fee. (User fees are usually the merest of tokens and don't even begin to cover operating costs, let alone capital costs.)

However, it can—and is—being argued that if the users of public goods can be identified, then why shouldn't those users pay for the full cost of the goods? Indeed. Right off the bat, "full-cost-recovery," as it's inelegantly called, makes sense: Only the beneficiaries would pay. Creating a tie between pocketbook and service often leads to an abstemious, or more rational, use of that service.

An interesting application of full-cost-recovery user fees is about to start at the Federal Reserve. The Fed has always provided some services free to members—check collection, coin wrapping, coin and currency shipping, to name a few. Big member banks in turn offered these very services, courtesy of the Fed, to smaller non-member banks—but for a price. That clever bit of arbitrage more than repaid the member banks for having to set aside reserves at the Fed.

But under the Monetary Control Act of 1980 the Fed must offer these services at full market price to all comers. The simple fact of geography will make it possible and attractive for large banks to offer the same services to their regional banks at a lower cost or with greater speed. It is expected that these full-cost user fees will result in a stunning increase in competition and efficiency in the market for interbank services. And that will lead to a drop in the real cost of those services.

A second problem with public goods today is plain old government inefficiency. Government isn't inefficient because it's dumb or willful but because, quite simply, government lacks the flexibility and incentive to perform efficiently: The discipline of the market is absent. This immutable circumstance means that even if the burden of costs is shifted from all taxpayers to actual beneficiaries through user fees—the cost may be lower, but it will still be higher than it would be in the private sector.

The solution to this problem is bold enough to make full-cost-recovery look like so many baby steps. The solution is privatization—turning over government responsibilities to the private sector.

Privatization would be possible for the same reason that charging full-cost-recovery fees is possible—most services provided by the government aren't really public goods.

Often these activities have been run for the public sector for no better reason than that the government has simply been doing them for a long time. Some obvious, random examples: garbage collection and ambulance service at the local level or inland waterways operation and inspection of agricultural commodities at the federal level. There's no theoretical justification for government doing these things, especially since there is ample evidence that they would be forthcoming from the private sector if the government weren't doing them.

Air-traffic control looks like an agreeable candidate for privatization now. Airways are, after all, a "good." Just consider the number of commercial and general aviation roaring around the skies over LaGuardia—all wishing to land safely. It is a simple matter to charge these aircraft for the use of a safe landing route—the government already does that but in a way that isn't very cost effective.

Switzerland, Mexico and Saudi Arabia operate with private air-traffic control systems. The U.S. could, too. Robert W. Poole Jr., an engineer and author of "Instead of Regulation" (Lexington Books), has drawn up a plan to privatize the airways which has received an interested hearing from the FAA.

Privatization is no longer the cry of kooks, political misanthropes or earnest economists. It is an idea whose time has, well, started down the runway. Economic necessity, ideological favor and intelligent lobbying could make this historical moment an accommodating one for dismantling the public sector.

BETTER GOVERNMENT AT HALF THE PRICE

(By Allan C. Brownfeld)

As the Reagan Administration proceeds with its policy of cutting taxes and government spending, many have expressed concern about a possible deterioration in public services.

In a new book, Better Government At Half the Price (Caroline House, 1981) economists James Bennett and Manual Johnson of George Mason University state that taxpayers have, in fact, been paying more and getting less. They explain why government has not been and cannot be an efficient producer and show through numerous case studies that the private sector outperforms the public sector by producing goods and services for the public at a much lower cost.

They point out that, "Our interest in the comparison of the costs of production provided by both the public and private sectors is largely due to an accident. One of the authors moved to a new home a short distance from his old residence and still within the same political jurisdiction. Refuse collection was provided by local government in one location, but by the private sector in the other. When the change was made from public to private service, the price paid for trash collection was cut in half and the frequency of collection doubled. As economists who had never given much thought to such matters, the fact that private firms were willing to provide twice the service at half the price charged by local government came as a surprise . . . To our knowledge, there is not one case which has been reported that finds the public sector more efficient than the private sector."

Government employees, they argue, are no different from employees in private firms. Both respond to incentives in their economic environments to maximize their own self-interest. In government, employees are not punished for being wasteful but are, in fact, rewarded for inefficiency. In the private sector, waste cannot be tolerated because competition will eliminate inefficiency.

Discussing the incentive structure in government, the authors note that, "Incentives usually consist of two parts: the 'carrot' of reward for good performance and the 'stick' of punishment for poor performance. Unfortunately, neither the carrot nor the stick is present in government bureaucracies . . . It is all but impossible to fire an employee in the federal government . . . Nor are there any real incentives for efficient performance and cost reduction. The only income for the bureaucrat is the fixed salary from his job. If, by extra effort, he achieves cost reductions, he doesn't get a bonus or a raise. His salary is not related in any way to saving tax dollars. He has, therefore, no reason to be particularly efficient or cost-conscious."

Concerning the difficulty of removing inefficient government employees, the chairman of the Consumer Product Safety Commission described the frustrations of the termination process in a letter to Senator Charles Percy of Illinois: "A manager in the executive branch of the federal government who finds it necessary to terminate an unproductive or noncontributing employee—or even an obstructing employee—must be prepared to spend 25 percent to 50 percent of his time for a period that may run from six to 18 months. In many cases, managers have chosen to work around such a person or to promote the employee out of the office in order to quickly be rid of the problem."

If there is no incentive to be efficient in government service, Bennett and Johnson argue, there may be incentive in the opposite direction: "Government employees are driven to increase the agency's budget each year because a bureaucrat in the U.S. (and in Western Europe as well) is rewarded with higher rank, increased salary, and greater prestige for increasing the number of employees under him. To hire additional employees, additional appropriations must be obtained to pay their salaries. The very nature of bureaucracy provides powerful incentives for increasing the size and scope of government, Every bureaucrat is by nature an empire builder."

The authors propose the Bureaucratic Rule of Two: "Transfer of a service from the private to the public sector doubles its cost of production." They point to a number of communities in which services once thought of as governmental are provided—efficiently and economically—by private groups. Communities such as Scottsdale, Arizona; Grants Pass, Oregon; and Billings, Montana contract with private firms for fire protection.

It is the authors' conclusion that, "Taxes can be cut drastically at the federal, state and local levels of government without any reduction in the quality or quantity of public services. The taxpayer can 'have his cake and eat it too' because it is possible to get many more goods and services for fewer tax dollars if the goods and services are produced more efficiently—that is, lower cost. This can be achieved by having goods and services produced by private enterprise rather than by government. The evidence proving that this can be done (and in fact already has been done) is both overwhelming and irrefutable."

There are, of course, certain things which are within the legitimate jurisdiction of government. National defense and raising an army is one of these. Maintaining police forces and courts are another. But why should government have a monopoly on the delivery of the mail, the collecting of garbage, or the putting out of fires? Why not have these things done efficiently, economically—and competitively? Professors Bennett and Johnson have an idea worthy of careful study and consideration.●

JUDICIAL MISINTERPRETATION OF THE FIRST AMENDMENT

● Mr. EAST. Mr. President—

A careful, and not an extremely selective, search of American primary historical documents indicates, beyond a reasonable doubt, that in fact no "high and impregnable" wall between church and state was historically erected by the first amendment; and for a very simple reason—none was constitutionally intended by the framers of that amendment or the states which ratified it.

This quotation comes from an article published in the January 22, issue of National Review entitled, "Understanding the First Amendment." The author, Mr. Robert L. Cord, is a professor of political science at Northeastern University in Boston. He has recently completed a book, "Separation of Church and State: Historical Fact and Current Fiction," which will be published soon by Lambeth Press.

As is indicated by the preceding quotation, Mr. Cord's article is a thought-provoking exploration of the discrepancies between the intent of the framers as to the establishment clause of the first amendment and its subsequent interpretations by the courts. I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the National Review, Jan. 22, 1982]

UNDERSTANDING THE FIRST AMENDMENT

(By Robert L. Cord)

"The first amendment has erected a wall between Church and State. That wall must be kept high and impregnable. We could not approve the slightest breach." With those lines of fiction, written over three decades ago, Justice Hugo Black ended the first United States Supreme Court opinion which dealt comprehensively with the meaning of the constitutional concept of separation of Church and State. Certainly the Framers of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights believed in the principle of Church-State separation and quickly added it to the organic law of the infant United States of America in 1791. However, those who authored and ratified that constitutional principle were not thereby mandating a complete legal secularization of the American Republic; far from it. In matters of faith, the Founding Fathers, and the American public they represented, are best described by U.S. Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas's characterization of 1952: "We are a religious people whose institutions presuppose a Supreme Being."

If the foregoing be true, what were the goals of Madison, Jefferson, and the other advocates of a federal constitutional separation of Church and State? Further, what evidence do we have as to their constitutional intentions? The United States Supreme Court, and recognized scholars who have written in the field of Church-State separation, traditionally have looked to American history to answer these inquiries; consequently, so shall I. Our conclusions, however, are vastly dissimilar.

The First Amendment phrase that guarantees the American constitutional doctrine of separation of Church and State is contained in the opening words of the Bill of Rights: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion . . ." The "Establishment Clause," as it is commonly referred to by students of constitutional law, although addressed to the Congress, has by the U.S. Supreme Court been made binding on the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. Consequently, today, neither Congress, a state legislature, nor any creation of a state legislature—such as a school board or municipality—may constitutionally make any laws "respecting an establishment of religion." But what is "an establishment of religion" within the meaning of the First Amendment? Let American history guide us.

James Madison introduced the Bill of Rights in the First Congress (1789) in part because many of the State Ratifying Conventions wanted more limitations placed on the authority of the Federal Government than existed in the original Constitution drawn up in the Philadelphia Convention. Madison's first draft of what ultimately became the Establishment Clause shows his intent clearly: ". . . The Civil rights of none shall be abridged on account of religious belief or worship, nor shall any national religion be established. . . . (Emphasis added.) Even after Madison's draft was changed by congressional committee deliberations, when asked in debate on the House floor what the re-worded Clause meant, Madison said he "apprehended the meaning of the words to be, that Congress should not establish a religion, and enforce the legal observation of it by law. . . ."

Careful historical research supports Madison's opinion. When the words and actions of the early Congresses and Presidents of the United States are viewed in their proper historical context it becomes clear that the First Amendment's Establishment Clause was designed by its Framers to prevent the establishment of a national religion or the placing of any one religious sect, denomination, or tradition into a preferred legal status which characterized religious establishments. Despite the fact that in 1947 the United States Supreme Court ruled that "the First Amendment has erected a wall between Church and State," which the Court characterized as "high and impregnable," American history shows otherwise. A careful, and not an extremely selective, search of American primary historical documents indicates, beyond a reasonable doubt, that in fact no "high and impregnable" wall between Church and State was historically erected by the First Amendment; and for a very simple Supreme Court rulings since 1947? Which interpretation of Church-State separation should stand: Jefferson's or Black's?

But Jefferson was not alone in church-building through treaty. Presidents James Monroe, John Quincy Adams, Andrew Jackson, and his successor, Martin Van Buren, all emulated Jefferson in committing federal tax money to build churches through treaty agreements. There was no attempt in the Everson opinions—either the majority or the dissenting opinions—to explain or even address these indisputable facts which make the Court's definition of the Establishment Clause historically untenable unless, of course, Jefferson et al. did not know what separation of Church and State meant or willfully violated the First Amendment and their constitutional oath of office.

The fictional version of Church-State separation in American history, endorsed in the Everson case, is also derived from the careful selection and explanation of historical documents which predate the Constitution. All the opinions in the Everson case make much of Madison and Jefferson's struggle to disestablish the Anglican Church in Virginia. Madison's well-known opposition to a state tax to support teachers of the Christian religion is discussed, as is Jefferson's famous Virginia "Bill for Establishing Religious Freedom." It is within this context that the Supreme Court's opinion indicates: "The First Amendment has erected a wall between Church and State. That wall must be kept high and impregnable." Omitted from all of the Everson opinions are any historical facts concerning Madison and Jefferson in Virginia that would run counter to the "high and impregnable wall" theory.

Madison's "Memorial and Remonstrance against Religious Assessments" (1785) was an argument against a discriminatory policy of supporting, with tax money, only one religion. It is not a brief for absolute separation of Church and State. Further, while mentioning Jefferson's "Religious Liberty Bill," proposed by Madison acting as Jefferson's surrogate in the Virginia Assembly in 1785 (Jefferson was U.S. Minister to France at the time), the Court makes no mention of another Jefferson bill also introduced by Madison the same day. This other bill, unmentioned by the Court, was a "Bill for Punishing . . . Sabbath Breakers." Both Jefferson bills became Virginia law in 1786. Do these laws taken together indicate that Madison and Jefferson subscribed to an "impregnable" wall between Church and State?

If the Court's precedent-setting case (Everson) is based on an erroneous assumption, advanced almost 35 years ago—to wit: that the Establishment Clause erected a "high and impregnable" wall between Church and State—then all the subsequent court decisions, federal and state, built upon the Everson case are logically questionable. This would not be the case, of course, if the Court explained the incompatibility of its "history" and American historical fact.

The U.S. Supreme Court's failure to decide Church-State cases adequately goes beyond misinterpretation of the original understanding of the First Amendment. With its expansive interpretation of what the Establishment Clause makes unconstitutional, the Court has created confusion with its Church-State decisions. Bus transportation for parochial-school students is constitutional but state money for field trips for those students is not. Relatively non-specific grants to sectarian institutions of higher education are constitutional but similar grants to elementary and secondary schools are not. Textbooks for secular subjects may be purchased for parochial-school students with tax money but a motion-picture projector may not. Tax exemption of churches and church schools is constitutional but tuition tax credits for parents who send their children to those schools are not.

In an attempt to reduce this confusion about what is and what is not a statute impermissibly violating the constitutional separation of Church and State, Chief Justice Burger, in a 1971 opinion of the Court (Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 [1971]), spelled out the Court's collective criteria in a three-stage test of constitutionality.

"Every analysis in this area [Church-State cases] must begin with consideration of the cumulative criteria developed by the Court over many years. Three such tests may be gleaned from our cases. First, the statute must have a secular legislative purpose; second, its principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion . . . finally, the statute must not foster an 'excessive government entanglement with religion.' "

It seems somewhat remarkable that Burger could see or impose any order on the Court's doings in Establishment Clause cases. Consider: In 1971 six members of the Court embraced the three-stage test. In 1975, Justices Brennan, Douglas, and Marshall thought it insufficient and urged a fourth criterion be added. A year later, Justices White and Rehnquist also attacked the test, but, instead of wanting additional criteria, they wanted the three-stage test reduced to two because they thought one level of the test was "superflouous." Thus, the three-stage test, subscribed to by six members of the Court in 1971, failed to command even a majority of the Court only five years later. In 1976 no comprehensive judicial test of constitutionality was embraced in Church-State cases by a sufficient number of Supreme Court Justices to constitute an opinion of the Court.

In 1980, Justices White and Rehnquist reembraced the three-stage test, enabling Justice White to write the opinion of a divided Court (5 to 4). Candidly, he wrote of the Court's predicament at the end of his opinion:

"Establishment Clause cases are not easy; they stir deep feelings; and we are divided among ourselves, perhaps reflecting the different views on this subject of the people of this country. . . . This course sacrifices clarity and predictability for flexibility but this promises to be the case until the interaction between the courts and the states . . . produces a single, more encompassing construction of the Establishment Clause."

As the highest appellate court on federal constitutional questions for one federal and fifty state court systems, the U.S. Supreme Court has, even by its own admission, failed to provide relatively clear standards as to what the First and Fourteenth Amendments demand in the area of Church-State separation. This failure of the High Court does not serve well a judicial system built upon previous decisions. Lower courts cannot dispose of cases with a sufficient degree of finality unless there are relatively fixed precedents and principles provided by the Supreme Court.

May contemporary scholars who write authoritatively about separation of Church and State disagree with the narrow interpretation of the Establishment Clause embraced here and which I believe my research substantiates as the original understanding of the Clause. (The narrow interpretation briefly documented here is that separation of Church and State as a constitutional concept forbids only the preferential treatment of any one religion, religious sect, or religious tradition and prohibits the establishment of a national or state religion.) Under this interpretation, nondiscriminatory aid to religion is not necessarily unconstitutional. Since the narrow interpretation of the Establishment Clause is at odds with the basic principle of the broad interpretation, which is subscription to virtually complete Church-State separation or independence, the two views are incompatible.

The broad interpretation of Church-State separation is almost always defended by scholars, as by the Supreme Court, with appeals to American history. Such is the case in the most recent (third) edition of The American Constitution by C. Herman Pritchett, a much respect authority in the field of American constitutional law. While I have assigned this generally excellent secondary source book to my graduate and undergraduate students, parts of the section on the Establishment Clause are misleading.

Explaining the distinction between the narrow and broad interpretations of the Establishment Clause, Pritchett devotes almost no space to the historical arguments for the narrow interpretation but proceeds at length to present several historical arguments for the broad interpretation. It is with this explanation of the broad interpretation that the danger is done. "During their terms as President . . . both Jefferson and Madison took very strict positions on establishment," Pritchett writes. "Both believed that presidential proclamations of Thanksgiving Day were contrary to the Constitution. They also regarded as unconstitutional," Pritchett continues. "tax exemption for churches . . ." What is cleary not mentioned is that James Madison as President issued at least four Thanksgiving Day Proclamations and that President Thomas Jefferson in 1802 signed into law a bill providing, among other things, for church tax exemption in Alexandria County. Did both these men as President violate their understanding of what the Constitution required as separation of Church and State?

While Pritchett's statement may be in its context only misleading, it was relied upon to produce a statement which is basically erroneous. Footnoting Pritchett, the encyclopedic Guide to the U.S. Supreme Court (published by Congressional Quarterly in 1979) in its opening discussion of the "Establishment of Religion" provides the following paragraph.

"The two men mose responsible for its [the Establishment Clause's] inclusion in the Bill of Rights construed the clause absolutely. Thomas Jefferson and James Madison thought that the prohibition of establishment meant that a presidential proclamation of Thanksgiving Day was just improper as a tax exemption for churches." [Emphasis added.]

Neither Jefferson nor Madison construed the Establishment Clause absolutely and only Jefferson, when President, believed that presidential Thanksgiving Day proclamations were unconstitutional. Inasmuch as I assume that whoever wrote this paragraph for the Guide did not intend to deceive, I must conclude that the author did not check primary historical sources. Nevertheless, this section of the Guide will be read by many who will, no doubt, consider it to be both authoritative and correct.

Perhaps the most prominent contemporary Church-State scholar and legal activist who embraces the broad interpretation of the Establishment Clause is Professor Leo Pfeffer. An attorney as well as a teacher and author in the field of American constitutional law, Pfeffer has argued and/or written amicus briefs in over one-half of the Establishment Clause cases decided by the U.S. Supreme Court. Probably his most important scholarly contributon to the Church-State separation debate is Church, State, and Freedom, first published in 1953 and revised in 1967. While much of Pfeffer's research appears sound, the two most important chapters of this book—"The Principle [of Church-State separation] Is Born" and "The Meaning of the Principle"—contain some clear historical errors regarding separation of Church and State in the United States. Worse still is that Pfeffer draws some major conclusions from statements which are factually erroneous. One of the most glaring examples of this is Pfeffer's conclusion to the chapter "The Principle Is Born."

After a brief discussion of Madison's proposed Amendments to the Constitution, which were ultimately fashioned into our Bill of Rights and submitted to the states for ratification by the First Congress, Pfeffer closes the chapter as follows:

"The Bill of Rights, approved by the requisite number of states in 1791, began with a guaranty of religious freedom. . . .

"What . . . is particularly significant to our study is that the last words of the last article of the Constitution (except for the purely formal article specifying when the Constitution should become effective) prohibit any religious test 'as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States,' and the first words of the first article of the Bill of Rights prohibit 'any law respecting an establishment of religion' The significance of this ending and beginning is more than symbolic; it indicates unmistakably that in the minds of the fathers of our Constitution, independence of religion and government was the alpha and omega of democracy and freedom." [Emphasis added.]

Despite this statement of Professor Pfeffer's, quoted above, it is historically clear that the Framers of the Bill of Rights—including James Madison—did not intend that what is now the First Amendment should be the first addition to the federal Constitution. When Madison introduced his proposed additions to the Constitution on June 8, 1789, he wanted the religious guarantees to be added to Article I, Section 9 of the body of the original Constitution. Of course, the religious guarantees do not appear in Article I, Section 9, but that isn't Madison's doing. The point here is that if Madison's suggested positioning for the additional religious guarantees in the Constitution had been accepted, Pfeffer would be not only without his symbolism, but also without his unmistakable reading of the minds of the "Fathers of the Constitution."

Lest it be counterargued that Madison's positioning suggestion was rejected by the First Congress because it wanted to do exactly as Pfeffer has indicated, it should be noted that when the additions that became the Bill of Rights were submitted to the states, what is now the First Amendment was the third proposed congressional amendment. When the first two proposed amendments failed to gain ratification, the third proposed amendment became the first ratified and, as such, became the First Amendment to the Constitution. Consequently, unless the members of the First Congress were clairvoyant and knew that the first two proposed amendments would not be ratified, they could not have known that the third proposed amendment would become the First Amendment. However, if it was intended that the First Amendment's being first in the Bill of Rights should serve as a key to the minds of the "fathers," as Professor Pfeffer has written, why didn't the "fathers" of the Bill of Rights simply put the First Amendment first on the list of the 12 proposed amendments?

Other statements made in Church, State, and Freedom are not easily reconciled with historical fact. Pfeffer writes of Jefferson: "Throughout his adult life Jefferson never swerved from his devotion to the principle of complete independence of religion and government." (Emphasis added.) Does Jefferson's church-building treaty reflect the principle of "complete independence of religion and government"? Pfeffer's book, and his selective documentation of Jefferson, do not seem to address that question, or the request by Jefferson that Congress meet its responsibilities under the treaty, which I take to include appropriating funds to help build a church and support a Roman Catholic priest.

The national organization Americans United for Separation of Church and State may, in their monthly periodical Church and State, choose to refer to Professor Pfeffer as "the country's leading legal expert on Church-State questions," but my research and book clearly document questionable conclusions in his major work on separation of Church and State. Unfortunately, some of these conclusions, which are, in my judgment, incompatible with a broader look at American primary historical documents, have been embraced by other scholars and by some of our nation's most important jurists.

During recent decades there has been a continuing tendency to redefine what were once considered political public-policy questions as judicial questions. As the call for resolution in the courtroom has increased, the power of elected government has decreased. The current over-broad interpretation of the Establishment Clause has, in part, aided the transformation from government by elected and accountable representatives to government by judiciary. A clear case in point is the current battle over legislation offered by Senators Packwood (R. Ore.) and Moynihan (D., N.Y.) to provide some kind of federal tax assistance to parents who send their children to elementary and secondary private schools, most of which are church-affiliated.

In 1973 (Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty [PEARL] v. Nyquist), the U.S. Supreme Court held unconstitutional a New York tax-assistance bill which was similar, in part, to the Packwood-Moynihan bill. The inevitable effect of the New York legislation, the Court reasoned, would be to advance the religious mission of sectarian schools. According to Church and State, Leo Pfeffer, who successfully argued the Nyquist case before the Supreme Court in 1973, testified in May 1981 against the Packwood-Moynihan plan, indicating, among other things, that it would violate the First Amendment. The original understanding of the Establishment Clause does not generally support Pfeffer or the Supreme Court because it does not preclude federal aid (or state aid) to sectarian schools. Instead, primary historical documents show that on many occasions religious sects, and especially their schools, were used as sectarian means to accomplish federal governmental ends until the close of the nineteenth century.

Washington, John Adams, and Thomas Jefferson, as President, signed federal legislation which in effect purchased—with large grants of federal land put in a controlling trust—the services of an evangelical order to settle in Western U.S. lands to aid and teach the Christian and other Indians in the area. No doubt those federal laws were, in part, early manifestations of the U.S. policy of "civilizing the Indians." That policy was implemented, to a great degree, by federally controlled financing of Christian missionary schools of various denominations and sects until the use of sectarian schools was discontinued by an Act of Congress in 1897.

Did Washington, Adams, Jefferson, their Congresses, and their successors in the federal executive and legislative branches all betray the First Amendment until 1897? Certainly not. Since the Framers of the First Amendment saw the Establishment Clause as basically precluding federal religious partisanship, non-partisan use of religious schools to pursue the secular end of "civilizing the Indians" was constitutional. The use of these schools was apparently thought to be wise public policy until almost a century after the First Amendment was added to the Constitution. Can anyone seriously pretend that these schools did not advance their religious mission as they taught Indian children?

The point here is that those who appeal to the First Amendment to foreclose the Packwood-Moynihan bill, or state variations, from becoming practiced law do not have American history, the Framers of the Establishment Clause, or even Thomas Jefferson on their side.

Beginning in 1947, the U.S. Supreme Court, by judicial fiat, has created its own version of separation of Church and State. It has sought to justify its interpretation of that constitutional concept with little more than poor scholarship and judicial say-so. Unfortunately, in the process the Court has dealt a grievous blow to democratic decision-making. The religiously non-sectarian Packwood-Moynihan bill ought to be voted up or down on its merits. The documentation in my forthcoming book is convincing evidence that it would not violate the First Amendment.●

JIM PHELAN

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, this week many distinguished Marylanders, sports fans, and alumni of Mount St. Mary's College in Emmitsburg, Md., will be joining in honoring Jim Phelan, director of athletics and head basketball coach at the Mount. As a basketball fan and former college player, I want to express to Jim Phelan my great admiration for his remarkable record of accomplishments. In his 28th Mountaineer basketball season, he has just marked his 500th basketball victory making him the most successful coach in Mount St. Mary's history and certainly one of the most successful coaches in the Nation.

In the now defunct Mason-Dixon Conference, a small college league, Jim Phelan won 75 percent of the time and won nine conference titles. He has shepherded the Mountaineers to 24 winning seasons, and the team has participated in 10 NCAA postseason tournaments. In 1962 he was named NABC College Division Coach of the Year as well as Maryland Sportsman of the Year.

His interest in sports and basketball goes back to his own college days where he played for LaSalle College and was named three times to the All-Philadelphia team. After college he led the Marine Corps Cagers from Quantico to the All-Marine finals and then had a brief professional career with the Philadelphia Warriors of the National Basketball Association.

The Phelans are active community members both at Mount St. Mary's and in Emmitsburg. In his 28th season, Jim Phelan is continuing the outstanding record of athletic achievements. He has been awarded the NABC Division II Coach of the Year Award, the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Division II Team of the Year trophy, and amassed a record of 5 weeks as the No. 1 team in the country according to the NCAA Division II poll. I join with Jim Phelan's many friends and his family in the salute to a distinguished sportsman.●

ORDER FOR RECESS TODAY UNTIL MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1982, AT 11 A.M.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until the hour of 11 a.m. on Monday, February 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BENTSEN ON MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1982

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order on Monday, the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes under a special order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR PERIOD FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS ON MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1982

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, following the special order allotted to Senator BENTSEN, there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to exceed 30 minutes with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session for the purpose of considering the nomination on page 3 of Powell Allen Moore.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be stated.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Powell Allen Moore of Georgia, to be an Assistant Secretary of State.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, speaking for this side of the aisle, we are delighted to see this appointment, having worked with Mr. Moore. We do wish him well in his new assignment.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the nomination is agreeable to us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was considered and confirmed.

Mr. CRANSTON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

INTRODUCTION OF THE PRODUCTIVITY AND HUMAN INVESTMENT ACT

HON. JAMES M. JEFFORDS OF VERMONT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Productivity and Human Investment Act of 1982. This is a proposal that seeks to rationalize a system for, and to consolidate, some of the various programs the Congress has developed to meet the challenges of the employment problems that our Nation has faced previously.

In the past, we have failed to specify clearly what accomplishments were expected from an employment and training program. Within the measure that I am introducing today, the respective governmental roles are specified, defining what needs to be done and creating a structure upon which we can build in the future. These programs have to be examined not from the perspective of vested interests, but rather from the perspective of what is essential, what the program outcomes should be, and what will most meet the needs of the Nation as a whole.

As we all know, over the past 10 years we have been operating Federal employment and training programs that have received a great deal of criticism. To the extent that this criticism might be deserved, we in the Congress should accept a significant share of the responsibility.

The programs did not have the opportunity to mature or to grow because the necessary stability was not provided. Each time the economy changed, Congress altered the goals, mission, programs, and required outcomes, reports and responsibilities in the legislation.

The earliest initiatives were targeted to structural problems of lagging industries, and areas which had been exacerbated by a decade of slow growth. As employment growth accelerated in the second half of the 1960's, attention turned to the private sector. By the time private sector oriented programs were geared up, unemployment began to rise rapidly and the pendulum shifted in the opposite direction toward the initiation of countercyclical job creation programs. To become better organized, a comprehensive employment and training system was proposed. Even before this program was operational, major changes took place and dramatic expansion insured. Amendments were proposed in 1976, 1977, and 1978 that separated structural and countercyclical public service jobs, added categorical programs targeted specifically to youth, and linked authorized activities to the private sector. Additional set-asides were included for upgrading and retraining, as well as for education-linked activities. Real expenditures throughout all of this upheaval more than doubled between 1976 and 1980, with commensurate problems being inherent in such pell-mell expansion.

Throughout this turbulent period, training efforts were generally obscured by the employment or job generation efforts. Little criticism, though, was focused on the training components that increased self-sufficiency of the disadvantaged and that met the skill needs of the labor force.

What have we learned from these experiences? First, that there were cost benefits when post-program employment and earnings were increased. Every dollar invested in on-the-job training returned $2.28 in social benefits; a dollar spent on Job Corps returned about $1.39 to society; and every dollar spent on classroom training returned $1.14.

Additionally, past experience has shown that: Work experience alone does not improve post-program labor market success except when targeted and combined with classroom training; there is greater benefit when the training is long enough to enable the participants to achieve measurable and certifiable competencies that are required in the labor market; training activities should be viewed as building blocks which provide increased opportunities for long-term interventions; and existing institutions should be utilized for training rather than for maintaining segregated and frequently second-class approaches.

In spite of all the criticism and the lack of stability, we as a nation have benefited from Federal training programs. An infrastructure has been solidly established that supports the interrelationships of diverse programs at the local level, thus contributing to the whole economic construction of the area. We have been able to draw upon economic development programs, vocational education, and local education agencies offerings; upon programs for older Americans, migrant and seasonal farmworkers and the handicapped; and upon efforts developed to revitalize inner city dwellings and transportation, and to improve energy savings and sewerage programs in both the inner city and rural areas.

We cannot deny these accomplishments or any of our past efforts. Yet we must reach beyond what we have achieved to meet the new challenges we face in our economy. The role of the local, State, and Federal Government should be clarified and stability afforded to the program through freestanding legislation. Fraud, abuse, and overregulation must be countered while the contribution of the private sector is strengthened. A balance needs to be struck between training youth and adults, the displaced and the disadvantaged, and the unemployed and the underemployed.

The bill I am introducing today attempts to meet these needs by establishing a consolidated, federally financed system organized on a labor market basis under State oversight and guidance. The system will operate within uniform, nationally specified accounting and performance measurement guidelines, and is designed to emphasize training and remediation rather than income maintenance. The intention is to provide more intensive assistance and substantive opportunities for those who are in need and who are willing and able to benefit.

Within the legislation, provision is made to reward the performance of service providers and to maximize the use of private, for-profit firms and nonprofit agencies in management and delivery. The bill contains a simplified program structure as it requires competency-based orientation for all training and remediation activities. The bill is structured so that each title details the responsibilities of each of the governmental entities; the labor area, the State and Federal level. It does not amend previous legislation, but rather is a freestanding bill that defines a system which builds on the successes and knowledge of what we have learned in the past.

Each State will receive a consolidated grant from the Federal Government allocated on a needs based formula to provide resources for investment activities within the State. In turn, subgrant allocations will be made to jurisdictions which constitute labor market areas. The State will provide oversight and coordination of the investment activities of the labor market areas, including the provision of incentive matching grants for exemplary programs and for purposes designated by the State.

Additionally, there is provision for combined business-labor training programs which offer advanced career training opportunities for participants drawn from across the State.

The Federal Government responsibilities include the oversight and coordination of State activities. These responsibilities involve the distribution of performance supplements to States to reward superior performance, the identification and testing of innovative training approaches, and the specification of national standards. Also included is a national business and labor training program offering advanced career training for participants drawn from all States. The Job Corps program and programs for migrant and seasonal farmworkers and Native American groups remain a Federal responsibility. An economic distress program, which includes assistance in the event of mass layoffs, trade-adjustment related job losses and natural disasters, is designated as a Federal function as well.

Within the labor market areas, the investment activities are consolidated under the oversight and decisionmaking of the Labor Market Investment Board. Board members will be appointed by the elected officials in the labor market area. The membership on the investment board includes representatives of labor, community-based organizations, education and training institutions, and the participant community, with a majority of the members to be drawn from the business sector. The investment board will develop a plan describing the services to be provided, the participant mix and the appropriate delivery agents in the labor market area.

Labor force investment activities in each labor market area can include: youth preparatory programs targeted for school-age youth; remedial education and training activities for those adults in the labor market area who have difficulty in securing and maintaining adequate employment; and labor market exchange functions serving the entire labor force and employers in a labor market area.

The original draft of this proposal has been reviewed by many individuals and associations interested in employment and training issues. The comments I have received have been very useful and I have tried to modify the bill in light of these suggestions. Even with modification, I believe that the essence of this proposal remains true to its original purpose: to increase the productive capacity and utilization of this Nation's labor force. It is my hope that over the next few weeks, the same interested individuals and associations will review carefully the provisions of this bill. I also commend the efforts of my colleagues, Mr. HAWKINS in the House, and Mr. QUAYLE in the Senate, to hold joint hearings on the various employment and training initiatives that have been introduced this session of Congress. With joint hearings, we can quickly, reasonably and in an informed manner initiate a well-developed piece of legislation that will meet the training needs of our country in the future.

I recognize that this bill will not necessarily solve all of the unemployment problems that we face today. However, without a Federal training policy, many of the other economic problems we are currently encountering will be exacerbated. For example, 2 days ago President Reagan asked Congress to approve $2.3 billion in supplemental appropriations to aid States in continuing unemployment compensation benefits. While I do not deny the need for these funds, I also believe that a determined effort to deal with the root of this problem through employment training programs should decrease the needs for future supplemental appropriations. Without a skilled, trained labor force, the other aspects of the economic recovery package cannot succeed. This issue must be faced. We must be willing to invest as a Nation in the training of our youth and adults so that they can lead more productive lives by contributing to our society and economy rather than drawing from it. By providing the resources that will enable each individual to reach his or her full potential, we are really investing in our future.

A summary of the major provisions of the Productivity and Human Investment Act will appear in the February 8, 1982, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.●

GUNDERSON UPPER MISSISSIPPI RIVER SYSTEM MANAGEMENT ACT

HON. STEVE GUNDERSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, in the upper Midwest we have long recognized the importance of one of America's most valuable natural resources—the Mississippi River system. And one of the true blessings of the mighty Mississippi is its multitude of uses.

Unfortunately, only the commercial use of the river system often has been emphasized in past congressional hearings. Yet, this body needs to realize that the various uses of the river system are not mutually exclusive; rather, they are mutually dependent. They must coexist for the maximum benefit of all potential river users.

In an attempt to reconcile the various uses of the upper Mississippi River system, Congress created the Upper Mississippi River Basin Commission to develop a comprehensive master plan for future utilization of this portion of the river.

This commission recently completed its study and produced a master plan that addressed ecological, environmental, commercial, and recreational concerns.

Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that would authorize funding for the necessary Federal programs to implement the ecological, environmental, and recreational recommendations of the commissions comprehensive master plan. At a time when greater and greater commercial use of the upper Mississippi River is proposed, Congress must also act to preserve and protect the river's natural beauty and recreational uses.

Clearly, a balance must be struck between the many potential uses of the river system. My bill would accomplish that goal in several ways.

First, funds are authorized to permit the Department of Agriculture to implement a program of sedimentation control for the entire upper Mississippi River basin. Such a program would benefit not only the commercial and recreational users of the river, but the farming community as well. The prevention of soil erosion has to be one of the greatest problems presently facing American farmers.

Second, funds are authorized to allow the Department of the Interior to undertake a habitat rehabilitation and enhancement program for the natural and recreational resources of the river system. Decades of commercial use have taken their toll on the habitat of the Mississippi River. To remedy this situation and to insure that it does not recur, the habitat rehabilitation program in my bill would establish: First, a program of rehabilitation and enhancement of fish and wildlife resources; second, a long-term resource monitoring program; and third, a computerized inventory and analysis system.

Third, the Secretary of the Army is required to establish and seek Federal funding for a program that would facilitate the productive uses of dredged material from the river. Such material has a variety of uses outside the river's flood plain including landfill, concrete, beach sand, and as a soil conditioner.

Fourth, the legislation would give the Secretary of the Interior the authority to implement a program of recreational projects along the upper Mississippi River system and to assess the economic benefit of those recreational activities. Enhanced recreational opportunities are not only important to the users of the river system, but to thousands of small businessmen along the system as well.

Fifth, funds are authorized to permit the Department of the Army to monitor traffic movements so as to verify lock capacities, update traffic projections, and refine economic evaluations in an effort to determine the need for future commercial expansion, rehabilitation, and environmental enhancement of the river. Simply stated, it is time to take the guesswork out of the use of one of our greatest natural resources.

Finally, the legislation gives the consent of Congress to any combination of the States of Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, and Wisconsin to enter into agreements and to establish joint agencies for the comprehensive management of the use, protection, growth, and development of the upper Mississippi River system.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that this legislation will produce a balanced management of the upper Mississippi River system that, indeed, makes up for some of the inequities of the past. I, therefore, urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this legislation of historic importance to countless future generations of Americans.●

AFRO-AMERICAN HISTORY: BLUEPRINT FOR SURVIVAL THEME FOR 1982 BLACK HISTORY MONTH OBSERVANCE

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, February 1 marked the commencement of National Afro-American History Month. The Association for the Study of Afro-American Life and History, Inc., the founder of this now annual celebration, has drawn up an impressive educational package for implementing this year's theme: "Blueprint for Survival." I am certain that my colleagues, as well as citizens throughout our Nation, will find the observance package of interest; and I submit herewith for inclusion in the RECORD the association's press release announcing the focus of the 1982 observance.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate J. Rupert Picott, executive director of the Association for the Study of Afro-American Life and History, Inc., on the excellent job he has done in preparation for this year's observance, and to extend my best wishes for a rewarding and productive month.

The press release follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., December 16, 1981.—The Association for the Study of Afro-American Life and History, has just announced that the theme for National Afro-American History Month, February, 1982, will be "Afro-American History: Blueprint for Survival."

The observance was initiated by the "Father of Black History", Dr. Carter G. Woodson in 1926. The celebration for years was one week in duration and was always the period in February each year that contained the birthdates of Frederick Douglass and Abraham Lincoln. Bowing to a demand for a longer period of observance, the National Black History Association lengthened the period to one month as part of the Bicentennial celebration in 1976.

America has developed a growing and expanded interest in heritage. The Association credits this new interest to the contribution of many individuals in the nation who seek more information about their own family background and who have turned their focus toward Africa as the Motherland and the Afro-American contributions in the nation. Dr. Earl E. Thorpe, Professor of History, North Carolina Central University and President of ASALH issued a call this week to Government, Industry and other Associations and individuals to join the national Black history Association in the sponsorship throughout the nation of Afro-American history programs, exhibits and other activities for February, 1982.

The Afro-American Association has for many years provided a Kit of materials to guide the yearly observance. Dr. J. Rupert Picott, Executive Secretary of ASALH and Editor of the 1982 National Afro-American History Month Kit stated that the Kit this year is probably the best the Association has published. The Kit for 1982 focuses on the needs of school children but has materials that will be of interest to and provide information for Americans of all ages. "The latest Kit also includes 11 booklets," Dr. Picott said. The booklets are entitled: Afro-Americans in U.S. Foreign Service: William (Bill) Smith, "Mr. Commissioner"; Pioneers in Preservation of Black Heritage; the Dollars and Sense of Vocational Technical Education; Abraham Pearse of the Mayflower; the Champion: Cortez Peters, Jr.; Black Americans in Aerospace; Oral History: Tool for Heritage; Pioneers of Long Ago; a Poster of Carter G. Woodson 17"×22"; and How to Celebrate Afro-American "Blacks" History Month.

Dr. Picott believes that the National Afro-American History Month booklets provide a guide for the celebrations across America. This National Afro-American History Month Kit continues to offer stimulating and time-proven suggestions for planning activities and programs through the popular booklet "How to Celebrate Afro-American 'Black' History Month."

The Kit also explores Americans in The United States Department of State and lists Blacks who have served in the foreign Service by names, and in most cases, by photographs since the days of Frederick Douglass in 1889. These are Black Americans who have represented the nation in various ambassadorial posts in the world are presented as role models for U.S. citizens. Dr. Picott believes that the story of Abraham Pearse, a recently discovered and recognized Black American who was with the Plymouth Colony and of Mayflower fame will prove intriguing and inspiring to all Americans.

The three Black astronauts, Ronald E. McNair, Guion (Guy) S. Bluford and Frederick D. Gregory, who are in training for future space exploration are discussed. The Black executives at NASA (The National Aeronautics and Space Administration) are listed with photographs.

A calendar with a drawing for each month by distinguished Black artists is part of the materials available.

Exhibits to be placed in school classrooms, government buildings and colleges and universities have not been neglected. The booklet entitled "Pioneers in Preservation of Black Heritage" presents selected Afro-American pioneers, inventors and leaders of the past, including Martin Luther King, Jr., Booker T. Washington, George Washington Carver and Mary McLeod Bethune.

The first Black American to be appointed Commissioner of Education of the United States—William B. Smith—is presented in copy and photographs.

The world-recognized typing champion, Cortez Peters, Jr. is presented in professional profile and his typing secrets and mastery of the machine revealed.

The development of oral history techniques is reviewed in a booklet devoted to helping trace our various cultural roots.

During the past ten years, Presidents of the United States, mayors of our cities, large and small, government agencies, private organizations and the 135 local chapters of ASALH—all have paused during the month of Fedruary to call attention to Afro-American History Month and to laud the achievements and sharing of Blacks in the founding, development and continuance of the United States Nation.

The Association maintains its national office at 1401 14th Street, N.W., in Washington, D.C. 20005. The telephone number is 202/667-2822. Interested persons are urged to call or write for further information about National Afro-American "Black" History Month.●

ALASKA CALL FOR MANDATE TO BALANCE BUDGET

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, just the other day, Alaska became the 31st State to call for a constitutional convention to mandate a balanced budget. Only three more resolutions, and for the first time in the history of this Nation, our Constitution will be opened up to amendment by convention. Why? Because the Congress has refused to heed the voice of the people demanding a more responsible, more frugal attitude toward fiscal spending.

For the past three decades, Congress has bowed to pressures from interest groups demanding higher and higher budgets for Government-sponsored programs. But the same people who so eagerly vote these bloated budgets are reluctant to pass on the costs in concomitant tax increases. That is why we are faced with a trillion dollar deficit today that is stifling our economic growth and threatening to bring major industries to a halt.

Congressional action is long overdue. The Senate Judiciary Committee has approved Senate Joint Resolution 58, which would provide a balanced budget as a fiscal norm, and bring accountability for deficit spending. The House Judiciary Committee should act immediately and report its companion, House Joint Resolution 350, in response to the overwhelming cry from a majority of the States for fiscal responsibility.●

BIAGGI BILL TO RESTORE SOCIAL SECURITY MINIMUM BENEFIT

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, February 3, I introduced H.R. 5436, a bill to restore the social security minimum benefit for all eligible, retroactive to January 1, 1982.

This legislation is vitally important to the economic fortunes of some 84,000 persons who would be eligible to receive the social security minimum benefit in 1982—but will not because of the actions taken by Congress in the conference report on H.R. 4331. In that legislation, the minimum benefit was restored to the 3 million older persons currently eligible—but this same legislation imposed a January 1, 1982, cutoff date for new beneficiaries.

I was joined by a number of my colleagues who while voting for final passage of H.R. 4331, did so with great reluctance because of this arbitrary provision. My legislation seeks to remedy the problem which will have affected some 14,000 people by the end of February.

If Congress and the President learned nothing else last year—it was that to cut social security is an extraordinarily unpopular and politically dangerous position. Yet, unless we rectify the language we approved in the conference report on H.R. 4331, we will be perpetuating such a position. Let us consider in human terms what we are doing by cutting off prospective minimum benefit recipients. In terms of numbers, it will be 84,000 in 1982 and a total of more than 400,000 retirees over the next 5 years. These are men and women—who have worked in jobs, many low paying but who nonetheless faithfully contributed to social security for their retirement. The minimum benefit makes up the difference between this contribution and a monthly income of $122.

Yet by virtue of the provisions of H.R. 4331, these Americans—close to retirement are suddenly told that they are no longer eligible for the minimum benefit. It is tantamount to a betrayal of a convenant between the Government and the workers.

My bill honors the commitment and would repeal those provisions of H.R. 4331 which deny older workers their minimum benefit. The savings from eliminating the minimum benefit after January 1, 1982, total about $685 million over 5 years. I contend we could achieve these same savings through better administration of the social security program. For example we could achieve almost one-third of those savings if we were to pass my bill, H.R. 4003, which would repay the social security trust fund the estimated $200 million it is owed by the Treasury Department for the value of uncashed checks. Under existing law, the full value including interest of uncashed checks is credited to the general revenue fund instead of reverting back to the social security trust fund where the check was drawn originally. Other cost savings could be achieved by ending the practice of sending checks to deceased beneficiaries as well as to others who may be ineligible. Finally better investments of the funds in the trust funds could generate new revenues well in excess of the $685 million in saving achieved by ending the minimum benefit. The point I am making is simple—cutting benefits should be the last resort entertained in terms of social security reform. This administration has demonstrated its intent to pursue this as a first course of action—and I will oppose this whenever and wherever it appears.

Passage of my bill would send a signal that Congress has not lost its commitment and compassion for the needs of our elderly poor. The cutoff of the minimum benefit on January 1, violates any sense of fair warning to future retirees that they have to face a major cut in their benefits. It is wrong and must be righted and I call for swift action by the Ways and Means Committee.●

RECOGNITION IN AGRICULTURE

HON. JOHN L. NAPIER

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. NAPIER. Mr. Speaker, agriculture has long been a main topic of discussion here in the Nation's Capital. In recent years, we have seen heated discussions over certain issues and long debates about the Government's role in farming. While we deal with agriculture as an industry, we tend sometimes to overlook its importance as the commercial foundation of America. We have a tendency also to view it as an institution, when in reality it is an entity comprised of this Nation's most ingenious and hard-working people.

Just recently, the South Carolina Farm Bureau publicly recognized some of these citizens who exemplify what everyone's ideals of professional ability and dedication to a way of life are. It is with pride that I offer the following news article for consideration by my colleagues. It pays homage to the South Carolina Farm Family of the Year, Mr. and Mrs. Joe King of Kingsburg and Mr. Rufus Lawrimore of Hemingway.

Joe and Mary King are an outstanding and energetic young farm family, active in numerous civic and community endeavors. Mr. Lawrimore is one of our Nation's most knowledgeable and forceful agricultural leaders, especially in regard to the tobacco program. I am delighted, Mr. Speaker, to call to your attention and to the attention of my colleagues that Joe King and Rufus Lawrimore are both members of my agricultural advisory committee and residents of the sixth district of South Carolina.

[From the Weekly Observer, Dec. 10, 1981]

FARM BUREAU HONORS KINGS, LAWRIMORE WITH TOP AWARDS

A variety of awards were handed out at the 38th annual meeting of the South Carolina Farm Bureau this past weekend in Myrtle Beach, but none as important to the residents of Williamsburg and lower Florence counties than the federation's top state awards.

Those two awards went to a Kingsburg family and a Williamsburg County farmer and tobacco warehouseman.

Joe and Mary King of Kingsburg and their three children were named the S.C. Young Farm Family of the Year. Rufus Lawrimore of Hemingway was given the federation's Distinguished Service Award.

Joe King raises tobacco and hogs on land along the Pee Dee River which has been in his family four generations. He said he likes the freedom of farming. His wife agreed with him, saying, "It's a good life, but it's a hard life."

She is a third grade Johnsonville Elementary School teacher.

The King farm, Capitola Plantation, is about 2,000 acres, King said. Of the 700 acres that are cleared, about 60 of them grew tobacco this year. King said he takes pride in growing quality tobacco. That is evident by the fact that King received the highest grade, C1-L, for some of his tobacco on the Hemingway market this year. He also received the highest price offered per hundred-weight for that tobacco. A specimen of the golden leaf was even presented to the governor during a statewide tobacco meeting in Columbia earlier this year.

Five buildings house the King hog operation, which was started in 1978. King planned to use corn he raised for feed when he began operation.

Also honored at the state convention was Rufus Lawrimore of Hemingway. He lived in his native Muddy Creek until 1976 when he built a home near Hemingway.

Lawrimore was praised highly at the meeting by state Farm Bureau Federation President Harry Bell for his determination that tobacco farmers retain the tobacco support programs. "All farmers, especially tobacco farmers, owe him a debt of gratitude," Bell said.

In 1933, Lawrimore helped to organize the first tobacco program under the U.S. Department of Agriculture. In 1948, he helped to organize what at that time was the only tobacco warehouse in Hemingway.

Speaking to the audience, Lawrimore said after receiving the Distinguished Service Award, "Agriculture means a lot to me, and I think it is the true backbone of the American economy." Food has never been cheaper, "thanks to you people," he told the group.

An additional award presented, not to an individual, but to Williamsburg County's farm bureau officials was one for "quota bustin." The Williamsburg officials were honored for leading the state in increasing membership. The Williamsburg group grew by 46 percent in 1981 from 905 members to 1,312.●

IN HONOR OF ANNIVERSARY OF CONNELLSVILLE MOOSE LODGE

HON. AUSTIN J. MURPHY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to recognize the Connellsville, Pa., Lodge of the Loyal Order of the Moose, which recently celebrated the 75th anniversary of its founding. Established January 29, 1907, the Connellsville Lodge is the oldest in Pennsylvania and the second oldest in the entire Moose Organization, which spans the United States, Canada, and Great Britain.

The Loyal Order of the Moose is a fraternal organization dedicated to serving the communities that help strengthen its lodges. Moose lodges provide a strong foundation of support for local activities; and their aid to charities is generous and consistent. The National Moose organization operates two facilities which care for the needy young and old of the families of their members.

Their unswerving commitment to the welfare of the community is a characteristic we should all seek to emulate. In an age when good will and dedication are becoming increasingly rare commodities, the Moose Lodge stands as an organization which still cherishes them. The Connellsville Moose Lodge today marks three-quarters of a century of this work, and it is a great source of pride to Pennsylvania and the Nation.●

U.S. CITIZENS' LIBERTIES ABRIDGED

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration continues to step up its actions aimed at abridging the liberties of U.S. citizens with its announcements that foreign scientists will not be permitted to visit certain universities, or discuss ideas which they hold on matters of scientific value.

Several editorials and news reports have been written in the past few weeks objecting to this action by the administration to use the Arms Export and Control Act, the Export Control Act, and a forthcoming watered-down Freedom of Information Act to defend this policy.

This latest step to limit the extent to which foreign scientists and U.S. scientists can discuss matters within their field of expertise has received the strong denouncement from the prestigious governing council of the American Association for the Advancement of Science on January 7, 1982. Our colleague GEORGE BROWN from California, a scientist himself, outlined this problem in the January 25, 1982, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The administration, apparently close to hysteria over the threat to our Government and its citizens from hostile intelligence services and international terrorist groups believes that it should be trusted with absolute faith and power to control all information. I believe Congress and the public should have something to say about this. I urge my colleagues to read the editorial by Robert Jones which appeared in this month's edition of Industrial Research & Development as well as the January 6, 1982, Christian Science Monitor article by Robert Cowen entitled "Restriction of Scholarly Freedom on University Campuses" which follow:

AN EDITORIAL BY ROBERT JONES

If you wake up in the middle of the night and hear a steady chip, chip, chip, chip and you don't live above a person who carves marble statues and you don't share your room with a lumberjack, chances are pretty good that what you are hearing is someone chipping away at your freedom. Just because we won our freedom in the Revolutionary War and reconfirmed it in the War of 1812 and on a few other occasions doesn't mean that we don't have to keep winning it today. Freedom is like having a full stomach or a fresh shave or a nice hair-do. It has to be renewed regularly. However, there is a critical difference: Skip an occasional meal or shave or hair-do and little permanent damage is likely to occur. On the other hand, if you let your freedom get away from you just once, there is a strong probability that you will never see it again!

It would have been a lot easier for all of us if we had chosen to cherish something less elusive than freedom. Slavery can go on from generation to generation with absolutely no efforts at renewing it. Poverty is self-restoring. War will generate spontaneously. Death comes unsolicited. Freedom, like quicksilver, can slip between our fingers while we think we are holding onto it.

And there's something about being in positions of power that makes men and women be very fond of their own freedoms and very anxious to permanently remove other people's freedoms. People in power suffer from an occupational myopia that leads them to believe that they are the only ones who can make proper use of freedom and that all other persons can be expected to abuse freedom.

The chipping away of our freedoms usually is done so quietly that it can be heard only under the most difficult conditions, such as in the middle of the night, or in retrospect, when it is too late. Had you heard the chipping sound made by the people who want to amend the Arms Export and Control Act? Probably not. We did because Rep. George E. Brown (D-CA) called attention to this danger in his recent talk before the American Vacuum Society. The last sentence of the proposed Section 38A reads, in part, "Notwithstanding any other provision of law, information specified [as pertaining to items in the U.S. Munitions List and to be controlled in the national interest] or materials revealing such information, shall not be published or disclosed unless the Secretary of Defense . . . determines that withholding is contrary to the national interest."

Warned Representative Brown, "This literally gives the Secretary of Defense unlimited powers to control, restrict, or forbid communication of any kind, technical or otherwise! This is so because the Munitions List is written in fairly broad language . . . and because of the all-encompassing wording of the last sentence." Even without this amendment, efforts to limit academic freedom through the export controls act have been made at Stanford, Univ. of Minnesota, and elsewhere on campuses and at conferences. And we can believe that if it happens on the campuses today, it will happen to our magazines and newspapers tomorrow. This proposed amendment is still alive. Final vote is scheduled early in this new year. If it becomes law, the chipping will be much easier to hear—because much of the meaningful communication will have been stopped.

RESTRICTION OF SCHOLARLY FREEDOM ON UNIVERSITY CAMPUSES

(By Robert C. Cowen)

At Stanford University, Prof. Bruce Lusignan is defying the US government with the full backing of the university administration. At the University of Minnesota, president C. Peter Margrath has adopted a similar stance.

They are refusing to comply with restrictions that amount to one of the greatest threats to academic and scientific freedom ever faced in the United States.

Acting under broad interpretations of the Export Control Act and the Arms Export Control Act, the Departments of Commerce, Defense, and State, are trying to restrict access of foreign scholars and students to a number of areas of knowledge, such as computer science, and curtail contact between them and US citizens. No military or even commercial, secrets are involved. What is being sought is restriction on ordinary, open university classrooms, seminars, libraries, and scientific meetings.

This pressure has been increasing over the past few years. Already, several embarrassing, even ludricous, incidents have erupted. For example, a year and a half ago, visas were suddenly revoked for some Eastern European scientists who were to attend an open conference on computer memories. Chinese experts at the meeting had to sign "letters of assurance" not to divulge what they might learn there. Now at Minnesota, Stanford, and some other campuses, professors, deans and presidents are being asked to deny foreigners full access to university life. They are even being asked to monitor their travel.

This is the kind of police state restriction of scholarly freedom normally associated with totalitarism. At Minnesota and Stanford, now, it is being resisted. "The Campus environment is completely open with no means to prohibit access by foreigners. . . . Even if we had the means to monitor or police the activities of any subgroup of scholars, such actions would drastically disrupt the academic environment which is essential in fostering creative research endeavors," Gerald Lieberman, Stanford vice-provost, says.

Rep. George E. Brown (D) of California warns that "existing and proposed government controls over the flow of scientific and technical information can have a potentially devastating effect on the scientific enterprise."

He asks, "Can we really expect a set of regulations to be workable when the Frenchman can talk to the Chinese at a conference, but the American can talk to neither? Is it realistic to label as 'classified' some abstract thoughts in the mind of a mathematician, to the extent that the very act of committing these thoughts to a piece of paper might constitute a violation of law? These are not far-fetched examples."

Such restrictions are sought in the name of national or commercial security. They would secure neither, but they could seriously damage scientific freedom. Such police state tactics have no place in the United States of America.●

THE OLDER WORKER JOBS PROGRAM SHOULD BE CONTINUED, NOT TERMINATED

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, the Department of Labor recently sent a budget transmittal to the Office of Budget and Management to terminate the successful and popular senior community service employment program under title V of the Older Americans Act.

It is with a deep sense of urgency that I call upon President Reagan to reject this ill-conceived idea, and provide full funding for this extraordinarily effective program for low-income persons 55 or older.

I have witnessed firsthand the achievements of the SCSEP in New York City. Title V is a concept that works well for older Americans, the localities being served, and our Nation.

It has enabled low-income older persons to help themselved while helping others in their community at the same time.

Title V has been one of the most effective employment program ever enacted. It has been free of fraud and abuse. Administrative expenses have been kept to a minimum. In fact, about $7 out of $8 for title V is expended for the participants' wages, fringe benefits, and other supportive services.

If the Department of Labor recommendation is accepted, many more older Americans would be thrown onto the poverty rolls. Poverty has already increased by 800,000, from 5.1 million in 1978 to 5.9 million in 1980. This represents the sharpest increase over a 2-year period since poverty statistics were first tabulated more than two decades ago. Phasing out title V will only add to the economic misery of low-income older Americans.

It would be particularly cruel to terminate this successful program at a time of exceptionally high unemployment. Our national unemployment rate has soared in recent months, reaching 8.9 percent in December. If it climbs above 9 percent as it now expected this would represent the highest unemployment rate in 41 years. It simply does not make good sense—economically, politically, or otherwise—to wipe out an extraordinarily effective employment program for older workers when the national unemployment rate is expected to reach an alltime record high since 1941.

Older Americans have been especially hard hit by disastrous economic policies. Unemployment for persons 55 or older has jumped by 18 percent, from 523,000 in July 1981 to 617,000 in December 1981. However, the unemployment level only represents the tip of the iceberg because there is a substantial amount of hidden unemployment among older Americans. The unemployment figures, for example, do not include older persons who have given up looking for a job after a prolonged and fruitless search.

The SCSEP is also cost effective. One study revealed that title V can save $1.15 in public assistance costs for each $1 spent. Without the SCSEP, many older Americans would be forced to depend upon food stamps, supplemental security income, medicaid, and other assistance. Termination of the program will not save money because this will simply drive up public assistance costs. Unemployment insurance, for example, would increase by about $45 million if title V would be eliminated.

I reaffirm my strong support for the SCSEP and urge President Reagan to continue title V at its full funding level.●

COAST GUARD CUTS PROPOSED

HON. BOB TRAXLER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Speaker, on January 22, 1982, the Department of Transportation announced plans to drastically reduce operations and eliminate several activities of the U.S. Coast Guard in order to cut Federal spending. The targeted operations include closure or reductions of air stations, multimission stations, recruiting stations, marine safety offices, vessel documentation offices, merchant mariner licensing offices, boating safety programs, as well as the decommissioning of aircraft and 11 Coast Guard cutters.

Frankly, I find these reductions deplorable and foolishly ill-advised. While it may be necessary for us all to look for ways to reduce Federal spending, I cannot condone an action which eliminates some of the most vital Coast Guard programs and leaves life, property, and areas of our national defense unprotected.

Michigan is one of the States most affected by these cuts. We have been advised of 15 closures, 5 reductions, and the decommissioning of the Coast Guard cutter Mackinaw in our State alone.

As an example of the harsh impact of these cuts, I would like to call your attention to the slated closure of the search and rescue station in Harbor Beach, Mich. This is a station that has faithfully served the residents of the State of Michigan and Huron County for 46 years. It has an exemplary record of protecting both lives and property.

In just the past 4 years, this station has saved 22 lives and directly assisted 594 persons who found themselves in life-threatening situations. It has assisted in the protection of property amounting to $6.3 million and has prevented the direct loss of property amounting to nearly half a million dollars.

The Harbor Beach Coast Guard Station is part of a total plan. It is situated on Lake Huron and was strategically located so as to maximize an efficient response to calls for assistance. The elimination of this station means that if an off-shore disaster occurs in the eastern "thumb" area of Michigan, it could take 5 to 6 hours before help could arrive from another active station. The nearest help would have to come from 50 and 60 miles away on each side. This closing would leave 93 miles of coastline on Lake Huron unprotected.

The attempt to close this station comes at a most inopportune time. The State of Michigan, suffering an economic depression, has been engaged in an active promotion of travel and tourism activities by enticing recreational boaters and fishermen into the area. A vast increase of fishermen and small boats is projected for the near future. All indications are that the protection responsibilities of the Harbor Beach Coast Guard Station will be tremendously increased. Closing the station will no doubt result in unnecessary and tragic losses of life and property.

Mr. Speaker, this is only one example of what a reduction in the U.S. Coast Guard will mean. Needless to say, the residents of Harbor Beach and Huron County have a great deal to be angry about. I am enclosing a copy of a resolution passed at a special meeting of the city council of the city of Harbor Beach for the RECORD.

Knowing of the devastating impact the Coast Guard closures could have, it would be unconscionable for us to allow the administration to proceed with their cuts. I along with several of my colleagues have taken steps to correct this situation by cosponsoring a supplemental appropriations bill for the U.S. Coast Guard which will provide enough money to fund Coast Guard operations at current levels.

Many closures are targeted for March 31, 1982. I implore this legislative body to act with great haste toward passage of this legislation so that the closings will not go into effect.

RESOLUTION

Whereas the U.S. Department of Transportation plans to shut down the U.S. Coast Guard Station at Harbor Beach, Michigan, on March 31, 1982; and

Whereas the City of Harbor Beach is extremely concerned about the safety of those using the Harbor and the area north and south of the Harbor; and

Whereas the City has experienced an influx of fishermen as a result of the Michigan Department of Natural Resources establishing Harbor Beach as a major fish planting area; and

Whereas small craft traffic has increased tremendously as a result of the planting and harvesting of fish; and

Whereas the Michigan Department of Natural Resources, Waterways Division, proposes to build a large marina within the Harbor at Harbor Beach; and

Whereas it could take five to six hours for a rescue boat to reach Harbor Beach from either U.S. Coast Guard Station Tawas or Port Huron; and

Whereas twenty-two (22) lives have been saved by the U.S. Coast Guard service at Harbor Beach during the years 1978-1981: Now, therefore be it

Resolved that the City Council of the City of Harbor Beach goes on record as being opposed to the shut down of this station; and be it further

Resolved that this communication be sent to our two U.S. Senators, our U.S. Congressmen, the Commandant of the U.S. Coast Guard and to the U.S. Secretary of Transportation.●

MAINTAIN VITAL FEDERAL EMPLOYMENT SERVICES

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, this morning the House Appropriations Committee will be marking up an emergency supplemental appropriations bill which will maintain employment compensation payments and the operation of employment services and job placement specialists across the country. I would like to take this opportunity to express my urgent support for this measure, and for the efforts of those who assist unemployed workers in finding jobs.

As a result of federally mandated budget cuts for the Employment Service and the unemployment insurance program, job placement and unemployment insurance offices are closing all over the country. In my home State of Massachusetts, a large number of employment office closings were announced yesterday. It seems cruelly ironic that at a time when ever larger numbers of Americans are being forced on to the unemployment line, there are fewer resources available to help get these workers back into productive employment.

I am relieved by the introduction of this emergency appropriations bill for employment services, and urge its speedy passage. It is my hope that most, if not all of the offices closed as a result of the budget cuts can be reopened and can once again go about their business of seeking ways to reemploy American workers.●

THE 34TH NATIONAL DAY OF INDEPENDENCE FOR SRI LANKA

HON. THOMAS S. FOLEY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, February 4 commemorates the 34th National Day of Independence for the people of Sri Lanka. On February 4, 1948, Sri Lanka regained her independence from the British, the last of three nations that had colonized her over the preceding four centuries.

Since 1948 seven general elections have been held in Sri Lanka. Sri Lanka has a multiparty system. Over the past 16 years voter turnout at general elections has averaged over 80 percent. The year 1981 marked the 50th anniversary of the granting of universal adult franchise in the modern political history of the nation. Although the experience and practice of adult franchise existed in Sri Lanka even in historic times, this was only at the local level of government; the government at the national level was monarchical. In 1931 elections were held at the national level on the basis of universal adult franchise for the first time. Since then all elections in the country have been held on this basis. Today, every citizen of the country over the age of 18 years has a vote. Women in Sri Lanka actively participate in politics. The first general election held on the basis of universal adult franchise in 1931 also saw a woman elected to the national legislature which was then called the state council.

From 1948 until 1972 Sri Lanka, while being an independent nation, still retained, in common with certain other nations, the British monarch as head of state. On May 22, 1972, a republican constitution was adopted by which the governor-general, who had represented the British monarch, was replaced by a titular president nominated by the elected head of government. This constitution set up a unicameral legislature instead of the bicameral one that had hitherto existed. It also changed the name of the country back from Ceylon to its traditional and historic name, Sri Lanka.

Mr. J. R. Jayewardene, under whose leadership the United National Party had been returned to office in July 1977 had consistently campaigned for the establishment of an executive presidential system. Such a constitution was promulgated on February 4, 1978. It draws from the constitutional practices of the United States, France, and Britain, adapting them to the needs and aspirations of Sri Lanka and her people. Sovereignty of the people is exercised through parliament; and there is strict separation of powers between the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary.

A futher development in the political structure of the country has been the establishment of district development councils in each of the 24 districts of the country. The purpose of these councils is to provide for greater participation at the district and regional level in the development of the country. These councils consist of members elected specifically to them and the member of parliament in the district. Their functions include the approval and implementation of an annual development plan and the raising of certain local revenues and the disposition of funds under their control. The first election to the district development councils as held on June 4, 1981.

Sri Lanka has, living within its area of 25,000 square miles, a variety of ethnic groups—Sinhalese, Tamils, Moors, Burghers, and Parsis—who are adherents of almost an equal variety of religious beliefs—Buddhists, Hindus, Muslims, Christians, and Zoroastrians. The guarantee of fundamental rights and equal opportunities to all citizens is given by the constitution where the chapter on fundamental rights embodies all 30 clauses contained in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of the United Nations.

In foreign affairs, Sri Lanka has chosen to follow a policy of nonalinement. Both in the 95-member nonalined movement of which she was chairman from 1976 to 1979, and also in the U.N., of which she is a member, she bases her actions and initiatives on the principles established at Bandung in 1955 and on the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations. Her consistent aim has been to work within this framework toward the furtherance of reconciliation among nations, the peaceful settlement of disputes, and the evolution of an international milieu where nations of diverse ideological persuasions could move together toward the betterment of the lot of all nations and peoples.

Since 1948 Sri Lanka has pursued a domestic policy of betterment of the lot of her population through the stimulation of economic growth. Programs in the fields of health, education, and nutrition coupled with a strong family planning program have helped develop a healthy, literate, and educated people. Life expectancy is 64 years for males and 67 years for females; the death rate is 8.1 per 1,000; the literacy rate is 88 percent. However, Sri Lanka's earnings have been and still are inadequate to meet the needs of development, being vulnerable to price movements in international commodity markets. So, although successive governments have addressed themselves to the problem of economic development, its solution still has eluded them.

The present government, which came into power in 1977, has focused sharply on economic development as a major commitment of its program. It has approached the question in two main areas—agricultural self-sufficiency and the attraction of foreign investment for industrial development, mainly through the setting up of free trade zones.

Through the Mahaweli development program five dams are to be constructed and land opened for agriculture with financial assistance from a consortium of countries comprising the United States, Canada, Britain, the Federal Republic of Germany, Sweden, and Japan together with the World Bank and the IDA. This project is expected to irrigate around 117,000 hectares of land and generate around 500 megawatts of power.

In the area of industrial development, the initial period of decontrol and deregulation soon after the present government came into power, cleared the way for the entry of foreign investment, both within the free trade zones and outside them. One free trade zone has been parceled out and a second is being created. Attracted by the package of tax and other incentives 40 industrial enterprises are already manufacturing and exporting goods while 16 others have factories in various stages of construction. Among the goods exported are garments, rubberthread, hair dryers, fishing gear, and jewelry. Among eight projects recently approved are leatherware, kitchen appliances, electronic devices, and PVC containers.

The period from 1978 to 1980 has also seen 11 new foreign banks and credit companies given permission to operate in Sri Lanka on an offshore basis. Four are from the United States—Chase Manhattan, Bank of America, Citibank, and American Express.

In the field of trade too, the pattern of imports has shown an emphasis on development. Imports of intermediate goods has risen from 38 percent of total imports in 1978 to 40.5 percent in 1979. Imports of investment goods has risen from 23 percent of total imports in 1978 to 24 percent in 1979. Both these categories are essential for Sri Lanka's development. By contrast, imports of consumer goods has fallen from 38 percent of total imports in 1978 to 34 percent in 1979. The comparison becomes that more impressive when one considers that the value of imports in these three categories, in SDR's, has grown from 744 million in 1978 to 1,114 million in 1979. In 1980 imports of intermeidate goods rose to 46 percent of total imports, investment goods remained at the same level as 1979 and imports of consumer goods declined to 29.4 percent. The total imports in all three categories in SDR's rose to 1,557.6 million.

The objective of all these efforts is to endeavor to insure that the gains of the country in the fields of political development and awareness, education, health, and other basic areas are consolidated by the creation of adequate economic opportunity for her people. For it is only by doing this that Sri Lanka can enhance the quality of life of her people, promote human rights, and enrich and stabilize her democratic institutions.●

EDUCATION FOR ALL HANDICAPPED CHILDREN

HON. THOMAS B. EVANS, JR.

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, the Congress made a strong and clear statement to the Nation in 1975 with passage of the Education for All Handicapped Children Act: All handicapped children have the right to a free and appropriate public education.

This act—Public Law 94-142—has proven to be successful in my home State of Delaware and across the country. Because of the productive partnership between parents, teachers, State, local, and Federal officials made possible by Public Law 94-142, nearly 4 million handicapped youth are receiving a free and appropriate education.

In order to insure this success story continues, we need to maintain current levels of support at the Federal level. I firmly believe we must avoid any disruptive reductions in the funding for 94-142, and also need to keep the current structure of the program intact. At this point in the RECORD I would like to include a letter several of my colleagues and I sent to the President today that further details our concerns about this programs.

President RONALD REAGAN,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We are writing to request your assistance in assuring continued support for P.L. 94-142, the Education for All Handicapped Children Act, and its support programs. This Act guarantees that each handicapped child be provided a free appropriate public education. It is our understanding that the Department of Education has proposed significant reductions in federal funds for this program in FY 1983. In addition, the Department has proposed substantive amendments to the statute which would seriously undermine the rights afforded handicapped children and their parents.

While concern has been expressed regarding excessive federal regulations, it has been documented that many of the administrative burdens associated with the implementation of P.L. 94-142 are a result of state and local interpretations of the federal statute. Our major concern is assuring the continuation of the effective federal, state and local partnership that presently exists to provide educational services to handicapped children.

In addition to the positive impact in human terms that this legislation has wrought for handicapped children and their families, the program has proven that it is cost-effective. At a recent press conference you presented a dramatic example of a chronically ill young girl from Iowa who could receive appropriate treatment at home for $1,000 per month, instead of in the hospital for $6,000 from Medicaid funds. You indicated that unnecessary hospitalization was a tremendous expense to the taxpayers and was not advantageous to the patient.

A similar situation exists with many of our handicapped citizens. According to the staff in the Health Care Financing Administration, in the Department of Health and Human Services, costs to provide basic maintenance care to an individual have risen from $5,100 per year in 1974 to $16,000 per year in 1980. The total cost of lifetime institutionalization, including maintenance, medical and rehabilitative services, ranges from an estimated $1 million to $4 million per person. It has been demonstrated time and again that institutionalizing handicapped adults at the taxpayers expense can often be prevented by providing an appropriate education to handicapped youth.

During the 1980 presidential election campaign, the Exceptional Parent magazine requested statements from the candidates regarding their position on the quality of life for individuals with disabilities. You responded by pointing out that the implementation of P.L. 94-142 was perhaps the greatest stride made to date toward a workable plan for the education of handicapped children. You went on to say that as President you would work to ensure that the Education for All Handicapped Children Act is a success. We hope that you will reaffirm your pledge by endorsing current levels of federal funding for P.L. 94-142 and its support programs, and opposing any substantive changes in the statute.

With best regards,
Sincerely,

THOMAS B. EVANS, Jr.,
Member of Congress.●

TRIBUTE TO RICHARD BOLLING

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 28, 1982

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a fellow Member and friend, DICK BOLLING, with whom I have had the privilege of serving in this body for the last 21 years.

A seasoned observer of the American political process once observed that:

Political leadership in a democracy is perhaps the most difficult of human endeavors, because, to be of high quality, it must combine in one man or a small group of men many difficult, sometime seemingly conflicting, qualities. * * * a truly effective leader must have an ability to foresee problems that will arise in the future. * * * a sense of history, awareness of the present. * * * an ability to differentiate between critical and less important problems. * * * A political leader must be at home with the essential element of working democracy: compromise.

Those observations are not mine, although I share their sentiments. They were the observations of DICK BOLLING in his book, "Power in the House," written 16 years ago.

Few men have met the standards of political leadership that I have just put forth; RICHARD BOLLING has. Moreover his political leadership has left its mark on the body that we have jointly served for the past 21 years.

Sixteen years ago, when he wrote his book, "Power in the House," the norms and procedures of this body were markedly different than they are today. We labored under a seniority system that ignored the talents and energies of younger Members. Most of our committee work was conducted behind closed doors. The budget process was a shambles. The rules and procedures of this body had failed to keep pace with the changing times.

Much has changed in the intervening 16 years. Much of that change is due to the efforts of one man: DICK BOLLING. For more than anyone else, it was DICK BOLLING who spearheaded many of the reforms that we now take for granted.

I for one, however, will not forget his contribution; in part, because I served beside him in many of the struggles for reform, in part because I have always admired his devotion to the democratic process.

The House of Representatives is a critical part of our constitutional system. No one has ever served here by appointment, and the only ticket that will gain admission to the House is election by the people. Understandably, many Members of the House desire to serve in the Senate where one can escape the anonymity of the House. Very few people in the history of this institution have made their career, believing, as I do, that it can be as important and productive as service on the north end of the Capitol. I call these people, "Men of the House." DICK BOLLING is the prototype of that public servant. He probably is better known and has achieved more for his country and his principles than most of the Members who have come and gone since he arrived here in 1949.

Sometimes statesmen can best be judged by what they tried to do, not by what they did. In the 93d Congress, DICK BOLLING took on one of the House of Representatives' greatest problems: the confusing and overlapping committee jurisdictions and the institutional creep which creates new committees of the House, but never abolishes any. He spent a year with a great bipartisan select committee producing a new committee structure to replace the old one, which had not been reviewed since 1946. He failed to get the House to adopt it, but nobody—I am convinced—could have won that fight in the climate of those days. The combined power of the entrenched committee chairmen was enough to narrowly defeat him. But that fight created the groundwork on which a new committee structure will someday be erected.

When he leaves this body next year, DICK BOLLING leaves it to write a book on the political process. I am confident that in his new capacity he will continue to serve the democratic process with the same dedication and skill that he has exhibited in his years of service in this body. Nevertheless, he will be missed, both as a senior member of this body and as chairman of the Rules Committee. Most of all, he will be missed as a friend.

Even as he goes to reflect upon his years of service in this body, I hope he will not forget those with whom he has served. We shall not forget him or his record of service and accomplishment.●

TRIBUTE TO RON STEPHENSON

HON. JOHN P. MURTHA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, February 14, the Johnstown area community gathers to honor one of its leading citizens, and a man who has been an institution in the Johnstown area—Ron Stephenson.

I have known Ron Stephenson for many years, and it is hard to say his name without adding, Ron Stephenson of WJAC. He began in 1947 with WJAC radio, then moved on to TV where he became the leading news anchorman in the area.

All of us associate the major news developments of our lifetime with Ron Stephenson. We remember his strong voice for America during the Vietnam war, we remember that his was a voice of calm and reassurance for our future during the Johnstown flood, we remember that the election results really did not seem legitimate until we heard them from Ron Stephenson. Like a neighbor, we welcomed Ron into our living rooms at noon and 6 p.m., and over the years we shared with him the horror of assassinations, the thrill of space exploration, and detailing of local stories and developments.

No one can remember Ron Stephenson without thinking of his hard-hitting editorials. Sometimes we agreed with him, and other times we disagreed, but we always respected his views and knew he spoke from the heart, sharing his experience and understanding with us.

He is a pragmatist with strong personal convictions and a deep love for his country and community. Most of all, we knew he cared—cared about the community and cared about the people and the problems we faced in everyday life. We knew he was part of our community, shared our hopes, remembered our difficulties, and joined us in working to improve our area and our lives.

When our lives change, it is an occasion of importance to our families—for Ron Stephenson that family is the entire Johnstown area, and it is a pleasure to join with the community in wishing Ron Stephenson well, and thanking him for sharing so much of himself with us over the last 35 years.●

RETIREMENT INCOME AND TAXES

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to equalize the tax treatment of retirement income for all senior citizens. I do not think it is fair that one group of retirees can exclude all retirement income from taxes while others cannot. I believe that all senior citizens living off of retirement income should be able to exclude from taxes an amount of money equal to the maximum amount payable in old-age insurance benefits under social security. Why should a person's previous occupation determine his or her future tax status?

Presently, old-age insurance benefits under title II of the Social Security Act are excluded from gross income in calculating Federal income taxes. Yet, other retirement benefits, such as civil service retirement, State and local government retirement, military retired pay, and private pensions are fully taxed. My bill would provide that up to the maximum amount which could be excluded if paid as old-age insurance benefits could also be excluded if paid out of other retirement systems. The bill does not touch the other tax exclusions already on the books.

My legislation would limit this tax benefit to senior citizens who meet two qualifications. First, the taxpayer would have to be aged 65 or older. Second, the taxpayer would have to receive over half of his or her income from retirement benefits. Those with significant other sources of income would not be eligible. In other words, this tax exclusion would only help those senior citizens living on modest incomes.

The Reagan cuts have hit our senior citizens with ruthless force. We must act to protect our retirees from hunger and homelessness. This bill is one small step we can take to make up for the damage done last year. I urge the Committee on Ways and Means to consider promptly this legislation.●

PASTOR BATSON HONORED

HON. JOHN L. NAPIER

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. NAPIER. Mr. Speaker, recently I had the privilege of witnessing an event which garnered no great headlines outside of its own community, did not make the national evening television news programs, created no great noise worthy of focused journalistic attention, nor did the event spark a debate of pros and cons. This event, in itself a tribute to humility, was worthy of the man it was designed to honor.

Throughout his life, Rev. Paul O. Batson has sought no headlines, created no controversy. Like the solid Christian life he has led, this man has spent his life carefully listening to and responding to an authority greater than any on Earth. His services has not been aimed at accumulating trophies, but serving mankind through the steady and unfaltering Christian witness to which he has been long committed.

His humility has been a lifelong trademark. He has sought no worldly recognition and would probably view public acclamation of his efforts with uncertainty. Yet, those whom he has long served, whose griefs and burdens, joys and celebrations he has shared over the past 25 years, honored him recently with a special Sunday service in Marion, S.C.

Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of attending the ceremonies honoring Dr. Batson, and feel that this good man's life serves as an example for all of us. Accordingly, I ask that the news account which appeared in the January 20, 1982, edition of the Marion Star be included at this point in the RECORD.

[From the Marion Star, Marion, S.C., Jan. 20, 1982]

MARION BAPTISTS HONOR PASTOR PAUL O. BATSON

(By Rodney Welch)

This past Sunday was an unusually special day for Reverend Paul O. Batson and Marion Baptist Church, where he has served as pastor for the past twenty-five years.

Without his prior knowledge, churchmembers under the leadership of Anniversary Chairman T. Carroll Atkinson honored Batson for his Silver Anniversary of 25 years of service to the church—a time in which the church has expanded and Batson, a warm and highly personable man, has become a highly-regarded fixture of spirituality and respect throughout the city and state.

Although Rev. Batson had already made plans for the Sunday service as he normally would, Atkinson and the members, who had been notified two weeks earlier, had something else in mind. The surprise service instead consisted of several speakers from around the state and beyond to praise, and delicately roast, the guest of honor by offering their fond and sometimes funny reminiscences. The service also included some special music by former Minister of Music Jim Hawkins.

"I guess you could say he's my boss," said Dr. C. W. Scudder, from Midwestern Baptist Theological Seminary in Kansas City, Missouri, where Batson is a trustee. Scudder said that he had always enjoyed his fellowship with the Batsons, and that this had enriched since he had become a part of the faculty at Midwestern.

Dr. Bill Boyce, President of the Baptist Hospital in Columbia, (where Batson also serves as a trustee) recalled how he had first met Batson when the former was an assistant administrator at the hospital back in the early 1940's.

Also offering testimonials were S.C. Baptist Convention Secretary-Treasurer, Dr. Harold Cole, Anderson College President Dr. Ray Rust, and Rev. George Lovell, Pastor Emeritus of First Baptist Church in Conway who filled in for Dr. John E. Johns from Furman, who was scheduled to appear but had been taken ill. All of these recalled their schooling or professional associations with the Batsons. His brother Lloyd, pastor of the First Baptist Church in Pickens, concluded the guest speaker remarks with some recollections of growing up with his brother and added that he was also "proud to say he's my friend." Also scheduled to speak was brother J. Ray Batson, who was unable to attend, and was replaced by Dr. James A. Rogers from Francis Marion College.

By the conclusion of the service, Atkinson offered his own recollections of the Batson family's initial beginnings in Marion, and read a letter from former First United Methodist minister Reginald Thackston, who pictured Batson as "the epitome of a shepherd."

Atkinson also revealed a heavy paperbound volume of appreciative letters from the roughly 150 associates and friends of the pastor who had been invited to the service but couldn't attend. Atkinson then presented the final honor, a $5000.00 check from the church to Rev. and Mrs. Batson for a trip to the Holy Land in March.

In a packed congregational attendance were the Batson children daughter Mary Lynn, son Paul (the III) and his wife Joanne. Son John was unable to attend. Also recognized were many other close friends of the family, including Congressman John Napier.

Batson responded in the closing remarks to the service with some emotion, saying that the day was "one of the two or three greatest in my life." He said he was totally surprised by the event, and joked that upon seeing the church floral arrangements he wasn't sure if he had forgotten a wedding or if his funeral was being scheduled. Concerning the Holy Land check, Batson jokingly asked if it covered for a round trip.

Atkinson later told The Star that the trip had been granted because Batson had always wanted to return to the Holy Land after an earlier trip years ago, but that "knowing Paul Batson like I do," Atkinson said, he would never go if it was offered instead of outrightly given.

After an invocation by Batson's uncle, L. Clarence Lyons from Sumter, a reception dinner immediately followed the service, held in the Marion City Firehouse.

Paul Batson was born December 25th, 1922, in Greenwood, S.C., and grew up in Sumter and Clarendon counties. His father, and four brothers, are all ministers.

Batson was educated at North Greenville College from 1940-41, and held a brief student pastorate in Clarendon County before joining the Air Corps for three years during World War II. Batson spent two of these years in C.B.I. Theater of War, and was later awarded the Bronze Star Medal in Calcutta, India. Returning to South Carolina, he held a student pastorate at Standing Spring Baptist Church and soon after entered Furman University. Batson was to later attend Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, graduating in 1952 with a Bachelor of Divinity degree, which was later updated to a Masters. Before arriving at Marion, Batson was to also pastor churches in Georgetown, Kentucky, Little Rock, South Carolina, and Fair Bluff, North Carolina.

Since his 1957 arrival at the Baptist Church, Batson has been involved heavily in the State Baptist Convention, serving in offices as Vice-President, Nominating Committee Chairman, Trustee of the Baptist Hospital in Columbia, former member of the General Board, and Chairman of a Committee to study and establish guidelines for the Office of minister-Church-Denomination relationships.

In the Southern Baptist Convention, he has been a member of the Committee on Boards (which makes committee appointments) and is in his second year as Chairman of Trustees of Midwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, having served as a trustee for twelve years.

Locally, he has served on the Marion Memorial Board of Commissioners, the County Board of Education, and is a member of the Marion Community Relations Council. He is married to the former Mary Smith Cheatham, who also serves locally as City Clerk.

Last year, he was awarded the Doctor of Divinity degree from Furman University.●

RECIPROCITY II

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, on February 2, 1982, the Washington Post had an excellent editorial echoing some of my concerns on the issue of trade reciprocity. I urge my colleagues to review it, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 2, 1982]

A SPECIAL KIND OF RECIPROCITY

"Reciprocity," in international trade, is one of those ideas that seem self-evident at first glance. What could be fairer than being fair? It's when you look more closely that certain doubts begin to form. What, exactly, does reciprocity mean? A tooth for a tooth? A car for a car? A jetliner for a jetliner? Under that strict rule, this country would shortly be importing very few automobiles, since it exports very few. But—and here's the catch—since this country imports few aircraft it would also be exporting fewer, with resulting layoffs in the aircraft factories.

That, presumably, wasn't quite what U.S. Special Trade Representative William E. Brock had in mind when he used the term in an international meeting yesterday. He intended to suggest that this country's barriers to foreign goods should be the same as its trading partners'. You don't have to be terribly perceptive to see that it's Japan that Mr. Brock has in mind. But it's hard to see how a legal rule of reciprocity would work there. True, Japan sells much more to the United States than it buys here. It's also true that the United States sells more—a lot more—to the Europeans than it buys from them. Country-by-country trade never balances. What about the worldwide trade totals? You probably are aware that the United States sells less to foreign countries, in total, than it buys from them. But there is also a huge flow of money into this country from American companies' foreign investments. It balances the trade deficit, and more. If this country tried to make its exports equal its imports, at a time when some $40 billion a year in foreign investment income is rolling in, the value of the dollar would shoot up and immediately frustrate the whole idea.

Mr. Brock knows all that. What he and the administration are most worried about is, apparently, one special case—Japan, and not Japanese goods in general but goods in one very special area, semiconductors and other high-technology electronic components. They fear that the Japanese manufacturers will achieve unfair advantages in this crucial industry, through restrictions on their own home market compared with open access to the United States. That is a legitimate concern for a government but, like all trade issues, it ought to be addressed directly and specifically in negotiation, rather than through rubbery and ambiguous terms like reciprocity.

Since there can be no clear and objective definition of reciprocity in world trade, it would inevitably be administered in response to the political impulses and necessities of the moment. If Congress were ever unwise enough to put this word into legislation, it would become a mere weapon for holding down all sorts of imports, and protecting American producers at a huge cost to consumers. That isn't reciprocity. It's protectionism.●

FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT

SPEECH OF

HON. MARILYN LLOYD BOUQUARD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 28, 1982

● Mrs. BOUQUARD. Mr. Speaker, this week our Nation celebrated the 100th birthday of one of our greatest leaders, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, the 32d President of the United States. Roosevelt led our Nation through a domestic crisis and through the worst war the world has ever seen.

When Roosevelt was elected President, our Nation was in the midst of the worst depression in our history. Unemployment was high and of those who were working, some were earning as little as 10 cents an hour. The Nation was hungry and scared.

F. D. R. came to the people with plans to rebuild our country, from the bottom up. He was a pragmatist who, in his first 100 days as President, passed legislation enacting a host of programs aimed directly at helping people: Work programs, minimum wage, social security, and so on. There were programs to put America's people to work and food on her tables. By doing so, President Roosevelt rekindled the American spirit.

It was not long after that Roosevelt was also confronted with the beginnings of World War II. At that time few Americans realized the scope of the war and the vital role we would have to play to protect ourselves and our allies from despotism. In the beginning, F. D. R. did all he could to help Europe without commiting our Nation and our young men to war. But when our land was attacked, F. D. R. acted swiftly to defend our people, our land, and our way of life.

Roosevelt saw the Nation through the Great Depression; unfortunately, he did not live to see the end of World War II. The entire Nation wept at the President's passing. In his fourth term as President, Roosevelt was the only President many had known. There was a great deal of uncertainty about the future of the Nation. Would we hold on to the framework he built for helping the poor, the elderly, and the very young? And more than 40 years later we can say, yes; we have.

The Nation now faces economic difficulties; some are questioning whether the United States will continue to protect the interests of all Americans. I believe there is a dedication to do so. In his inaugural address in 1933, President Roosevelt said:

In every dark hour of our national life, a leadership of frankness and vigor has met with that understanding and support of the people themselves which is essential to victory. I am convinced that you will again give that support to leadership in these critical days.

I believe these words still hold true, and that our Government and our society will overcome our present troubles. Like the Roosevelt era, we must remain committed to the concept of investing in our Nation's people; we must be willing to try new solutions and keep working until we find answers.

Celebrating Roosevelt's birthday as we have brings into focus the enormous contributions of a great leader. F. D. R. rekindled the spirit of greatness in the hearts of his countrymen. He indeed showed us in an hour of darkness how to recapture control of our national destiny.●

CONGRESSWOMAN FERRARO'S SPEECH COMMEMORATING THE 100TH BIRTH ANNIVERSARY OF F. D. R.

HON. GILLIS W. LONG

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, on Monday night the Democratic National Committee held a dinner in New York City commemorating the 100th anniversary of the birth of one of the greatest Presidents in our history, Franklin Delano Roosevelt. The theme of the dinner was the presentation of some of the "New Faces" in the Democratic Party, some of the people who are becoming prominent figures in our party and who will be providing leadership in the years ahead.

One of the keynote speeches at Monday's dinner was given by Congresswoman GERALDINE A. FERRARO, of New York. At the start of the 97th Congress, in just her second term, Congresswoman FERRARO was elected secretary of the Democratic Caucus. As chairman of the caucus, I have had the great pleasure of working with her on many important issues facing the Congress and our party, and I have come to hold her in the highest regard. So I thought it extremely appropriate that she was chosen to keynote the DNC dinner.

In her keynote address, Congresswoman FERRARO discusses F. D. R.'s importance in the molding of our party's basic beliefs, and the direction we should go in the difficult times ahead. I would strongly urge my colleagues to take a few moments to read her carefully considered speech.

REMARKS BY HON. GERALDINE A. FERRARO

I am absolutely delighted that I have been asked to participate in the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. FDR was very much a part of my childhood. My father, though an immigrant, was an avid American when it came to participating in politics. He was a Democrat who revered FDR. Perhaps, because he recognized they both shared an American dream. My mother, I think just to be contrary, was an equally avid Republican. By the way, she has since found the error of her ways and she is now one of us. So FDR was often a topic of heated conversation in our home. My father died in May of 1944. Franklin Roosevelt died in April of 1945. My mother and I cried both times.

In 1960, when I was a newly wed living in Manhattan, I went to hear Eleanor Roosevelt speak at a neighborhood church. I remember how awed I was by her presence, how terribly proud I was to meet her. Proud not only because she was such a great lady, a role model, a leader in her own right, but because she had been married to a man one magazine called, "the 20th century's addition to the roster of founding fathers."

While running for office, Ronald Reagan liked to draw parallels between himself and Franklin Roosevelt. Roosevelt, he told us, was his hero. We now know, after 1 year of Reaganomics, that he misspoke.

I believe that's the term he uses—he was only off by one President, he meant to say that Herbert Hoover was his hero. And, perhaps with the help of one of the gentlemen here tonight, Hoover's campaign slogan will become a reality. The Reagans will vacate the White House and in 1984, this country will "return to normalcy."

The day before FDR was inaugurated the New York Times said: "No President—ever came to greater opportunities amid so great an outpouring of popular trust and hope."

And, FDR responded to that trust and hope. Now, I don't remember those times. I wasn't even born. I've got to tell you it's not very often I get to say that nowadays, but I remember reading about the end of the Hoover administration and the state of our Nation when Roosevelt took office.

Ours was a Nation of failing banks, astronomical unemployment, silent factories, and endless breadlines. Franklin Roosevelt waged a war against those economic ills * * * and he won.

But, unlike Reaganomics where the shock troops, the front lines, in the war are those least able to withstand the battle, and by that I mean the children, the poor, the elderly, FDR put democracy on the front lines. His second acceptance speech spoke of that war as not only one against "destitution and economic demoralization," but also one "for the survival of democracy".

And how did he win that war? Through the use of Government. The boldness and the genius of the New Deal were in the use of the power of the Government to effect change, to improve the lives of Americans suffering from the depression.

The New Deal responded to both economic needs, and the human costs of that economic chaos. In the 1980's, the latter part of that equation—human needs—has been forgotten.

Our senior centers are filled with our parents and grandparents living in the fear that their social security checks will stop, and their centers will close. Our classrooms are filed with children—hungry children—who find they have become ineligible for hot lunches. All wiped out by a single definition—the "truly needy."

What FDR remembered, Ronald Reagan forgot. FDR's New Deal of recovery and reform were geared towards the common man. Reaganomics is aimless, giving us instead a Government void of compassion.

You know, I go into my district to my senior centers, to my schools, to my town hall meetings and when I hear my people expressing their fears I ask myself, how did it ever happen. I look back to the elections of 1980 and try to find an answer. Perhaps, we as Democrats had gotten lazy. We had stopped taking our message to the people. We let the Republicans define the issues. As a result, Government became a dirty word, a synonym for waste, fraud, and abuse, as if the bulk of the Federal budget went to paying welfare cheats and do-nothing bureaucrats.

We let the fundamental facts of Government spending be obscured and distorted. We let Ronald Reagan and the Republicans get away with one of the great hoaxes in our political history.

To be fair, I want to allow for the possibility that they didn't know they were challenging the notion that you can't fool all of the people all of the time. Maybe they actually believed voodoo economics would produce a balanced budget if they just cut waste, fraud, and abuse. Afterall, David Stockman, who, by the way, we all have to thank for his contribution to Sunshine in Government, was quoted in the Atlantic Monthly article saying the Reagan people, "really thought you could find $144 billion worth of waste, fraud and abuse."

So maybe they were fooling themselves as much as anybody else.

But what is the truth about Government spending programs? What are these dread entitlements we hear so much about? Are they give-aways? Rewarding people for not working? Absolutely not.

The Government entitlement programs are mostly pension programs. Social security, veterans pensions, Federal employees pensions—benefits that have been earned by working people.

And it is the growth of pension programs which represents perhaps the single greatest accomplishment of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Until the New Deal, most people faced old age with the hope their own savings and the generosity of their families would sustain them. FDR established the notion that Government would have a hand in caring for its citizens in their old age, especially if they were unable to care for themselves.

And let me emphasize the point. These are not give-aways. We are talking about protections for working people to provide for their old age, and for nonworking people to gain opportunity to do so. This is FDR's Legacy.

And what would FDR do today? Ronald Reagan, whose mission it has been in office to dismantle Roosevelt's legacy, has expressed the view that had FDR lived after World War II, he would have undertaken to reduce the role of Government in the economy.

Could that be? His entire career was dedicated toward public action. Would he suddenly reverse this course?

Could FDR have said to the unemployed, go look in the help wanted ads in the local newspaper?

Could FDR have told those unable to find work to "vote with their feet" and move somewhere else?

Could FDR have adopted an "economic recovery program" that involved tax cuts for the wealthy and service cuts for the poor?

Could FDR have separated women's rights from human rights and civil rights?

Could he have said to the women of this country "Government has the right to control over your body, but look elsewhere for economic and social equity."

More intriguing, perhaps, is the question if he had ever tried, would Eleanor have let him get away with it.

Do we, as Democrats, believe the American people truly share the Republicans limited view of the American dream?

Let me pose Ronald Reagan's favorite question: "Are you better off now than you were a year ago?" Perhaps you are * * * if are an oil company, A.T. & T. or IBM * * * if you are a defense contractor or Alexander Haig, you are better off today than you were a year ago.

But, if you are one of the rest of us, you're not.

Franklin Roosevelt dedicated his Government service to eliminate the plight of the ill-fed, ill-housed, and ill-clad Americans. Ronald Reagan seems dedicated to increase their numbers. We, as Demorats, as responsible public servants, as human beings, are obligated to remember these newly forgotten Americans. It is our obligation to remember the legacy of FDR and to improve the lot of all Americans, not just those in the 50 percent tax bracket.

Forty years ago, Franklin Roosevelt said:

"A Nation must believe in three things. It must believe in the past. It must believe in the future. It must, above all, believe in the capacity of its people so to learn from the past that they can gain in judgment for the creation of the future."

From the lessons of history * * * the lessons of the Roosevelt successes, and the Reagan failures, we can learn. And, we can build a program * * * a platform * * * and a party, to restore the Democrats to the White House, and more importantly, to restore the compassion in Government which FDR cherished.●

CATHERINE LEE

HON. PHILLIP BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, on the weekend, February 12–14, 1982, the first statewide Asian Pacific Democratic Conference will be held in Sacramento, Calif.

On Friday evening a reception will be held honoring a truly dedicated individual who led the way for Asians and for women to participate in the political process within the Democratic Party in California.

Catherine Lee is a longtime and dear friend who has earned the recognition which the Asian Pacific Democratic Conference gives her. In a very true sense, Catherine Lee is a pioneer whose example has inspired other Asians to participate in political life and to work within that system toward a more just society.

Shortly after my first election to the California State Legislature in 1956 it was my pleasure to appoint Catherine Lee to the Democratic State Central Committee. Catherine Lee was the first Asian woman to serve on that committee.

Catherine Lee was among the founders of the Chinese American Democratic Club which was formed in the mid-1950's and she served as one of its first officers. The Chinese American Democratic Club continues to this day and actively contributes to the political life of San Francisco.

Catherine Lee and her husband, Lim P. Lee, former postmaster of San Francisco have together served the Chinese American community, the Democratic Party, San Francisco and the State of California.

I am delighted that Catherine's contribution will be recognized by the Asian Pacific Democratic Conference and I wanted to share this brief glimpse of this outstanding woman with my colleagues in the House.●

A FAULTY POLICY IN EL SALVADOR

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, George F. Kennan, former U.S. Ambassador to the Soviet Union, recently said:

> I find the view of the Soviet Union that prevails today in the large portions of our governmental . . . establishments so extreme, so subjective, so far removed from what any sober scrutiny of external reality would reveal, that is not only ineffective but dangerous as a guide to political action.

I believe Mr. Kennan's assessment of the administration's perception of the Soviet Union can be applied equally to its perception of the situation in Central America.

It seems that the administration refuses to admit, or perhaps to realize that our present course of action in El Salvador is not working. The President was willing to certify that conditions in El Salvador have improved. I find that difficult to believe when eyewitnesses reported that approximately 700 peasants were killed recently in a Salvadoran village, probably by the Salvadoran military. This is only one indication of the carnage that has been taking place in El Salvador. Estimates are as high as 30,000 people killed since the 1979 coup. As many as 24,000 civilians have been reported victims of the fighting. The bulk of the responsibility for this ongoing massacre has been placed on the right wing paramilitary groups and the regular Salvadoran military.

Why then has the President certified the Salvadoran junta as having made considerable progress with human and political rights? My judgment is that the President feels he has little alternative to his present course of action. I believe Mr. Kennan put it succinctly when he described the lack of scrutiny our Government often shows when assessing the reality of many political conflicts.

The military, or at least certain factions of the military, has lost all sense of proportion and perspective as to its role in establishing some semblance of democratic order in El Salvador. In fact, it seems that the military wants to undermine any hope for legitimate political and economic reform. The military initiated the coup in 1979, overthrowing the Romero government and usurping the oligarchy. This indicates to me that not all Salvadoran military leaders are evil or against reform. But the continuous bloodshed perpetrated by the present military leaders, leads me to believe that any reformers in the Salvadoran military have left.

Giving more military aid to the Salvadoran Government, therefore, is not only foolish, but inhuman. The more support we give to the Salvadoran armed forces, the more likely they are to take this as a sign of approval of their present course of action.

Our military assistance to El Salvador in 1982 is more than two times the amount for 1981. The $55 million that the President recently earmarked for El Salvador is more than twice that spent by the United States in fiscal year 1982. I would think the continuous pouring of good money after bad would send a message to the administration about its present policy in that country. There is an alternative to propping up the present Salvadoran junta, and elections, as Mr. Reagan and his advisers are pushing for would certainly play a part in this alternative.

But elections cannot take place under present circumstances. First of all, there is no institutional superstructure on which to build a democratic foundation. The junta, were it truly representative, could provide such a foundation, but it is not. The problem is that El Salvador, whether the United States likes it or not, is politically divided. The FMLN and FDR represent a significant portion of the populace; they must be heard. If they are not, the fighting will continue.

The only realistic solution for ending the conflict in El Salvador, then, is negotiations between all concerned groups. The French-Mexican initiative, made last year, outlined possible conditions for such negotiations. One of the criteria was a reorganization of the military. I think this is not only reasonable, but necessary. The armed forces in El Salvador, as they are presently structured, have no credibility. They are intimidating, and an obstruction to constructive negotiations.

Further, I think the example of the British in Zimbabwe can be used to guide us in setting up negotiations for El Salvador. The United States must act as an honest broker, not as a military participant in helping El Salvador decide its future. We have other strengths we can offer to the Salvadoran people other than our military strength.

Robert White, the former U.S. Ambassador to El Salvador, when talking about the Reagan administration's policy in that country, said that if you wildly misanalyze a problem, chances of hitting on the correct solution are greatly diminished. Ambassador White is correct in his assessment. The Reagan administration is misanalyzing the situation. The administration talks about a domino theory in Central America. They have discussed the fall of El Salvador as if it is the linchpin for American stability. It is not. El Salvador is more of an example of a people coming to grips with an exploding population, diminished natural resources, a failed economy, and a history of political repression.

El Salvador is the worst example of the sickness that prevails in Central America, but it is not the only example. Guatemala will be the next country to explode into uncontrolled civil violence. Honduras is also weak, and despite the recent elections held in that country, its future remains blighted. Costa Rica is also struggling; Belize fears Guatemala; Panama is still trying to find its way after the death of Omar Torrijos; and Nicaragua is also struggling with its future. The United States has every right to be concerned about the future of El Salvador and Central America, but that concern must be based on a realistic assessment of the problem.

Because the administration is unwilling to make a realistic assessment, the consequences for El Salvador and for this country could be severe. The military buildup will continue, any elections held will have little meaning, and the United States may become more involved in the Salvadoran conflict. If we change our course of action, this need not occur.●

TRUTHS ABOUT NUCLEAR POWER

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, when the news of the radiation leak at the Ginna plant in New York first hit the wires, the immediate reaction was "oh, no, another Three Mile Island." It was not, of course, but the reaction underscores some of the problems nuclear power has been having since that earlier incident. Lost in the shuffle has been the irrefutable fact that no one died at Three Mile Island, and that the worst harm done, according to scientists who have given the incident careful study, was done by those who cried wolf, thus causing tremendous psychological trauma to the residents of the area.

The Washington Post recently carried another insight into nuclear power. In its editorial on the subject, the Post reminds us that 31 coal miners have died in just the previous 6 weeks, and that in an average year, one coal miner dies every other day. Yet no one calls for a shutdown of the Nation's coal industry.

Nuclear power is not risk free, any more than coal is, but there is persuasive evidence that it is considerably less risky than many alternatives. Cool heads are needed, as well as cool reactors, if the Nation is to meet its energy needs.

Mr. Speaker, I insert the Post editorial referred to, in the RECORD at this point.

The editorial follows:

TRUTHS ABOUT NUCLEAR POWER

The Washington Public Power Supply System—whose acronym is appropriately pronounced "whoops"—finally canceled two of the five nuclear power plants it has been building. The cancellation of the two plants—further along than any previously canceled nuclear plants—triggered a wave of reaction on Wall Street, including the downgrading of bonds held by many of WPPSS's members.

A WPPSS director warned other utilities considering nuclear construction to "take a look at what happened here first." Similar sentiments warning of nuclear power's imminent demise because of economic and safety problems were echoed across the country. On top of this came Monday's "emergency" at an upstate New York plant where a burst pipe caused emissions of radioactive steam into the atmosphere. The story made front-page news.

Both events say a lot less about the health of the nuclear power industry than they seem to. WPPSS's problems derived largely from a combination of peculiar circumstances. The consortium, with no prior experience in nuclear construction, decided to build five plants at once, wildly over reaching itself. This initial mistake—if that is not too weak a word—was compounded by a seldom-matched talent for mismanagement. The group did not have to worry too much about cost overruns on the first three plants since these were being paid for by the federal government through the Bonneville Power Administration.

The accident at the Ginna plant also merits less attention than it has received. Radiation was released—but in negligible amounts. The plant's neighbors may have received a dose of about 3 millirems. That is about equal to nine days' exposure to the naturally occurring background radiation that bombards each of us every day of our lives.

There are serious problems with nuclear power—problems that the industry has been far too slow in correcting—but there is also a growing tendency to exaggerate them. Many of the industry's financial problems are the result of excess electrical capacity and high interest rates and are as typical of coal-fueled utilities as of nuclear ones.

Without minimizing nuclear power's safety defects, it needs to be pointed out that in the last six weeks 31 coal miners have died. In an average year 150 die and 15,000 suffer disabling injury. The risks of coal mining are so high they have become commonplace—but the deaths and incapacitation from accidents and black lung are nonetheless tragic. The air pollution risks from coal combustion are more uncertain, but may turn out to be even greater. They include respiratory illness, cancer, acid rain and global warming from carbon dioxide accumulation. Some, or all of these may one day require far tighter pollution regulations than today's, or even global limits on the amount of fossil fuels that can be burned.

In short, death knells for nuclear power are unwarranted. The industry is an important component of the country's electrical generating capacity, and it could one day prove to be a vital one. The industry spends far too much of its time and energy chasing a silly obsession with the breeder reactor that might be useful late in the next century, instead of focusing on long overdue solutions to its safety and waste disposal problems. But the realities are important too: one American coal miner dies every other working day.●

POLISH REFUGEE ASSISTANCE ACT

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, on January 28, I introduced H.R. 5384, the Polish Refugee Assistance Act, which will lift the current numerical limitation—now set at 5,000 for 1982—on refugee admissions to the United States from Poland. An identical bill was introduced in the Senate by Senator MOYNIHAN.

My bill has been introduced in response to the Polish Government's imposition of martial law. In the 6 weeks since the Polish Government took its drastic actions, more than 1,000 Poles have applied for refugee status. On an annualized basis, this could mean that between 6,000 and 8,500 Polish citizens will apply directly for refugee status—well above the 5,000 limitation.

Furthermore, General Jaruzelski has announced plans to go forward with new reforms including a relaxation of Poland's passport laws. Therefore, it is reasonable to anticipate a new exodus of people from Poland, some of whom will want to come to the United States. Currently, there are an estimated 50,000 to 100,000 Polish refugees in Western European countries, such as Austria and Germany, who may want to settle in America. As champions of freedom in America, we cannot deny access to any person fleeing the kind of tyranny which has been imposed by the current government. The Polish Refugee Assistance Act is also consistent with past U.S. efforts to aid refugees fleeing oppression. Our efforts with Poland must be as strong especially because of the countless contributions which the Polish-American community has made to our Nation.

The brutal crackdown by the puppet Polish Government has shocked the world. I hope that the legitimate aspirations for reform in Poland, as typified by the activities of the Solidarity Trade Union, may some day be achieved. Yet, while martial law is the order of the day, the United States must show its solidarity with those Polish citizens who are leaving their nation for a better life.

My legislation is in response to the crisis situation in Poland and will be effective for 1982 only. The bill is not intended to permanently lift immigration and refugee quotas for Polish citizens. Again, it is my fervant hope that the Polish Government lifts martial law and that the situation improves. However, until that time, I believe that the U.S. doors should be open to those individuals seeking a life free from tyranny and political persecution.

It is my belief that this legislation will help to dispel any confusion about our current policy with respect to Polish refugees. I contend that the State Department, while exhibiting some flexibility, most notably by stating that additional Polish refugees above the 5,000 limit could be accommodated within the 9,000 quota for all of Eastern Europe, needs to do more. My bill would take the important step of removing barriers which were instituted without full appreciation for the severity of the current Polish crisis. Its passage will send a more appropriate signal to the world that we denounce, and will never recognize a government in Poland which imposes martial law; and that we will support the efforts of those citizens who are fleeing tyranny and oppression. When it comes to defending the rights of people to be free, the United States can be second to none.

Even in the short time since I first introduced this legislation, the situation in Poland has taken a turn for the worse. Major civil unrest in Gdansk caused by increases of between 200 and 400 percent in the price of basic foods and commodities has been reported. This type of drastic change may also force a new exodus of Polish citizens.

I am pleased to note that 14 of my colleagues have already joined as cosponsors of the Polish Refugee Assistance Act. I invite additional support from my colleagues. At this point in the RECORD, I wish to insert two articles from the New York Times which discuss some of the current issues related to Polish refugees:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 10, 1982]

AUSTRIA FINDS POLISH INFLOW A BURDEN

VIENNA, January 9.—Austria, a country of 7 million people, prides itself as a haven for East Europeans fleeing Communist rule.

In 1981, 34,457 East Europeans—29,059 of them Poles—applied for political asylum in Austria. That was three and a half times the number of refugees who came here in 1980.

In addition, Gabrielle Neugebauer, the press representative of the Interior Ministry said, there are as many as 30,000 Poles in Austria on tourist visas.

Refugees cost the Government $53 million in 1981, $33 million more than expected. The money provided food and housing for refugees who crowd Austria's five transit camps.

UNITED STATES IS URGED TO TAKE REFUGEES

But the biggest problem for Austrian officials appears to be the fear that refugees will stay here permanently because they cannot get permission to emigrate to Australia, the United States or Canada. This attitude was reflected in Chancellor Bruno Kreisky's criticism of President Reagan's pre-Christmas offer of food for Polish refugees in Austria.

"We have enough flour, sugar and rice," Mr. Kreisky said. "The Americans should take more refugees instead."

Austria has asked other countries to increase immigration quotas. Last year Canada raised its quota for East Europeans from 1,100 to 2,100. The United States doubled its quotas for the current fiscal year to 9,000.

Australia was considering increasing its total quota by 1,000 to accommodate more Poles, Austrian officials say. But Austrians say those efforts are not enough.

CONTRAST IN WAYS OF LIFE

Before martial law was declared in Poland on Dec. 13 and the borders were sealed, as many as 150 new refugees arrived in Austria every day. Austrian authorities had to rent rooms in more than 600 inns and guesthouses to accommodate the Poles.

Innkeepers receive $11 a day per refugee for food. The Poles themselves get $8 spending money every two weeks.

But animosity toward the Poles detracts from Austria's carefully cultivated image as a neutral haven presented in Government brochures.

According to Karl Radek, the director of the main transit center at Traiskirchen, outside Vienna, the problems that have arisen stem from the difference between the refugees' old life in the East and their new life in the West.

"They must get used to the rules of the game in democracy," he said, adding that neither jobs nor housing are guaranteed in the West.

"Bear in mind," he went on, "that they lived 20 or 30 years in an authoritarian system. They come somewhere where it is free, and they must get used to it."

Describing how a refugee's mood tends to change after arrival, Mr. Radek said: "After an initial euphoria, there is a phase of reflection. He then realizes he has left his life behind, that his life is interrupted."

Mr. Radek said young people tended to find it relatively simple to adjust. But for divided families, he said, it is not.

Men who seemingly have no future may turn to drink, Mr. Radek said. But when the refugee hears that he can leave, the camp director added, "then he sees a future and all the problems get smaller."

[From the New York Times, Jan. 24, 1982]

U.S. COOL TO GIVING MORE POLES VISAS—IT FEARS OPENING DOORS WIDE TO REFUGEES MAY PROLONG MARTIAL LAW REGIME

(By David Shribman)

WASHINGTON, January 23.—The Reagan Administration has chosen not to encourage the 50,000 Poles who have flooded Austrian refugee centers to come to the United States, according to a high American official.

The policy adopted toward the Poles in Austria has angered Polish-American groups and has troubled the Austrian Government, but, the Administration official said, it is part of a quiet effort to obtain a loosening of the martial law that was imposed in Poland on Dec. 13.

"We don't want to create the impression that the situation in Poland is irretrievable," said the official, who spoke on condition that he not be identified. "It is not necessary yet. There is no point in contributing one way or another to the impression that the situation has moved to a point where it is locked in ice."

The exodus of Poles to Vienna ended with the military crackdown, but it left Austria with a refugee problem that cost $80 million last year and shows few signs of ameliorating.

POLES HOUSED IN MOTELS AND INNS

The Poles have come in such large numbers that many are being housed in Austrian Army barracks, in hotels, motels and inns.

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has made a $2 million grant to Austria, but Gary Perkins, American director of the refugee office, said, "This does not even begin to cover the costs."

Austria is less concerned about the cost of the refugees than about their final destination.

"We are happy for every dollar we get," said an Austrian Embassy official, "but our concern is that these people move on to the final country of settlement."

According to the Austrian Government, 29,000 Poles applied for political asylum in Austria last year. An additional 20,000 came to Austria but have not applied for asylum.

"We would like to see those who wish to go on to third countries do so as soon as possible," the embassy official said. "But the question is: Which countries are willing to take them, and how many?"

U.N. APPROACHED 24 COUNTRIES

The United Nations refugee office approached 24 countries on Dec. 30 to appeal for help in settling the Poles. The response has been modest but, according to Mr. Perkins, "It is generally like this when you start to resettle people."

"You can never say even a month after you have started that you have enough offers," he added. "You simply have to keep appealing and keep working on the situation. We are certainly hopeful."

In response to the Polish crisis, the United States has placed a ceiling of 9,000 on refugees from all of Eastern Europe this year, twice as many as for 1981.

"That definitely is a very significant step," said the Austrian official, "but, given the number of Poles in Austria, we would be happy if their number were further increased."

American officials say the allotment can be increased if necessary, but the United States is not actively seeking refugees.

"We are not recruiting," said the Administration official.

U.S. POLICY IS TERMED "CONFUSED"

Representative Toby Moffett, Democrat of Connecticut, who visited Austria this month, said American immigration policy was "in a state of uncertainty and confusion" and the United States has "virtually no presence" in the two Polish refugee camps.

"In Austria," he said, "we found that the long-held view of the United States as a country that opens its arms to others has virtually disappeared."

Administration officials contend that the American effort and allotment are sufficient.

"Nobody is beating down our door," said Richard D. Vine, director of the State Department's Bureau of Refugee Programs.

Jerome Hoganson, office director of the program, said 90 percent of the Poles who applied were being granted refugee status. At times in 1981, he said, the rate was only 50 percent.

But Polish-American leaders have said that the United States, which opened its doors to refugees from Southeast Asia and from Cuba, has been slow to welcome Poles.

POLES CALLED "MORE CONTAINABLE"

"Poles happen to be 'more containable,'" said Leonard F. Walentynowicz, a former State Department official and a director of the Polish-American Congress. "They are not jumping on boats and going into the ocean and risking their lives like the Vietnamese. The United States can be more hospitable than it has been so far."

American officials say that such a policy would jeopardize hopes of a return to the situation before the military crackdown or, at the very least, a swift loosening of martial law. According to this line of thinking, any effort to encourage large numbers of Poles to seek asylum in the United States might well encourage the Polish leaders or their Soviet allies to tighten martial law.

With many Poles as yet undecided whether they wish to seek asylum, the Administration does not want to push them into acting in a hasty manner.

"We don't want to force any Pole in Austria or elsewhere to make a judgment prematurely," said the Administration official. "There is no point in forcing him and saying he has to become a refugee today. This notion of giving up your native land is not easy."●

RECENT ANTI-SEMITISM IN POLAND

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, one result of the current political and economic crisis in Poland is a disturbing revival of anti-Semitic demagogy. The recent anti-Semitic campaign being carried out through the news media charges the tiny minority of Jews in Poland with causing many of that country's problems.

On December 15, just days after the imposition of martial law, Professor Kosseck, a Polish political scientist, viciously denounced Poland's Jews during a television and radio interview in Warsaw. Since then, the Jews in Poland have been subject to a wide array of anti-Semitic propaganda aimed at diverting attention from that nation's struggle for democracy.

In an effort to discredit the Solidarity movement, a Communist newspaper, the Voice of Szczecin, published a statement in its Christmas issue accusing Jews of causing problems in Poland since 1947, and claiming that their objective now is to destabilize the nation in order to seize power. In addition, leaflets distributed throughout the country charged that Jews are not forced to wait in the daily food ration lines, and are hoarding food to sell on the black market. In fact, Jews are the first to be turned away from these seemingly endless lines. Other anti-Semitic propaganda wrongly asserts that the Jews control 80 percent of the nation's industry and that they are merely manipulating the progress of the Solidarity movement.

There is evidence that the dissemination of anti-Semitic propagada is not only sanctioned but encouraged by the Government. Although Polish leader General Jarulzelski asserts that the Government would never tolerate a deliberate abuse of anti-Semitic tradition, his claim is inconsistent with the Government's lack of restriction on the content and widespread circulation of anti-Semitic literature. Grunwald, an anti-Semitic organization which came into existence last year as an ultranationalist response to Solidarity, is largely responsible for the distribution of the denunciatory leaflets. Since martial law went into effect on December 13, the Grunwald pamphlets have been published under strict Government censorship, indicating the Government's complicity in their dispersion.

Despite accusations and attempts to saddle the Jewish population with responsibility for Poland's problems, the perpetrators have received little support for their campaign among the Poles themselves. The anti-Semitic leaflets are torn down almost immediately after they are posted. In addition, reporters who have recently returned from Poland affirm that the Polish people are not fooled by the allegations that the Solidarity movement is controlled by manipulative Jews.

The contention that the Jews are undermining the Nation and plotting a seizure of power is ludicrous. The Jewish population has been severely decimated. Prior to World War II there were some 3 million Polish Jews. All but about 30,000 were liquidated during the Holocaust, and in the 1968 purges large numbers of Jews were forced to emigrate reducing their numbers to an estimated 5,000 to 6,000. Since most of the remaining Jews are either old or infirm it is highly unlikely that they would have the ability to seize power in Poland even if this were their intention.

In a country where Jews have traditionally suffered harsh persecution, it is appalling to find that they are once again being used as scapegoats. Jewish groups in the United States have called on the Polish Government to issue an unequivocal statement decrying the propagandistic use of anti-Semitism, a measure that was previously taken by Solidarity leader Lech Walesa in early December. It is evident to the Poles, as well as to the international community, that the Jews are not responsible for the Polish crisis. Clearly the Polish Government cannot hope to divert the massive discontent and the democratic struggle among the Polish people through this abhorrent tactic.●

REFLECTIONS ON THE BOMB

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 4, 1982

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, of the host of problems our world faces, none is more serious than the threat of nuclear war. Today, the United States, U.S.S.R., and the other nuclear weapons states possess 50,000 nuclear warheads equal to the force of more than 1 million Hiroshima-sized bombs. While the superpowers continue to amass huge stockpiles, countries such as Iraq, Pakistan, and South Africa quietly proceed with bomb fabrication projects. To date, at least 30 countries have the technical capability to build nuclear weapons if they wish.

An article by Jonathan Schell, titled "Reflections: The Fate of the Earth," in the February 1, 1982, issue of the New Yorker magazine shares my sense of urgency that we must now come to grips with the fact that we are coming ever so closer to the brink of nuclear annihilation. Mr. Schell writes:

We have thus far failed to fashion, or to discover within ourselves, an emotional or intellectual response to (nuclear arms). This peculiar failure of response, in which hundreds of millions of people acknowledge the presence of an immediate, unremitting threat to their existence and to the existence of the world they live in but do nothing about it—a failure in which both self-interest and fellow-feeling seem to have died—has itself been such a striking phenomenon that it has to be regarded as an extremely important part of the nuclear predicament as this has existed so far.

In other words, we have learned to live with the bomb but not with the fact that the day may be fast approaching that the bomb will explode.

The following is an excerpt from the beginning of Mr. Schell's thoughtful piece:

[From the New Yorker, Feb. 1, 1982]

REFLECTIONS: THE FATE OF THE EARTH

(By Jonathan Schell)

Since July 16, 1945, when the first atomic bomb was detonated, at the Trinity test site, near Alamogordo, New Mexico, mankind has lived with nuclear weapons in its midst. Each year, the number of bombs has grown, until now there are some fifty thousand warheads in the world, possessing the explosive yield of roughly twenty billion tons of TNT, or one million six hundred thousand times the yield of the bomb that was dropped by the United States on the city of Hiroshima, in Japan, less than a month after the Trinity explosion. These bombs were built as "weapons" for "war," but their significance greatly transcends war and all its causes and outcomes. They grew out of history, yet they threaten to end history. They were made by men, yet they threaten to annihilate man. They are a pit into which the whole world can fall—a nemesis of all human intentions, actions, and hopes. Only life itself, which they threaten to swallow up, can give the measure of their significance. Yet in spite of the immeasurable importance of nuclear weapons, the world has declined, on the whole, to think about them very much. We have thus far failed to fashion, or to discover within ourselves, an emotional or intellectual or political response to them. This peculiar failure of response, in which hundreds of millions of people acknowledge the presence of an immediate, unremitting threat to their existence and to the existence of the world they live in but do nothing about it—a failure in which both self-interest and fellow-feeling seem to have died—has itself been such a striking phenomenon that it has to be regarded as an extremely important part of the nuclear predicament as this has existed so far. Only very recently have there been signs, in Europe and in the United States, that public opinion has been stirring awake, and that ordinary people may be beginning to ask themselves how they should respond to the nuclear peril.

In what follows, I shall offer some thoughts on the origin and the significance of this predicament, on why we have so long resisted attempts to think about it (we even call a nuclear holocaust "unthinkable") or deal with it, and on the shape and magnitude of the choice that it forces upon us. But first I wish to describe the consequences for the world, insofar as these can be known, of a full-scale nuclear holocaust at the current level of global armament. We have lived in the shadow of nuclear arms for more than thirty-six years, so it does not seem too soon for us to familiarize ourselves with them to acquaint ourselves with such matters as the "thermal pulse," the "blast wave," and the "three stages of radiation sickness." A description of a full-scale holocaust seems to be made necessary by the simple but basic rule that in order to discuss something one should first know what it is. A considerable number of excellent studies concentrating on various aspects of the damage that can be done by nuclear arms do exist, many of them written only in the last few years. These include a report entitled "The Effects of Nuclear War," which was published in 1979 by the Congressional Office of Technology Assessment, and which deals chiefly with the consequences of a holocaust for the societies of the United States and the Soviet Union; the latest (1977) edition of the indispensable, classic textbook "The Effects of Nuclear Weapons," which is edited by Samuel Glasstone and Philip J. Dolan (hereafter I shall refer to it as "Glasstone") and was published jointly by the Department of Defense and the Energy Research and Development Administration, and which makes use of the government's findings from the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki and from the American nuclear-test program to describe the characteristics and the destructive effects of nuclear explosions of all kinds; "Hiroshima and Nagasaki," a comprehensive study, carried out by a group of distinguished Japanese scientists and published here in 1981, of the consequences of the bombing of those two cities; "Long-Term Worldwide Effects of Multiple Nuclear-Weapons Detonations," a report of the global ecological consequences of a nuclear holocaust which was published in 1975 by the National Academy of Sciences (hereafter referred to as the N.A.S. report); a report of research conducted in 1974 and 1975 for the Department of Transportation's Climatic Impact Assessment Program on the consequences of manmade perturbances—including the explosion of nuclear weapons—of the earth's atmosphere; and "Survival of Food Crops and Livestock in the Event of Nuclear War," proceedings of a 1970 symposium held at Brookhaven National Laboratory, on Long Island, and sponsored by the Office of Civil Defense, the Atomic Energy Commission, and the Department of Agriculture, at which the effects of radiation from fallout on both domesticated and natural ecosystems were discussed. Drawing on these and other printed sources, and also on interviews that I conducted recently with a number of scientists, I have attempted to piece together an account of the principal consequences of a full-scale holocaust. Such an account, which in its nature must be both technical and gruesome, cannot be other than hateful to dwell on, yet it may be only by descending into this hell in imagination now that we can hope to escape descending into it in reality at some later time. The knowledge we thus gain cannot in itself protect us from nuclear annihilation, but without it we cannot begin to take the measure that can actually protect us—or, for that matter, even begin to think in an appropriate way about our plight.

The widespread belief that a nuclear holocaust would in some sense bring about the end of the world has been reflected in the pronouncements of both American and Soviet leaders in the years since the invention of nuclear weapons. For example, President Dwight Eisenhower wrote in a letter in 1956 that one day both sides would have to "meet at the conference table with the understanding that the era of armaments has ended, and the human race must conform its actions to this truth or die." More recently—at a press conference in 1974—Secretary of State Henry Kissinger said that "the accumulation of nuclear arms has to be constrained if mankind is not to destroy itself." And President Jimmy Carter said in his farewell address a year ago that after a nuclear holocaust "the survivors, if any, would live in despair amid the poisoned ruins of a civilization that had committed suicide." Soviet leaders have been no less categorical in their remarks. In late 1981, for example, the Soviet government printed a booklet in which it stated, "The Soviet Union holds that nuclear war would be a universal disaster, and that it would most probably mean the end of civilization. It may lead to the destruction of all mankind." In these and other statements, examples of which could be multiplied indefinitely, Soviet and American leaders have acknowledged the supreme importance of the nuclear peril. However, they have not been precise about what level of catastrophe they were speaking of, and a variety of different outcomes, including the annihilation of the belligerent nations, the destruction of "human civilization," the extinction of mankind, and the extinction of life on earth, have been mentioned, in loose rhetorical fashion, more or less interchangeably. No doubt, the leaders have been vague in part because of the difficulty of making reliable predictions about an event that has no precedent. Yet it seems important to arrive, on the basis of available information, at some judgment concerning the likelihood of these outcomes, for they are not the same. Nor, presumably, would the appropriate political response to all of them be the same. The annihilation of the belligerent nations would be a catastrophe beyond anything in history, but it would not be the end of the world. The destruction of human civilization, even without the biological destruction of the human species, may perhaps rightly be called the end of the world, since it would be the end of that sum of cultural achievements and human relationships which constitutes what many people mean when they speak of "the world." The biological destruction of mankind would, of course, be the end of the world in a stricter sense. As for the destruction of all life on the planet, it would be not merely a human but a planetary end—the death of the earth. And although the annihilation of other forms of life could hardly be of concern to human beings once they themselves had been annihilated, this more comprehensive, planetary termination is nevertheless full of sorrowful meaning for us as we reflect on the possibility now, while we still exist. We not only live on the earth but also are of the earth, and the thought of its death, or even of its mutilation, touches a deep chord in our nature. Finally, it must be noted that a number of observers have, especially in recent years, denied that a holocaust would obliterate even the societies directly attacked. If this were so, then nuclear weapons, while remaining fearsome, would be qualitatively no different from other weapons of war, and the greater part of the nuclear predicament would melt away. (In the discussions of some analysts, nuclear attacks are made to sound almost beneficial. For example, one official of the Office of Civil Defense wrote a few years back that although it might be "verging on the macabre" to say so, "a nuclear war could alleviate some of the factors leading to today's ecological disturbances that are due to current high-population concentrations and heavy industrial production." According to a different, less sanguine view of things, this observation and other cheerful asides of the kind which crop up from time to time in the literature go well over the verge of the macabre.)

Anyone who inquires into the effects of a nuclear holocaust is bound to be assailed by powerful and conflicting emotions. Preeminent among these, almost certainly, will be an overwhelming revulsion at the tremendous scene of devastation, suffering, and death which is opened to view. And accompanying the revulsion there may be a sense of helplessness and defeat, brought about by an awareness of the incapacity of the human soul to take in so much horror. A nuclear holocaust, widely regarded as "unthinkable" but never as undoable, appears to confront us with an action that we can perform but cannot quite conceive. Following upon these first responses, there may come a recoil, and a decision, whether conscious or unconscious, not to think any longer about the possibility of a nuclear holocaust. (Since a holocaust is a wholly prospective rather than a present calamity, the act of thinking about it is voluntary, and the choice of not thinking about it is always available.) When one tries to face the nuclear predicament, one feels sick, whereas when one pushes it out of mind, as apparently one must do most of the time in order to carry on with life, one feels well again. But this feeling of well-being is based on a denial of the most important reality of our time, and therefore is itself a kind of sickness. A society that systematically shuts its eyes to an urgent peril to its physical survival and fails to take any steps to save itself cannot be called psychologically well. In effect, whether we think about nuclear weapons or avoid thinking about them, their presence among us makes us sick, and there seems to be little of a purely mental or emotional nature that we can do about it.

A part of our quandary may lie in the fact that even a denial of the reality stems from what is, in a sense, a refusal to accept nuclear annihilation; that is, a refusal to accept even in imagination what Dr. Robert Jay Lifton, the author of pioneering studies of the psychology of the nuclear predicament, has appropriately called an "immersion in death." As such, the denial may have intermixed in it something that is valuable and worthy of respect. Like active revulsion and protest against nuclear weapons, a denial of their reality may spring—in part, at least—from a love of life, and since a love of life may ultimately be all that we have to pit against our doom, we cannot afford thoughtlessly to tear aside any of its manifestations. Because denial is a form of self-protection, if only against anguishing thoughts and feelings, and because it contains something useful, and perhaps even, in its way, necessary to life, anyone who invites people to draw aside the veil and look at the peril face to face is at risk of trespassing on inhibitions that are a part of our humanity. I hope in this article to proceed with the utmost possible respect for all forms of refusal to accept the unnatural and horrifying prospect of a nuclear holocaust.●

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, February 8, 1982

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WRIGHT).

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
February 8, 1982.

I hereby designate the Honorable JIM WRIGHT to act as Speaker pro tempore on this day.

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, as in days past You raised up prophets to lead Your people in the way of righteousness, so enable leaders in our time to speak Your truth to our generation. As Your spokesmen warned against the sham and pretense and evil of another time, may we heed the calls for justice directed to us and act with compassion, reaching out to those least among us. Raise up leaders willing to speak for a better society even as we try do our part toward influencing our world with Your love, without which our lives cannot find satisfaction and the world can know no peace. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

RELIEF FOR COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION

(Mr. PEYSER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we are going to be taking up a bill that will give the Commodity Credit Corporation $5 billion to cover their losses in the last 2 years. Included in the losses is $1½ billion of uncollected interest in 1981 on loans made by the Corporation and $1.1 billion of uncollected interest on loans in 1980.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is interesting to note that these two amounts of uncollected interest losses more than double the total losses since 1966 on the guaranteed student loan program which we seem so busy trying to destroy. It is hard to understand how we can simply say that the agriculture community, when they make a loan, does not even have to pay the interest, much less the principal, and yet students will not be given their loans unless the whole program is changed drastically to eliminate many students from it immediately.

TOTALITARIAN MAJORITY IN THE UNITED NATIONS

(Mr. LANTOS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, an array of dictatorships—from Libya to the Soviet Union; from Syria to Cuba; from Poland to Afghanistan—have joined in an arrogant attempt to suspend or to remove from the United Nations one of its few free and democratic members. Since the U.N. has already become—to an appalling extent—an unholy alliance between Soviet imperialists, Arab radicals and Third World opportunists, the time is long overdue to send a clear and unambiguous message to the inhabitants of the glass edifice on the East River: The American people will no longer be willing to underwrite, to the tune of over a billion dollars annually, the irresponsible antics of a spectrum of dictatorships from Yemen to Uganda.

Today, with the support of the U.S. Department of State, I am introducing a joint resolution which is aimed at stopping the flow of U.S. taxpayer funds to the U.N. in the event the totalitarian majority of that body succeeds in curtailing full participation in all its activities by any one of its free and democratic members. The Congress of the United States and the American people are sick and tired of financing the antics of the Libyas and Cubas of this planet.

VIRGINIA JOHNSON RETIRES FROM ARMY CONGRESSIONAL LIAISON

(Mr. PRICE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Mrs. Virginia Johnson who will next week retire from Federal service after more than 31 years with Army Congressional Liaison. By her knowledge, enthusiasm, and quiet inspiration she has set the example for others to emulate. Her influence has permeated the Armed Forces Liaison Office. Her empathy and sincere concerns solved many personnel problems quietly and effectively. She has made a major contribution to the maintenance of outstanding liaison between the Army and the Congress.

Mrs. Johnson established and maintained an excellent rapport between herself and all congressional offices, thus permitting her to determine what the problems were and what information was desired. She consistently used her initiative and basic knowledge of pertinent material and familiarity with Army policies to give immediate assistance to the high volume of inquiries and requests received by the Army. In this sensitive and important position, Mrs. Johnson always portrayed the image of the Army in an outstanding manner.

When requests required immediate and extensive research, she left no stone unturned to be responsive to the problems at hand. She brought the full scope of her ability and resourcefulness to bear upon each detail, thus permitting her to give prompt and accurate replies to the myriad of inquiries received from the Congress. Her personal contacts within the Department of the Army and other agencies of the Government were of invaluable assistance to the Army in effecting the necessary coordination and quick action on complicated matters.

Mrs. Johnson has always been conscious of the responsibility inherent in obtaining factual and timely replies to Members of Congress. She displayed the ability to deal with and discuss the intricacies of cases with all ranks of military and congressional staff members, as well as constituents. She was ever alert to the categories of information that required coordination with Government agencies to preclude later embarrassment. She consistently demonstrated discretion and sound judgment in these very sensitive areas. Her effectiveness has earned her the respect of all agencies with whom she dealt.

Her contribution to the Army and service to the Nation has set a standard of excellence, loyalty, and dedication to all men and women who will follow in her profession.

I congratulate Mrs. Johnson for the many contributions she has made to the Congress and I wish her all the best in the years ahead.

TAX EXEMPTIONS FOR JIM CROW SCHOOLS

(Mr. JACOBS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, now that the Ways and Means Committee has examined the administration's creative legal research supporting tax exemptions for Jim Crow schools and found that research to be fictitious, the time has come for the administration to accept the graceful manner of correcting its faux pas and allow the Supreme Court to proceed with the Bob Jones case.

Tobacco subsidies are one thing. But tax exemptions for un-American activities are going too far. With this administration, blunders never cease.

EDWARD J. DeBARTOLO JR., DAY

(Mr. JOHN L. BURTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, this Friday, February 12, the city of Youngstown, Ohio, will proclaim "Edward J. DeBartolo, Jr., Day" in tribute to the owner and chief executive officer of the world champion San Francisco 49'ers.

I am pleased to join with my colleague, LYLE WILLIAMS of Youngstown, Ohio, in offering this tribute to our good friend, Eddie.

The 49'ers became the Superbowl champions by defeating the Cincinnati Bengals 26 to 21 in Superbowl XVI. Under Coach Bill Walsh, they were the most winning team in the NFL for the 1981 season with 13 victories. It was the first 49'er team ever to win the NFC title. Their quarterback, Joe Montana, was MVP of the Superbowl, and Coach Bill Walsh was voted coach of the year by everyone, including the Washinton Touchdown Club. Fred Dean was named UPI's NFC defense player of the year.

In honor of Edward J. DeBartolo, Jr., Day and in tribute to our friend, Eddie, we would like to resubmit our tribute of November 22, 1981, to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The January 24 Superbowl XVI victory only serves to underscore how prophetic our earlier words were.

The tribute to Edward J. DeBartolo, Jr, follows:

Mr. Speaker, as one of San Francisco's Members of the House of Representatives, I am pleased to join with my colleague, LYLE WILLIAMS of Youngstown, Ohio, in offering this tribute to our friend, Edward DeBartolo, Jr., who among other things is owner and chief executive officer of the San Francisco 49'ers.

At the invitation of my old buddy, Ken Flower, I was going to spend the evening with a person described by the San Francisco media as "a rich young kid from Youngstown, Ohio." I was stunned to find instead of the rich out-of-towner with a silver spoon, a warm outgoing person who could have hung out with me, George Moscone and the rest of the gang at Polk Gulch and North Beach.

When I met Eddie he was in town for the 49'ers-Redskin game with his close friend, Carmen Policy. They were watching "Boom Boom" Mancini fight Alex Arguello on television. Afterward we talked and I was amazed that he could keep up with the chatter of an old North Beach "Lean and Tender"—bartender—with the same ease that allows him to deal in the world of corporate board rooms.

I knew we were kindred souls when Eddie's only criteria for a restaurant was that they serve good baccala and require no neckties. By the end of the evening I felt as if I had known him all my life.

When Eddie first took over the 49'ers he was the victim of bum raps in the media, "a rich kid with a new toy," "he ain't even from the Bay Area," and "an outsider."

Although his family home is in Youngstown, Ohio, I know Eddie DeBartolo loves our city and the people.

When he became owner of the 49'ers, he made only one promise that within 5 years they would be competitive in the league. This promise has been more than kept and, along with coach Bill Walsh, he has given us exciting, gutsy team play every week.

He has provided 49'ers fans with the finest team in the history of the franchise.

To see Eddie in the locker room hugging, slapping hands, joking with the players, stopping to say a kind word to each team member shows he recognizes his players as people rather than beef on the hoof. To have seen the tears of joy after the Pittsburgh game as he hugged his dad and family then thanked each player was proof of his emotional and personal feelings about our 49'ers. The team is not a toy but part of his very being; far from being a spoiled kid with a new toy, Eddie DeBartolo is a beautiful human being who possess the unique combination of his father's business acumen and innerstrength, the emotional warmth and commonsense of his mother. Marie, as well as the street smarts of the common person. These traits are what makes Edward DeBartolo, Jr., a cut above most of his NFL peers.

Nineteen eighty-one marks a significant year, significant because this is Edward Jr.'s fifth season as the team's owner and chief executive officer. Five years have passed since the National Football League's San Francisco franchise became a vital acquisition of the nationwide DeBartolo Corp., and for the team's president, stability now has fully arrived on his football club. DeBartolo points with pride to the settling effect that has permeated the organization since 1979 when he hired Bill Walsh, a leading football tactician and a great human being with the ability to bring individuals together as a team on and off the field, as head coach and general manager.

The 49'ers were a team in transition during 1977 and 1978, but that transition began to diminish with the arrival of Walsh and his staff. DeBartolo says the turnaround came because "all of us have a singleness of purpose" where the 49'ers are concerned. He adds.

The people presently guiding the team under Bill's direction are the people who will be operating the team for a long time. I have pledged my total support to their efforts.

The 49'ers 35-year-old president serves the DeBartolo Corp. as president and chief administrative officer, a role that demands nearly all of his attention and time. The corporation's home offices are located in Youngstown, Ohio, the DeBartolo family hometown.

Founded in 1948 by Edward J. DeBartolo, who is the father of the 49'ers president, the DeBartolo Corp. has become one of America's great business success stories. It is the leading planner, builder, owner, and operator of enclosed regional shopping malls in the world, malls that total more than 74 million square feet of retail space.

In addition, the corporation owns thoroughbred racetracks, including luxurious Louisiana Downs, hotels, industrial and executive office parks, the Pittsburgh Penguins hockey franchise, the Pittsburgh Civic Arena, and holds many commercial bank interests, including its role as majority stockholder in three banks.

Ed Junior not only is one of America's fastest rising young executives for a major corporation, but he also is the youngest owner in the 28-team National Football League. His rise began upon graduation from Notre Dame in 1968 when he joined the company full time, moving from department to department learning the many facets of the company which, by then, had grown into a national corporation and had become recognized as the largest shopping center firm in the United States. In 1971 he was appointed a vice president.

Five years later he was named executive vice president while taking over the in-house DeBartolo staff of some 300 engineers, architects, designers, financiers, leasing agents, lawyers, management and operations teams, along with advertising, public relations, and marketing personnel. He was appointed president and chief administrative officer in July of 1979.

Working a demanding 7-day-a-week schedule that he has continued to today, Ed Junior found little time for those pursuits he still lists as hobbies—golf and football—or returning my phone calls. Football, the dominant interest in his life, would become more than just a hobby when he became the 49'ers president and general partner. In that capacity he controls 90 percent of the club, with limited partners Jane Morabito and Franklin Mieuli, who each own 5 percent.

Edward Junior gives generously of his time and influence when it comes to charitable endeavors. He is highly active in the St. Jude Children's Research Hospital, having directed the Youngstown effort for national chairman Danny Thomas, an effort that netted the greatest sum of any city its size in the Nation.

He also has for several years directed the Youngstown Cancer and Heart Fund Drives, served as director of a local youth center, and served as a member of the board of trustees at Youngstown State University.

His wife, Candy, was his childhood sweetheart, and they are the parents of three daughters, Lisa Marie 11, Tiffanie Lynn 10, and Nicole Ann 6.

CRISIS CONDITIONS OF OUR ECONOMY

(Mr. EDGAR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, President Reagan, in his fiscal year 1983 budget message, has chosen to ignore the crisis conditions our economy now faces, while attempting to distract the public with more empty rhetoric about federalism, voluntarism, and pie-in-the-sky recovery schemes. His fiscal 1982 budget was chiefly unfair to poor people and distressed regions of the country, the fiscal 1983 budget is simply irrelevant to the problems this Nation must quickly solve.

The current recession has not struck all the States with equal force. The Northeastern and Midwestern States, still battered by earlier economic slumps and the devastating slide of the Nation's manufacturing sectors, are suffering more terribly than even the national unemployment rates would indicate. In my own State of Pennsylvania 11.2 percent of our workers have no jobs. Michigan suffers over 13 percent unemployment; New Jersey over 9 percent; Ohio over 10 percent. These States cannot wait for the President's grand schemes of 1984 or 1987. The promises the President has made may satisfy our friends in Florida, Texas, and California. But, Mr. President, we in the Northeast and Midwest cannot hold on much longer.

Today, I am submitting for the RECORD an executive summary of the Northeast-Midwest Congressional Coalition's regional analysis of President Reagan's fiscal year 1983 budget. I believe this documents the inequity of the President's program. I challenge the President to justify his program on a regional basis and come up with solutions to the problems we face today. If the President is not up to the job, many of us in Congress are now willing to take on this task.

SELECTED BUDGET BRIEFS: A REGIONAL ANALYSIS OF PRESIDENT REAGAN'S FISCAL 1983 BUDGET—FEBRUARY 8, 1982

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

The Northeastern and Midwestern regions continue to experience the wrenching transformation from a heavy, basic manufacturing economy to an economic structure of greater diversity. While some parts of New England appear to be emerging from the long and painful transition, the Mid-Atlantic states are caught in the midst of the process, and the Middle-West is experiencing the full fury of its initial onset. The present recession is punishing the older Middle Western states with especially high rates of unemployment whereas, the last two major recessions effected the Mid-Atlantic more harshly than other parts of the nation.

Consistent with his pledge not to raise taxes, the president has requested $801.9 billion in new budget authority for fiscal 1983, projecting receipts of $666.1 billion and outlays of $757.6 billion with a deficit of $91.5 billion. This deficit figure assumes approval of $43 billion in new spending reductions and $13 billion in new revenue measures. CBO estimates in their five year forecast that without radical budget measures the budget deficit will climb to $250 billion, increasing to 5 percent of GNP as a result of lower levels of revenues due to the tax system restructuring accomplished by the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981. Under the president's proposed budget, federal spending would significantly increase only in the areas of defense, social security, and interest on the national debt. As a result, all other government programs, which constitute approximately 25 percent of government spending, will sustain dramatic funding cutbacks. (See Budget Overview for details.)

While the president's budget submission to Congress is a national document, its regional implications, especially when viewed against the back drop of long-term economic change, are critically important to policymakers.

The initial analysis of the president's proposals produced jointly by the staffs of the Northeast-Midwest Institute, the Northeast-Midwest Congressional Coalition, and the Northeast-Midwest Senate Coalition—with the added help of independent consultant Stan Collender, and of David Arnold and Bob James of the Coalition of Northeastern Governors—examines nineteen major areas of the budget considered by most of the region's public and private leaders to be of critical importance to the region's economic and social future. In this effort, there has been as much attention given to areas of federal domestic capital investment for critical "infrastructure" in such areas as energy, water, transportation, and community development as there has on defense and the "social safety net" areas.

Among the key findings discussed in far greater depth in the papers which constitute the rest of the study are these:

Defense. The Defense budget under the president's proposal is scheduled to increase by 14 percent this year, totalling $257 billion in budget authority.

In fiscal 1982, the Northeast and Midwest states received $381 per capita of all defense outlays, while the Southern and Western states received $826 per capita. (See Budget Brief Number One for details.)

New Federalism. While there is little question that the present system of intergovernmental fiscal relations is in need of "sorting out," the president's initial proposals raise a variety of troubling issues with respect to the older industrial states in the Northeast and Midwest including:

Disparities in the capacity of states to shoulder new financial burdens that would go along with some components of the "new federalism," (e.g. states in the Northeast and Midwest already have huge tax burdens and don't have "exportable" sources such as energy and tobacco production to fall back upon);

Estimates of program costs involved in the "swap" proposal which seem unrealistic; and Changes proposed for fiscal 1983 in the Medicaid program, (a key component of the proposed "swap"), which make it likely that new expenses for "optional services will have to be undertaken by states in the Northeast, Midwest and the West.

(See Budget Briefs Number Two, Four, and Five for details.)

Enterprise Zones. An innovative method of making federal tax and other policies work to the economic advantage of selected distressed communities, the Enterprise Zone proposal likely to be made shortly by the president is significantly improved compared to earlier versions considered in Congress, but concerns remain about such specific elements as the tax treatment of small firms, the capacity of the eligibile local areas most in need to produce competitive "matching" packages, and the zone's apparent focus on residential areas. (See Budget Brief Number Four for details.)

Medicaid. The administration's proposed changes in the Medicaid program include a massive cost shift to the states by imposing a 3 percent federal cut for optional services. Since 75 percent of the residents of the Northeast and Midwest live in states which provide optional services (as compared to 55 percent of the South and West's population), the cut would fall disproportionately on the already economically hard-pressed states in the Northeast-Midwest region. (See Budget Briefs Number Two and Four for details.)

Aid to Families with Dependent Children. A number of regionally important changes have been proposed in this vital "safety net" program. In perhaps the most dramatic suggestion, the administration has proposed counting low income energy assistance payments as income in calculating AFDC benefits. This would reduce AFDC benefits one dollar for each dollar of energy assistance, and it would have the effect of terminating the energy assistance program for welfare recipients. (See Budget Brief Number Five for details.)

Food Stamps. The administration's proposal to count low income energy assistance as income in calculating food stamp benefits would cost food stamp recipients up to $5.25 in benefits for each $10.00 of low income energy assistance. The administration also proposed to abolish the current 18 percent income disregard thereby eliminating the program's chief work incentive previously in effect.

Unemployment Compensation and Trade Adjustment Assistance. Despite post-war record levels of unemployment in some areas—many of them in the Northeast and Midwest—and increasing dislocations caused by imports, major cutbacks are proposed in the Employment Service, and the Trade Adjustment Assistance Program would be eliminated completely within two years, although a small amount of residual TAA funds would be shifted into a new training program for special target groups. (See Budget Brief Number Seven for details.)

Energy. As "old, cold," high energy cost areas, the Northeast and Midwest gain more from conservation and renewable alternative efforts than other areas. However, under the president's proposal the energy conservation budget would be reduced from $386 million in fiscal 1982 to $22 million in fiscal 1983—a reduction of 95 percent. All state and local government energy conservation programs would be eliminated. These program grants include weatherization, schools and hospitals and the energy extension service. Funding for the fossil, solar and renewable energy categories would be reduced by approximately 70 percent. Low income energy assistance would be reduced by 25 percent to $1.3 billion in fiscal 1983 and changes in the Food Stamp and AFDC programs.

However, production programs such as the Synfuels Corporation, which is not considering even a single project in the Northeast and Midwest have been well protected by the president's budget submission. (See budget Brief Number Eight for details.)

Water Supply and Quality. Traditional water supply programs administered by the Army Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation are left virtually intact, as they were last year by the president's proposal. (Bureau of Reclamation construction projects actually receive a substantial increase, while the Army Corps of Engineers' budget declines slightly.) In addition, the budget document states that the administration expects to submit a supplemental request for up to $48 million to pay for new construction starts.

While the federal government continues to maintain funding levels for Western water projects, these programs continue to ignore the water needs of Northeast and Midwestern states. The Bureau of Reclamation can only operate legally in certain states, while it controls one-third of the total federal water supply budget. Under the Corps of Engineers and Bureau of Reclamation construction programs, the Northeast-Midwest region averaged only $8 per capita, while the South and West averaged $26 per capita.

The repair and maintenance of urban water systems in one of the greatest water resource problems in this region, yet because the Corps refuses to get involved in "single-purpose" projects, no assistance is available for these water supply problems. The 1980 Urban Water Supply Task Force estimated that $50 to $80 billion is needed to repair and replace water distribution and treatment systems nationally.

Transportation. A 10 percent reduction (on top of a fiscal 82 reduction of 25 percent) is proposed by the president in Urban Mass Transit Administration (UMTA) financing—this change would work additional special hardships in the Northeast and Midwest which has 75 percent of the nation's mass transit ridership and has traditionally received higher than average UMTA allocations. Other changes in such areas as bridge maintenance will also be especially difficult for the region and will directly effect its long-run prospects for economic renewal. (See Budget Brief Number Ten for details.)

Community and Economic Development. The Reagan proposal calls for the elimination of the Economic Development Administration, a program which has provided grants, loans, and technical assistance to create new permanent employment in the private sector, with the Northeast and Midwest receiving a higher than average share of program allocations. EDA's fiscal 1980 investments generated or preserved more than 216,000 jobs and "leveraged" approximately $2.56 billion in private investment nationally.

The administration's fiscal 1983 budget, however, seeks no reduction in funding for the Community Development Block Grant (CDBG), Urban Development Action Grant (UDAG) and General Revenue Sharing (GRS) programs below fiscal 1982 levels, but inflation will reduce these programs' "buying power."

Proposed changes in the Industrial Development Bond system could also be particularly difficult for hard-pressed states and localities in the Northeast and Midwest. (See Budget Briefs Number Eleven, Twelve, and Seventeen for details.)

Employment and Training. The administration proposes to eliminate the CETA program and replace it with a new employment and training block grant to the states. It proposes an expanded special targeting training program and maintains the Job Corps program. The administration also proposes to fund these programs at $2.46 billion in budget authority for fiscal 1983. This is a substantial reduction from the current CETA funding level of $3.1 billion in budget authority.

The Northeast and Midwest have traditionally received above average allocations of these funds and, unless new, more tightly targeted allocation formulas are proposed by the administration in its block grant recommendations, the region stands to lose substantial amounts of employment and training funds in fiscal 1983. (See Budget Briefs Seven and Thirteen.)

Housing. The administration has proposed to fund public housing operating subsidies at 60 percent of full funding, or $1.08 billion. Since Northeastern and Midwestern states have a total of 55 percent of the nation's public housing, the impact of this reduction would be most acutely felt in our region.

Since the public housing authorities in the region allocate a greater percentage of expenditures for fuel, an expense that cannot be reduced or deferred, these deep cuts would impact most in Frostbelt areas, thus contributing to the further deterioration of the public housing stock and perhaps leading to an increase in abandonments.

The administration has proposed to end the federal government's involvement in new construction of Section 8 Assisted Housing and suggests a "voucher"-type program instead. The low vacancy rates in parts of the Northeast and Midwest make this a particular area of concern. (See Budget Brief Number Fourteen for details.)

Education. In fiscal 1983, the administration proposed to establish a Foundation for Education Assistance, a scaled-down subcabinet agency to replace the current Department of Education. A number of programs now administered by the Department of Education would be transferred to other agencies.

Overall education programs would be cut by 21 percent. Compensatory education (Chapter I) the largest federal education program while not targeted for any legislative changes, would receive a $412 million cut in budget authority or 14 percent cut in fiscal 1982. A further cut of $539 million in budget authority, a 22 percent reduction is proposed for fiscal 1983.

Categorical programs for vocational, adult, and handicapped education would be consolidated into two separate block grants, with an adult and vocational block grant being funded in fiscal 1983 at $500 million in budget authority, a 36 percent reduction from fiscal 1981 funding levels. The handicapped block grant would be funded at $846 million, a $62 million increase from fiscal 1982 but a 17 percent or $179 million cut in budget authority from the fiscal 1981 funding level.

The administration would achieve a 10 percent reduction in the Guaranteed Student Loan Program in fiscal 1982 through a number of reforms including applying a needs list to all students and limiting the interest subsidy to a two-year period following graduation.

The proposed 21 percent reduction in funds for education programs will be imposed on the states on top of deep cuts made in these same programs in fiscal 1982. The impact of the administration's budget cuts would be particularly difficult for the states in the Northeast and Midwest which will be receiving less money from Washington at the same time they are experiencing increased fiscal stress.

General Revenue Sharing (GRS). The president has proposed no changes in the GRS program for fiscal 1983, (although the states, including the hard pressed states of the Northeast and Midwest, were suddenly terminated from the program in 1981. Problems relating to the current formula's failure to fully account for real differences in fiscal capacity (e.g. severance taxes) remain in the program as presently constituted.

Small Business. While businesses in the Northeast and Midwest have relied far less on Small Business Administration subsidies than have businesses in other regions, the very substantial cut-backs the president has proposed in SBA subsidies will still be felt in the region. These reductions could make small business development and expansion strategies being undertaken by many of the region's distressed communities especially difficult.

Revenue Measures. The president has proposed a modest set of revenue increasing measures but an almost unlimited number of major alternatives can be considered in the course of fiscal 1983 budget deliberations. Among those tax options likely to be of special interest to the region's decisionmakers are such concepts in the energy field as a national severance tax, elimination of independent oil producers' tax breaks voted in 1981, and repeal of the Windfall Profits Tax exemption for oil pumped off state-owned land.

THE SO-CALLED ECONOMIC RECOVERY PLAN

(Mr. ALEXANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, in his budget message today, President Reagan says:

> We did not promise the American people a miracle. We did promise them progress, and progress they will get.

The progress we have is to the conclusion that President Reagan has no coherent policy to balance the Federal budget.

The practical effect of the so-called economic recovery plan is to cut general outlays by amounts approximately equal to sums required for the defense buildup. The tax cuts under last year's law result in reductions in Federal revenues of $776.2 billion from 1981 through 1986—leaving revenues substantially below the amounts required to operate the Federal Government without generating huge deficits.

By the administration's own budget estimates—which are subject to challenge—the present economic course is certain to produce record deficits exceeding $273.3 billion over the next 3 years insuring higher interest rates and higher unemployment with the prospect of lower productivity.

If the President supports a balanced budget, he should present one.

What is needed is a bipartisan congressional alternative to the budget now before us—a bipartisan alternative that is designed to balance the Federal budget.

LET'S START AT THE TOP WITH BUDGET CUTS

(Mr. LEVITAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, over the next several months we will be hearing a great deal about the budget which President Reagan has now submitted to Congress. We will hear about an enormous deficit. We will hear about additional revenue enhancements resulting from his proposal for withholding taxes on dividends and interest. We will hear a great debate about where reductions in increased rates of spending will be made, since President Reagan's proposed budget is even larger than last year's.

But there is one element in this proposed budget, Mr. Speaker, that should not go unnoticed, as we begin this debate. I refer to President Reagan's request for an increase in funds for the White House. While calling for many reductions of proposed spending in programs like child nutrition programs, reductions for job training and education, increased payments by senior citizens for health care, the President is asking for a 17-percent increase in funds to run the White House. The largest part of the increase requested is a boost from $11.9 million to $13.3 million for White House salaries.

I do not begrudge this President, or any President, the funds needed to run his high office, but if we are asking other people in America to sacrifice, we might as well begin at the top, at the White House. Do you not think it sends the wrong message, Mr. Reagan? Perhaps someone can address the question of why the White House will be receiving increases in spending while people out in America will be receiving cuts.

PROSTRATING THE CCC FOR GENERAL JARUZELSKI

(Mr. PEASE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, January 31, we watched an international broadcast entitled "Let Poland Be Poland" which was designed to rivet the world's attention on the brutal suppression of the Polish people. The U.S. International Communication Agency had a major role in producing that program and President Reagan was featured prominently in it.

What we did not know along with the American people was that while President Reagan was "talking tough" about General Jaruzelski's martial law regime in Poland and the Soviet Union, he had already decided to have our Government pay $71.3 million owed by the Government of Poland to U.S. commercial banks. To make matters worse, the Reagan administration rewrote the rules and prescribed operating procedures of the Commodity Credit Corporation on an emergency basis to afford special treatment for the Polish debts.

The following excerpt from part 1493 of the Code of Federal Regulations details the established procedures that are to be followed for losses caused by defaults in the loan guarantee program of the Commodity Credit Corporation.

LOSSES CAUSED BY DEFAULTS

§ 1493.8 Notice of defaults.

(a) If the foreign bank issuing the letter of credit fails to make a remittance pursuant to the terms of the foreign bank letter of credit or related obligation, the exporter or the exporter's assignee shall notify CCC at the address indicated in § 1493.15, by phone or wire if payment is not received within 10 days of due date, or any extension thereof by the Treasurer, or Assistant Treasurer, CCC. If made by phone it must be confirmed in writing. The notice shall include the payment guarantee number, the amount due, the date of refusal to pay and reason for the default, if known.

(b) Within 30 days after the notice of default, or any extension thereof by the Treasurer, or Assistant Treasurer, CCC, the exporter or the exporter's assignee shall file a claim for loss to the Treasurer, CCC, with the following information and documents:

(1) Payment guarantee number.

(2) A certification that the scheduled payment has not been received.

(3) A copy, certified as true and correct by the exporter or the exporter's assignee of each of the following:

(i) Foreign bank letter of credit securing the export credit sale and, if applicable, the obligation owed by the foreign bank to the assignee U.S. bank which is related to the foreign bank's letter of credit issued in favor of the exporter.

(ii) Ocean carrier or intermodal bill(s) of lading with onboard ocean carrier date for each shipment, or airway bill, or if exported by rail or truck, landing certificate or similar document.

(iii) Invoice(s) showing the exported value of the commodity.

(iv) An instrument, in form and substance satisfactory, to CCC, subrogating to CCC their respective rights for the amount of payment in default under the applicable export credit sale. If there is an intervening purchaser both the exporter's invoice to the intervening purchaser and the invoice to the foreign buyer should be included.

(c) A claim for a loss by the exporter or the exporter's assignee shall not be honored if it is made later than six months from the date of default.

§ 1493.9 Payment of loss.

(a) Upon receipt of the information and documents in good order, as required under § 1493.8, CCC shall determine whether or not a loss has occurred for which CCC is liable under the applicable payment guarantee and these regulations. If CCC determines that it is liable to the exporter and/or the exporter's assignee, CCC will remit to the exporter or the exporter's assignee the amount of the combined principal and interest loss covered by the payment guarantee plus interest at the latest rate of the bond equivalent of the 52-week Treasury bill auction average which has been published by the Department of Treasury as of the date of default. Interest shall accrue beginning with the first day after the exporter's or the exporter's assignee's claim was received by CCC and continuing to the date payment is made by CCC.

(b) CCC's maximum liability will be limited to the lesser of (1) the guaranteed value as shown in the payment guarantee plus eligible interest or (2) the percentage of the exported value as specified in the payment guarantee plus eligible interest.

(c) CCC shall only honor claims for losses on amounts not paid as scheduled. CCC shall not honor claims for amounts due under an accelerated payment clause in the export credit sales contract, the foreign bank's letter of credit, or any obligation owed by the foreign bank to the assignee U.S. bank which is related to the foreign bank's letter of credit issued in favor of the exporter, unless it is determined to be in the interest of CCC by the Assistant General Sales Manager. Notwithstanding the foregoing, CCC, at its option may declare the entire amount of the unpaid balance plus accrued interest in default and make payment to the exporter or the exporter's assignee in addition to such other claimed amount as may be due from CCC.

(d) Notwithstanding any other provision of the regulations set forth in this subpart to the contrary, with regard to commodities shipped to which the payment guarantee is applicable CCC will not hold the assignee responsible or take any action or raise any defense against the assignee for any action, omission or statement by the exporter over which the assignee has no control provided that:

(1) The exporter complies with the reporting requirements under § 1493.7 and (2) the exporter or the exporter's assignee furnishes the statements and documents specified in § 1493.8.

[45 FR 64898, Oct. 1, 1980, as amended at 45 FR 78622, Nov. 26, 1980]

§ 1493.10 Recovery of losses.

(a) Upon payment of loss to the exporter or the exporter's assignee, CCC will notify the importer and/or the foreign bank of CCC's rights under the subrogation agreement to recover all monies in default.

(b) In the event monies for the defaulted payment are received by the exporter or the exporter's assignee from the importer, foreign bank or any other source whatsoever, such monies shall be immediately paid to the Treasurer, CCC.

(c) Recoveries made by CCC from the importer or foreign bank and recoveries received by CCC from the exporter or the exporter's assignee or any other source shall be allocated by CCC to the exporter or the exporter's assignee and CCC on a pro rata basis as their respective interest may appear. The respective interest of each party shall be determined on a pro rata basis, based on the combined amount of principal, plus interest.

(d) Notwithstanding any other terms of the payment guarantee, the exporter shall be liable to CCC for any amounts paid by CCC under the payment guarantee when and if it is determined by CCC that the exporter has been or is in breach of any contractual obligation, certification or warranty made by the exporter for the purpose of obtaining the payment guarantee or in fulfilling obligations under the GSM-102 Regulations.

(e) Upon payment of a claim to the exporter or the exporter's assignee, the exporter or the exporter's assignee shall cooperate with CCC to effect recoveries from the foreign bank and/or the importer.

I have already introduced a resolution (H. Con. Res. 266) to protest the President's unconscionable decision to use public funds to underwrite the imposition of martial law in Poland. Hopefully, a strong show of support for this resolution from both sides of the aisle will convince the President that it should be up to General Jaruzelski and the Kremlin and not the American taxpayer to pay off the Polish debts.

REVOLUTION IN NATION'S FINANCIAL MARKETS

(Mr. PARRIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, one of the least understood phenomena of our time has occurred essentially during the last 13 months. This situation will surely have dramatic and drastic effects on the way monetary policy is conducted in the United States.

In just a little over 1 year, funds approaching $200 billion have been placed into nonregulated, noninsured, nonreserved money market funds. I am informed that this amount exceeds the combined total deposits of 11,000 of the 14,000 banks in our Nation, or the equivalent of 79 percent of the Nation's total bank deposits.

The American consumer, wary of continued excessive inflation, has taken his savings to these money market funds as the most liquid, highest yielding means of protecting the real value of his money—but none of these assets are available for consumer finance or mortgage indebtedness.

The consequences of this activity is nothing short of a revolution in this Nation's financial markets and institutions which will be ignored in the future at our peril.

HONORING SENATOR STROM THURMOND

(Mr. CAMPBELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to include in today's RECORD a transcript of the Strom Thurmond testimonial dinner held on October 24, 1981, on the occasion of the announcement of the Strom Thurmond Center for Excellence in Government and Public Service at Clemson University. The admiration, respect and, yes, love revealed in these remarks are an appropriate tribute to South Carolina's senior Senator and the Nation's President pro tempore of the Senate. At this point in the RECORD I include the following:

TRANSCRIPT OF STROM THURMOND TESTIMONIAL DINNER

INVOCATION BY THE REVEREND ROGER LOVETTE, D.C., PASTOR, FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH OF CLEMSON, S.C.

Let us pray:

We thank you Lord for those that serve the cause of the right in our time. We thank you, tonight, for the good gifts that Strom Thurmond has given to make this world a better place as we break this bread together this evening. Make us all conscious of all the graces that flow into our lives, making them richer, deeper, better and more purposeful. In your name, we ask all these things. Amen.

DINNER HONORING SENATOR STROM THURMOND ON THE OCCASION OF THE ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE STROM THURMOND CENTER FOR EXCELLENCE IN GOVERNMENT AND PUBLIC SERVICE AT CLEMSON UNIVERSITY, OCTOBER 24, 1981, CLEMSON UNIVERSITY PRESIDENT BILL L. ATCHLEY

Ladies and gentlemen, I want to welcome each of you to this special occasion to honor a very special Clemson son and a great American, Senator Strom Thurmond.

If I were to introduce tonight all the distinguished people in this room, we would be here all night. But I would like to recognize Senator and Mrs. Thurmond and the members of their family, and ask them to stand so we can give them a warm welcome.

Please continue with your dinner while I share with you some greetings from a number of Senator Thurmond's colleagues in public service. Again, we don't have time to read all the telegrams we've received from members of the Cabinet, members of Congress and from Senator Thurmond's friends throughout the state and nation, but I do want to quote from a few of them.

Energy Secretary Jim Edwards says that this is a historic day for Clemson University. He says, "People from all over this nation will visit South Carolina for the first time and take back with them a little of what we in South Carolina know to be our greatest treasure—Senator Strom Thurmond."

Senator Thurmond's colleague in the United States Senate, Senator Fritz Hollings, writes, "Having the Thurmond papers at Clemson is good news for everybody. My congratulations to you and particularly to my friend Strom for making such an outstanding selection."

From Governor Dick Riley we get this word, "Clemson and all South Carolinians can be proud of this most gracious donation by Senator Thurmond, one of our state's foremost statesmen and leaders. Please accept my personal congratulations."

And now I'd like to introduce Mr. Lee Atwater—a former aide to Senator Thurmond and now Deputy Assistant to the President for Political Affairs. He has a very special message from some other friends in Washington.

DEAR PRESIDENT ATCHLEY: I want to congratulate Clemson University on this tremendous gift of personal papers and memorabilia from Senator Strom Thurmond. This must surely make one of the finest hours for a university which has an outstanding tradition of support by its alumni.

Senator Strom Thurmond is without doubt one of the nation's outstanding public figures, and I am sure that the Strom Thurmond Center for Excellence in Government and Public Service will be a monument to the Senator's exemplary public service.

Strom, I also want to congratulate you on your choice of a home for your papers and materials. I know of your love for Clemson, and I believe that you have made a splendid selection for the location of a national research and learning center to honor your many contributions to South Carolina and the Nation.

With best wishes for a most enjoyable occasion,

Sincerely,

GEORGE BUSH,
Vice President of the United States.

DEAR DR. ATCHLEY: I am delighted to extend my warmest congratulations to you and Clemson University on the formation of the Strom Thurmond Center for Excellence in Government and Public Service.

Senator Thurmond's career as judge, governor, and senator spans several crucial decades in our nation's history. His outstanding leadership and contributions to the American political process are an inspiration to all who seek the best for our nation.

As you know, Strom is President Pro Tem of the Senate and Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and he and I worked together on a daily basis. I value his counsel, and Nancy and I treasure our friendship with Strom and his Nancy.

With its acquisition of his papers and memorabilia, the University will be preserving a rich source of unique information and insight not only of a major political figure but of an entire era.

Once again, congratulations on this announcement. You have my best wishes for every success for this project in the years ahead.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN,
President of the United States.

Before we begin our program, I would like you to know that we have two occasions for celebrating tonight. To help me with this part of the festivities, let me introduce to you four Thurmonds you haven't met yet. They are Nancy Moore, J. Strom Jr., Julie and Paul.

Please join me in wishing "Happy Birthday" today to Mrs. Nancy Thurmond.

Tonight we celebrate two historic events in the life of Clemson University—the decision by Senator Thurmond to give his papers to Clemson University, and the announcement of the Strom Thurmond Center for Excellence and Public Service at Clemson.

We are privileged to have on our program tonight several individuals who, aside from being distinguished in their own right, have been close to the life and career of Senator Thurmond. Each will share with us some insights and observations about the various periods of the Senator's career.

I'm sure many of you know that Senator Thurmond began his remarkable life of public service right here in his native South Carolina after he was graduated from Clemson. He wore quite a few hats in those early days too, serving as coach, teacher, lawyer, and circuit judge.

I have the pleasure now of introducing the Honorable Charles E. Simons Jr., chief judge of the United States District Court, District of South Carolina, who will tell us more about Senator Thurmond's early career in public life.

REMARKS BY THE HONORABLE CHARLES E. SIMONS, JR., CHIEF JUDGE, FEDERAL DISTRICT COURT, DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Dr. Atchley, friends of Strom Thurmond and Nancy Thurmond and the Thurmond children:

The opportunity to be here tonight, sharing this program honoring Strom and Nancy Thurmond and their children, affords me one of life's most cherished moments. My association with Strom goes back at least a generation. We both come from Edgefield County. He is the second oldest in a family with three sons and three daughters. His father, Mr. Will Thurmond, was one of the leading lawyers of this state and served in the legislature from Edgefield County as solicitor of the circuit and later as United States attorney. His mother was a very gentle, genteel and admirable lady. Both parents wielded tremendous influence upon Strom's character and personality.

I have often heard him quote his father saying, "You must always appear right as well as be right." He has always adhered religiously to this principle. When Strom graduated in 1923 from this great institution—that's quite a concession from a Carolina man—he taught agriculture for the next five years in the high schools of McCormick, Ridge Spring and Edgefield. He then hitched his wagon to a star beginning his steady rise to become the greatest legend of our time.

In 1928 he was promoted from teacher to county superintendent of education. He then decided to study law at night in his father's law office, finishing a three year curriculum in one year. It is reported—and I don't vouch for this—that he tied for first place along with a Harvard Law School graduate in the South Carolina Bar Examination. He then began his law practice in Edgefield in 1930 where he had a very thriving practice. He was elected to the State Senate in 1933. I heard my dad, a close friend and supporter of Strom, quite often make the statement that Strom was a fine lawyer and advocate and I suspect that his high admiration for Strom is one of the reasons that he urged me to go to law school.

Incidentally, in 1936 Strom was elected to the Board of Trustees of Winthrop College, and I understand that one of the halls over there, probably a girl's dormitory, was named after him.

In 1938 he was again promoted, this time from lawyer to circuit judge. Some people refer to them as circus judges. He won handily in a heated race over George Bell Timmerman, Sr., who later became one of our outstanding federal distict judges. During the judicial election in the general assembly, he had the strong support of Governor Olin B. Johnston, whom he later opposed in the 1950 United States Senate race, if any of you remember. This was a very heated and close race with Senate Johnston edging out Senator Thurmond.

Judge Thurmond was widely recognized as an able, fearless, evenhanded and compassionate judge. During his tenure he had the painful duty to sentence several murderers and rapists to the electric chair. Yes, they were in fact electrocuted in those days. Unfortunately, this is far from what is happening under our present day system, where literally hundreds of dangerous criminals are languishing in deathrow waiting for the federal courts to commit the states to execute their sentences. That statement is primarily for Judge Chapman. Hopefully this situation will change as new members are added to our circuit courts and the United States Supreme Court.

In 1939 upon graduation from Law School, I visited Judge Thurmond during his court in Edgefield seeking his suggestion as to where I should hang out my shingles since I had just finished Law School. He recommended to me that I consider Aiken. I followed his advice. It worked out so well, that I have been following his advice ever since. I've even taken up jogging.

When our country entered World War II, he immediately volunteered for active duty even though he was exempt from the service by virture of his judgeship. When he returned from the service, he resigned from his judgeship and ran for governor in 1946 and was elected over 10 other opponents. When his term as governor expired in January 1951, he complimented Dorsey Library and me by coming to Aiken and joining our law firm. For the next several years we enjoyed a very interesting, varied and lucrative law practice. We represented a majority of the land owners in their condemnation cases against the United States government which had taken their farms, businesses and homes to build the Savannah River Plant. Under Strom's direction we organized the Aiken Federal Savings and Loan Association with an original deposit of $100,000. Today the total assets of that Association amount to approximately $160 million.

In the most sensational murder case of that period, he was employed by Marjorie Prescott Kennedy, originally from Edgefield County, to represent her for the murder of her husband, John B. Kennedy, the fire and police chief of Augusta, Georgia. She had shot him with his own gun as he emerged from a grocery store. After several weeks of detailed preparation, followed by an extended trial, he won for her an acquittal—not bad for a South Carolina lawyer who had dared to venture into the foreign lands of Richmond Country, Georgia.

He remained with us in Aiken until he was again promoted, to the United States Senate in the famous write-in campaign that you'll hear more about mementarily.

What an experience it was to practice law with Strom Thurmond.

Regardless of whether you call our honoree professor, state senator, judge, governor, attorney, United States senator, president pro tempore of the Senate or just plain Strom, you have the same person. A wonderful gentleman, a loving husband, a devoted father, a great American and the most outstanding South Carolinian of our time.

Strom Thurmond is a man of sterling character, dauntless courage, limitless determination, and spotless integrity. Throughout his lifetime of dedicated public service, he has made this state and this nation a better place in which to live. His tireless efforts in serving his constituency has touched the lives of our people in so many ways.

In conslusion, if I may be personal for a moment, I want Strom to know that his friendship has indeed been one of the greatest blessings of my life. My words are grossly inadequate to fully express to him the gratitude, the admiration, and the love which my family and I have for him and his wonderful family.

Strom, I shall always be grateful for your friendship, your influence on my life and the helping hand you have always so graciously extended to me. May God bless you in the years ahead.

Dr. ATCHLEY. Our next speaker is a man who is very ably qualified to talk about Senator THURMOND's years as Governor of South Carolina and his service as a United States Senator . . . because this gentleman has also distinguished himself in both those high positions.

I present the Honorable Donald S. Russell, Circuit Judge of the United States Court of Appeals, and former United States Senator and Governor of South Carolina.

REMARKS BY THE HONORABLE DONALD S. RUSSELL, JUDGE, FOURTH CIRCUIT, U.S. COURT OF APPEALS, AND FORMER U.S. SENATOR AND GOVERNOR OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Senator and Mrs. Thurmond, youngster Thurmonds, friends of the Thurmonds.

It is a great pleasure for me to be here because of the great, high regard which I entertain for a beloved colleague of mine when I was in the Senate, but above all a friend always, Strom Thurmond.

I say that because I think back of something George Canning, one of the great English statesmen of our first quarter of the 19th century, said on the floor of the House of Commons once. He said, "Away with all this cant of a government of laws but not of men, as if it were the harness and not the horses that draw the carriage." Now that is not to say that the law is not important. But it is to say that law is meaningless unless we have men of character, of ability, of wisdom and dedication to give them reality in our lives. And so tonight we come together to honor the one who, both in our state and nation, and by his life and by his dedication to state and country, has made an indelible contribution to us and our country.

That is the reason we wish to honor him. Some reference was made that I was to speak on his contributions as governor. I think that is very appropriate, because it has been a long time since STROM was governor, and it is easy to forget some of the great accomplishments of that period.

Strom was not an inactive governor. Just as he jogs today and runs all the time, he was running every day that he was governor and every day making some additional contribution to this State.

Some of us, I am sure, forget that it was in his period of governorship that there was a distinctive reorganization of the election law in South Carolina. And it was Governor Strom Thurmond who led in the abolition of the poll tax in South Carolina. And he also added other provisions to enable a greater number of people, all qualified voters, to vote and participate in the elections of this state.

Now also there is one thing that we as judges have noticed about Strom: he's a little parsimonious with the public purse. He has never been in favor of the many ideas that we Federal judges have that they should increase our pay, and he followed that same policy when he was Governor of South Carolina. His was a real efficient governorship, and during that period of time he so established the credit of this state that we moved from A to a double-A rating. It was the final step forward to a triple-A rating which we in South Carolina so prize and which has amounted to a savings of hundreds of millions of dollars in interest to the people of this state.

Also we hear a lot of talk about the Sunbelt. Well, you know, Strom sort of anticipated that. He did not call it the Sunbelt. But he began making speeches all around and said that the place where industry should move was right here in the Southeast. And in the Southeast, the best place, and God knows this is right, is South Carolina.

So he brought into this state over a billion dollars of new industries offering new employment.

He was not, as you say, uninterested in education, for he had a background in it. And so, he inaugurated action toward a nine-month school for the benefit of every child in this state.

I have mentioned these. There are many more that I could go on about: the many contributions he made, the programs he has established. Perhaps one should be particularly mentioned.

As soon as he became governor, he ended a period that had brought much criticism to the Office of Governor. At his insistence, the legislature of South Carolina took away from the Governor the power of pardon. That was one that those of us who came later as Governor appreciated, because we did not have to be bothered with so many entreaties. We could all say, "Strom destroyed our power to pardon you." I may say that I do not believe anyone has made a greater contribution as Governor of South Carolina—a more active, more dynamic executive—than Strom Thurmond.

South Carolina and the citizens and taxpayers of this state will be eternally grateful to him for that.

I, unfortunately, did not have the long personal acquaintance and friendship with Strom that Charley Simons has. But I have had a close and an intimate friendship beginning some 25 years ago.

I went to the United States Senate as a Democrat. Strom was a Republican. But that has never interfered with our feelings. I had the opportunity to know him as a legislator, as a citizen. I never knew him at any time where he ever sacrificed principle to expediency or to political advantage. I never knew him when he sacrificed his patriotism, forgot his partisanship, above all in the field of national defense. He thought that was a clear place where any partisanship must—and should—yield to patriotic sacrifice and to the love of country.

I also found out something else about Strom. There never was a person more careful in what he told you or more faithful in carrying out anything he did tell you. You could rely implicitly upon anything that he said. And I think that one of the reasons that I found in the Senate that all Republicans and Democrats had a respect and a regard for Strom was because they knew that they could always believe whatever he told them. Also, as I said a moment ago, they knew that he was always going to vote his principle not his politics.

I know I am very happy to be able to be here tonight and to pay tribute to one who I think is one of our great public servants, one who now occupies one of the most important positions in the government of the United States and one who has never forgotten that he is a South Carolinian.

I noted one thing when I was in the Senate. I do not believe any South Carolinian ever came to Washington, be he Democrat or Republican or whatever he was, that he did not get a free meal in the Senate dining room given him by Strom Thurmond. And I do not believe that he ever had a meeting that had about 10 people in it and they invited him, and if there was any possible way he could get there, that he did not go. He is a devoted South Carolina Senator, but, above all, he is, as Charley said, always beyond being a Republican, beyond even being a South Carolinian—always a great American. He has proved that on many occasions.

So I join with all of you in paying honor, respect and affection to Strom Thurmond and his lovely, beloved wife, Nancy, and all these beautiful children.

Dr. ATCHLEY. Certainly one of the most interesting and colorful chapters in Senator Thurmond's career was written in 1954, when a very successful write-in campaign thrust him into the United States Senate. An earlier history-making event occurred in 1948 when he was nominated and ran for the Presidency of the United States. We are honored to have with us the man who played a key role in those campaigns, Mr. Walter J. Brown, President of Spartan Radio-Casting Company.

REMARKS BY MR. WALTER J. BROWN, PRESIDENT, SPARTAN RADIOCASTING CO., SPARTANBURG, S.C.

I was playing golf down at Seabrook last Friday when my office called me and said that I had been asked by Clemson to appear on this program tonight, which is certainly a great honor to me. They said that I was the chairman of the states rights campaign and Senator Thurmond's write-in campaign and that I would be limited to three minutes. I have had a lot of excitement in my life but none like that and I think my predecessors have all exceeded their three minutes, but I will try not to exceed that.

Strom Thurmond's 1948 presidential campaign grew out of the Southern Governors Conference at Wachula Springs, Florida. I remember it so well because I was on a deer hunt in the lower part of South Carolina when Governor Thurmond called me and said, "Listen, I have got to go to Wachula Springs." Our mutual friend, Bob Seigler, was deer hunting with and said, "You all get packed up there and meet me over on 301, and I'll pick you up in five hours." So we were in the room packing up when our great friend, Judge Whites came in and said, "What's all this going on? Is Strom fixing to fire on Fort Sumter again?" It wasn't quite that bad but we met Strom over there, and on our way down at that time the campaign really was beginning to incubate. This campaign was not racial as interpreted by the media when the states rights ticket of Thurmond and Wright was slurringly dubbed as the Dixiecrat ticket. That campaign revolved around one issue and that was the Tenth Amendment of the Constitution. No need for me to repeat that truism to this audience here tonight.

Had some of the Southern Governors who had participated in this Wachula Springs movement subsequently signed the manifesto delivered to the heads of the Democratic party in Washington and not abandoned the opposition, the election would have been thrown into the House and this country would be different from what it is today.

I say this because of several reasons, one of which is that while I was at the Governor's Mansion in Columbia on election night with Governor Thurmond and the results were in doubt, Les Differ, President Truman's trusted friend and aide, called me from the White House to urge Governor Thurmond to make no commitment on his electoral votes until they could talk with him. I might say that after the results from Illinois and a few other states came in, I received no more calls from the White House. But all was not lost. In my opinion, the states rights seed was sown in the 1948 campaign.

As to the States Rights campaign, I could go on and talk, but I have been asked now to refer to the write-in campaign.

That is, I think, one of the most historic campaigns with which I have ever been associated. But I would have to say that, at that time, machine politics in South Carolina went wild following the death in 1954 of another great friend of ours, Burnett Maybank, who had just been nominated for another six year term in the Senate. Had the State Democratic Committee and this nominee been satisfied with only a two-year term, and then turning the office back to the people through the Democratic primary, I doubt very seriously that the revolt that did take place would have taken place.

In making this campaign—which most politicians said he had no chance to win—Strom Thurmond demonstrated once again that he was a man of courage and conviction and was willing to put his head on the political chopping block to sustain his convictions and his principles of government to which he has dedicated his whole life.

I wish I could say more. I know my three minutes are about up. But let me say, in conclusion, that many, many months ago I began urging Senator Thurmond to take steps to preserve his papers because of their historic importance. He asked me to make inquiries at institutions seeking these papers, but, in my own mind, there was never any question that, in the end, he would select his own alma mater. Also, another important fact was that the James F. Byrnes papers are here. Both the Thurmonds and the Byrnes were Tillman people and came from the same political mold. And here is where those papers belong. Clemson has the opportunity to build a collection of historic papers which will attract historians to this campus for many, many decades to come. What has happened here today should mark one of the great events in the history of this university.

Dr. ATCHLEY. A highly decorated soldier and a patriot in the highest sense of the word, Senator Thurmond has never wavered in his belief that America can remain strong and free only through a solid national defense program. We are most honored to have with us tonight the Secretary of the Army, the Honorable John O. Marsh, Jr., who will talk about Senator Thurmond's long relationship with and support of America's armed forces.

REMARKS BY THE HONORABLE JOHN O. MARSH, JR., SECRETARY OF THE ARMY

Senator Thurmond, Members of Your Family, Distinguished Guests.

I am very honored that I could come here to pay honor to America's Number One Citizen Soldier. And Strom Thurmond is America's Number One Citizen Soldier. It has been a long road for him from Second Lieutenant, commissioned here through the ROTC program at Clemson, to Major General, retired in the United States Army.

That discloses an aspect of his life which I suspect has been a very dominant one and, based on my own observation, I know that it plays a very important part in his thinking, in his attitudes, and I know it has impacted on how he votes in the United States Senate. I would point out what someone else had said: He served here as circuit judge; when war was declared on Germany, although he was exempt from military duty, he volunteered for military service.

An officer in the Army, he would hold various assignments and commands. But he volunteered again. He volunteered in the company of the Glider Forces, the 82nd Airborne Division in the Normandy assault on the sixth day of June, 1944—the greatest armada, the greatest invasion that has ever occurred.

That was an opportunity where we would see great heroism demonstrated by this individual. Wounded on that day, he was decorated on that same day for his valorous action.

Strom Thurmond did not limit his activities, though, to Normandy. Quite the contrary, he fought all through Europe with the First Army. He served in all the campaigns of Europe. And World War II, when it ended in Europe, would find him in the Philippines when the Japanese surrendered. You would have to say that he was an individual who, as an officer, marched to the sound of guns.

I think perhaps that the awards and decorations tell, better than I can tell you, of his tremendous achievements. In Europe, he won five battle stars and the Bronze Arrowhead during the invasion. He won the Legion of Merit. He later would win the second Legion of Merit, for which he has a cluster. He won the Bronze Star for Valor, for heroism on the battlefield. He was awarded the Purple Heart. He was awarded the Army Commendation Medal and the Presidential Distinguished Unit Citation. He holds the Order of the Belgium Government for Heroism. He holds the Croix de Guerre awarded by France for his role in the liberation of France.

If you look at his bronze star citation and read that citation, you realize that, in that assault in the glider force at Normandy, his glider was hit by enemy fire and was forced down behind German lines. Although badly injured in that landing, he nevertheless would assist in unloading the glider and, although exposed to small arms fire and mortar fire, he would go about the battleground assisting the organization of the other glider troops, all of which, as the decoration indicates, reflected great credit upon himself and the United States Army.

He went on to other commands. I, as a member of the Congress, served in one of the units that he commanded in Washington when I had joined the House of Representatives. Yet, his military service continues to this day. Strom Thurmond has never taken off the uniform of his country. In fact, he shall never take off the uniform of his country. And I can tell you, as Secretary of the Army and one who has served in the Congress, and one that served in the Ford administration, that Strom Thurmond was always there when this country needed him on questions that related to defense.

If they would comment about Jackson that there stood Jackson like a stonewall, I would say to you that on questions that relate to defense and the security of this country, there stands Strom Thurmond.

Dr. ATCHLEY. Our next distinguished guest is the Honorable John L. Napier, United States Congressman from the Sixth District of South Carolina. He will give us some personal perspectives about the relationship between the Senator and his staff.

REMARKS OF THE HONORABLE JOHN L. NAPIER, U.S. CONGRESSMAN, SIXTH DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Senator and Mrs. Thurmond, members of the Thurmond family, both personal and official family, distinguished friends of the Thurmond family; I speak to you as an employee of Senator Thurmond, and I say that because once you work for him, you never leave. And I think all who are in the audience who have ever worked for Senator Thurmond can attest to that fact.

I shall never forget the first day I walked in his office and he called me in to tell me what the job was all about. The first thing he told me was this: "You will make mistakes. The only man who does not make mistakes is the man who does nothing." Secondly, and seeing some Edgefield people here tonight, he said, "I want you to do something that I have been working on for many years. I want you to handle agricultural matters. And I want you to call the Secretary of the Army and ask him to buy more peaches than he has been buying lately."

And so, as the most junior staff member on his staff, I proceeded out the door and called the Secretary of the Army and the call was never returned, and I am sure they are buying the peaches, but the Senator was never satisfied. Mr. Secretary, would you please buy some peaches from down in Edgefield?

As an employee of Senator Thurmond, I had the opportunity, and still have the opportunity, to observe his life as a life rich in service: Rich not only in public service, as has been recounted by other speakers here tonight, but rich also in private service to humanity, in service to his church, in service through civic involvement, and in service through the Thurmond Foundation and through the scholarships that he has provided throughout our state so worthy and needy students may obtain a higher education.

I have seen him donate money to people who were in need. I have seen him take time from national policy questions to talk with constituents who were in need of help. Once again, he has told all of us on his staff that the most important thing you can do is to serve the needs of one in trouble because that person, to him, has the greatest problem in the world.

As an employee, I saw his life as a life free of recrimination and absolutely intolerant of pettiness. He is a man of compassion. I shall never forget before one of his elections, seeing a former opponent come into the office and see the Senator dismiss the staff who were in there and then see the two former opponents later walk out the office arm in arm, friend to friend.

And then I observed his life as a life of courage—courage as described by the Secretary of the Army just preceding these remarks. But also courage to take politically dangerous roads. Courage not to fear physical violence.

It was only two weeks ago that I made a call to the Senator's office—fully realizing that it was none of my business—asking him not to go to Egypt because he is third in line in succession to the Presidency—and asking him to stay in the United States because I had a fear of what might occur. And he recounted to me that he had flown in a glider over Normandy, and he recounted to me that this was his duty as he saw his duty and that would make the trip.

I can only say in recounting the life of Senator Thurmond that his is a life rich in service, a life free of recrimination and intolerant of pettiness, and a life of courage. I believe that God has truly shined upon us by allowing us to live in this time and to know a great and good man like Senator Thurmond.

John Gilbert Holland once wrote a poem where he prayed to God that God would give to America great public servants. He wrote, "God give us men, a time like this demands strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hand. Men whom the lust of office does not kill. Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy. Men who possess opinions and a will. Men who have honor. Men who will not lie. Men who can stand before a demagogue and damn his treacherous flatteries without winking. Tall men. Sun crowned, who live above the fog in public duties and private thinking."

Senator he must have had you in mind.

Dr. ATCHLEY. We have with us another distinguished member of the United States Congress, the Honorable Carroll A. Campbell, Jr., Congressman from the Fourth District of South Carolina. He will discuss Senator Thurmond's role in the development of the two-party system in the South.

REMARKS OF THE HONORABLE CARROLL A. CAMPBELL, JR., U.S. CONGRESSMAN, FOURTH DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Thank you very much, Dr. Atchley. Senator and Mrs. Thurmond, it's my pleasure to be here. I don't know that I'm up to the occasion. I'm reminded as I see the Thurmonds sitting here with their children, not long ago I went out to dinner with a group of people and carried my youngest son, Mike, along with us. Mike was sitting at the table of about nine or ten people and one gentleman at the table, as there always is one at the table, talked incessently. And he went on about all of the things we should be thankful for in this world, and he talked about how we should be thankful for the weather, and how we should be thankful for the food, and how we should be thankful for our health, and how we should be thankful for the company we had, and he cited a list about a mile long and he turned to my young son, Mike, and said "Mike, why don't you return thanks for all these things." And my little boy looked him right back in the eye, and he said, "I can't do that. I'm just a 'God is great' kid."

Senator, there is no way that I can do justice to that which you have done.

Samuel Johnson once said of the English statesman Edmund Burke, that if you met him for the first time and you took the time to stop and talk to him that you would know that this was an extraordinary man. Extraordinary is the word that describes Strom Thurmond. There's no question of that.

When we speak of him as a pioneer or a politician or a patriot, or as President Pro Tempore, or as a physical fitness advocate or a family man or as our state's first citizen, then we are speaking of an extraordinary man. A man whose friendships outnumber even the Clemson football fans.

Consider this about Strom Thurmond's political career. Most of us in politics are happy if we can get a nomination on one ticket. Strom Thurmond carried the state of South Carolina on four separate tickets. Party had nothing to do with this man. This man had a lot to do with making parties. He did that. When the leadership of his party left him and left some of the things that he believed in, then Strom Thurmond set out to bring about changes in the South and in this nation and he did it.

And he struck hard to build a two-party system. It was Strom Thurmond's courage once again that persevered. It was Strom Thurmond who blazed the way for many a young politician, such as John Napier, and myself and others, to come behind and try to build some of the things that he believed in. And had it not been for him standing tall at one time we may never have had the opportunity. You know many despaired during those tough times, but Strom Thurmond persevered. He never hestiated to take a road that was less popular, less travelled.

Whether it be as the Senate's first successful write-in candidate, or whether it be as the first southern Senator to hire a black professional for his staff, Strom Thurmond blazed the trail.

Strom has a unique ability not just to stand on his own head, but to stand institutions on their heads. And yet, as John Napier said, he has always had the time to stop to call the sick, congratulate the successful, to offer a friendly hand to a young person, a needy person, or a lonely person. Or even offer a helping hand to an aspiring politician or two.

We would need a month if we were going to do justice to that which Strom Thurmond has done for all of us. This is but a brief tribute. But as I stand here at Clemson University and I think of the great people that I have known in my life and those that I have studied, three great South Carolinians come to my mind as we talk about this University and as we talk about our beloved state: John C. Calhoun, James F. Brynes, Strom Thurmond, and not necessarily in that order.

Dr. ATCHLEY. Senator Thurmond's decision to leave his papers to Clemson University will have far-reaching effects, which like the Senator's dedicated life of public service, will touch the lives of many citizens. This gift has served as the impetus for establishing this center for public service and good government.

Mr. Thomas B. McTeer, Jr., Chairman of the Clemson Board of Trustees, will now offer some comments about what this gift will mean to the University community.

REMARKS OF THOMAS B. M'TEER, JR., CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES, CLEMSON UNIVERSITY

As Americans—and as South Carolinians—we've come to appreciate two special attributes of your leadership, Senator Thurmond.

It is characteristic of you to serve people unselfishly, and to do it in such a way that a very large number of people benefit.

Those of us here tonight who represent the Clemson University community are keenly aware of this truth as it relates to the events of this historic day.

A great treasure now awaits the students, teachers, researchers and citizens who will have access to your personal papers—and to the historic documents and objects which chronicle your distinguished career in public service. The collection to be housed here on campus will enrich our understanding of the principles of freedom and democracy which you defend for us still.

Through this generous gift, and the programs and facilities of the Strom Thurmond Center, you are giving us an opportunity to establish a one-of-a-kind center for scholarship, research, and direct service to people. It will be a center worthy of the ideals of South Carolina's great statesman John C. Calhoun, and the dreams of our university's founder and Mr. Calhoun's son-in-law, Thomas Green Clemson.

Several programs of the Thurmond Institute will provide direct learning experiences for Clemson students who will pursue careers in public service. All programs of the Institute will provide thousands of people with the opportunity not only to learn how our government works, but also how to keep it working well.

The Center's auditorium facility, which will be designed to accommodate the performing arts as well as the programs of The Thurmond Institute, will benefit all Clemson students, our faculty and staff, and the residents of our growing upstate region.

The Continuing Professional Education Facility, which will eventually be constructed, will enable this university to provde one of its most important public services of all—helping South Carolina and the region to protect out investment in human capital, without which this nation's economy would stumble and fall.

Your gift of history, Senator—and the things it will now make possible—brings with it a rich investment in our future.

On behalf of everyone associated with Clemson, I say again—thank you for what you have done, and for what you are.

Dr. ATCHLEY. One of the most exciting focal points of the Strom Thurmond Center for Excellence in Government and Public Service . . . is the Strom Thurmond Institute. Details of the programs this institute will conduct are contained in your printed program. The impact of these programs will be discussed tonight by Professor Charles W. Dunn, Head of Clemson's Department of Political Science.

REMARKS OF PROF. CHARLES W. DUNN, HEAD, CLEMSON UNIVERSITY, DEPARTMENT OF POLITICAL SCIENCE

Over a century ago Abraham Lincoln remarked, "I will study and prepare should my time come." Tonight, Clemson University honors one who has studied and prepared for over a half century for this occasion.

Just over two decades ago another President remarked, "Ask not what your country can do for you, but what you can do for your country." Tonight, Clemson University honors one of its favorite sons, who has practiced that throughout his life. We honor him tonight with the establishment of several programs in the Thurmond Institute.

The Thurmond High School Achievement Program will bring to Clemson University outstanding high school seniors to encourage them to prepare for careers in public service.

The Thurmond Scholars program will attract to the Clemson University campus outstanding high school minds to train them for public service.

The Thurmond Lecture Series will attract to the Clemson University campus leading scholars, political figures, and government personalities, to lecture on major problems confronting the United States. These and other programs will make this institute unique among all institutes across the nation, whether we speak of the Hoover at Stanford, the Humphrey of Minnesota, or the Kennedy at Harvard.

So, it is a real privilege tonight for us at Clemson to establish an institute that will serve all the people, not only of South Carolina, but of this region and this nation.

Dr. ATCHLEY. Up to this point in our program we've discussed the meaning of Senator Thurmond's gift in relationship to contemporary times and the immediate future. But at the same time, we are well aware that our decisions and planning will have a positive influence on future generations.

Our next speaker will comment on the events of this day in relationship to young men and women of the future. We do not know of anyone better qualified to handle this assignment than Mr. John W. Pettigrew, Jr., who is among the many young men and women who have served internships in Senator Thurmond's Washington office. We know that John must have learned something from that experience because he came back to Clemson and got himself elected President of the Student Body.

REMARKS BY MR. JOHN W. PETTIGREW, JR., PRESIDENT, CLEMSON UNIVERSITY STUDENT BODY

Senator Thurmond, tonight we have heard about many of the things that you have done with your life. From the time that you graduated from Clemson Agricultural College in 1923, your life has exemplified what public service is all about.

You have given of your time, energy, and resources to make life on earth better for your fellow man. You have had a positive influence on a great number of people's lives. I know that my being from Edgefield and having the opportunity of going to Strom Thurmond High School and having the opportunity to come work for you in Washington has given me an insight into the great devotion that you have for our state and nation.

During my time in Washington, in addition to learning to jog with you each morning and eat wheat bran for breakfast, I also was impressed by a number of things that you had to say. And they are the things that are still on my mind. First, you said to me that "a man who takes strong stands is going to have some strong enemies." You said that you just have to do what you know is right and best and just don't worry about the few enemies that you make. And I think that is what statesmanship is all about—standing strong in the face of adversity.

You also expressed, Senator, on many occasions, your sincere love for helping people. You feel that a man in your position should do all that is in his power to help his fellow man. You have always found the time to help others—whether to help find a lost social security check, or to get a passport in a hurry, or provide transportation in an emergency. You were there to help.

People in the state of South Carolina know that when they need help they can call on their friend, Strom Thurmond.

From the time that you were a teacher and school superintendent in Edgefield, you have contributed to the betterment of education in our state. You set up scholarship programs to help needy and worthy high school students to further their education with the scholarships from the Thurmond Foundation.

Now, Senator, you have seen fit to give your papers, memorabilia and of yourself to establish the Strom Thurmond Center for Excellence in Government and Public Service here at Clemson University. This center will enable Clemson University to carry out its mission of education and service to our state and nation. It Will also provide an enhancement of much-needed programs at our University, that being our continuing education program and our performing arts program.

I am really excited for Clemson students and future Clemson students about the significance of your gift. Now, students at Clemson, as well as people from all across the nation, can come here to study your life and our nation's government. Future generations of South Carolinians and Americans will reap great benefits from the programs of the Thurmond Center.

I think probably the greatest benefit from the Thurmond Center will be the spillover benefit to society. The center will help educate our state's school teachers so that they may better educate the state. The lecture series and adjunct professorships will stimulate the discussion of public issues. These programs will instill for future generations your high set of values, your patriotism, and your devotion to this state and nation.

The Thurmond Center will allow your public service to live for future generations for as long as there is a Clemson University. And I hope that is forever.

Senator, your life has been dedicated to public service for over 60 years. Now if service were the rent that we paid for our room here on earth, I would say that you have been a mighty good tenant. Now, on behalf of the Clemson University student body and future generations of Americans, I would like to say thank you for making the Strom Thurmond Center for Excellence in Government and Public Service possible.

Dr. ATCHLEY. I now have the very distinct privilege of introducing our distinguished guest of honor. Senator Thurmond is a personal hero of mine. He has always put country above self and principles above party. He has always believed that we are a society based on laws and deep traditions, and not just whatever happens to be the latest popular fashion. Every day, every year, by word and deed, he shows us that the important question is not, "What can somebody do for me?"—but "What can I do for myself, and for others?" He is a lifelong public servant, decorated war hero, and a family man dedicated to the values on which this nation was founded.

We are proud that he is a Clemson man and it is a great honor to have him with us this evening. I present the Honorable Strom Thurmond.

RESPONSE BY SENATOR STROM THURMOND AT THE BANQUET HIGHLIGHTING THE DONATION OF HIS PUBLIC PAPERS AND MEMORABILIA TO CLEMSON UNIVERSITY, CLEMSON, S.C., AT THE CLEMSON HOUSE, OCTOBER 29, 1981

President Atchley, President Pettigrew, Chairman McTeer, Secretary Marsh, Judge Russell, Judge Simons, Congressman Campbell, Congressman Napier, Mr. Brown, Professor Dunn, Rev. Lovette, Reverend Richardson, other distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen:

I am deeply honored by the ceremonies that have taken place here today on the campus of this great institution of higher education, my Alma Mater, Clemson University. Moreover, I am flattered and humbled by all the kind, warm and generous remarks that have been made about this Edgefield County country boy by others on this platform.

It is particularly gratifying for me to be among some of my very closest friends here tonight—friends of Clemson, friends of mine in political life, friends who have been a blessing to me, to Nancy, and our children, in all aspects of our lives. We are grateful to all of you for your advice, your support, your understanding, and we commend you for your service to your fellowman.

As I am sure most of you know, earlier today President Atchley, Chairman McTeer, and I signed an agreement providing for Clemson University to receive and preserve my public papers and memorabilia. I wish to thank Tom McTeer and all of the members of the Board of Trustees for offering space at Clemson to house this, shall we say, rather large collection of documents and material, on a temporary and permanent basis. Even more important, I express appreciation to Dr. Atchley and the Trustees for developing the concept of a Center for Excellence in Government and Public Service at Clemson, of which my papers will be a part.

I am especially grateful to President Atchley for the keen interest, vigor, diligence, and vision with which he has pursued this project. Bill and I have had a number of meetings and telephone conversations about the plans for this Center, which I am honored will bear my name, and I have been most impressed with his enthusiasm, foresight, and leadership. Certainly not to be overlooked are the extensive contributions of the faculty, staff, and students at Clemson in putting together this proposal.

From my days as a teenager to the present—I guess that covers most of this century—I have been keenly interested in Clemson College, which since 1964, has been Clemson University. One of the principal reasons why we selected Clemson as the institution to receive my papers is that this is my Alma Mater, and I feel a deep obligation to Clemson for the education and guidance that I received here early in my life.

While I cannot honestly say that I read every book in the Library during my student days here, my Clemson experience taught me the importance of scholarship, for knowledge of one's subject is a prerequisite to success in any field. Also, while I may not have been as active or successful in student government as my young friend and your Student Body President, John Pettigrew; from my participation as President of the Calhoun Literary Society, an officer in R.O.T.C. and in other activities, I did glean some measure of leadership skills. Finally, I would not rank with the best of the outstanding student athletes at Clemson today; however, competing as a member of the track and cross country teams, and in intramural wrestling and boxing, taught me the importance of physical fitness and discipline, both of which I have done my best to maintain throughout my life. By the way, congratulations to the Tigers for their many successes this fall, especially to Danny Ford and his football squad, who are currently ranked number three in the Nation, and whom I am fully expecting to meet and defeat number one Penn State in the Orange Bowl on New Year's Day.

Yes, I am grateful for the important contributions which Clemson College made to my life, and I am very proud of Clemson University today. Clemson has not only become an institution of academic excellence in many fields; it is not only known throughout the Country for the quality of basic and applied research conducted by its scientists and graduate students; it is also a great public service institution, extending the benefits of academic knowledge and research discoveries to citizens throughout our State and the Nation.

That brings me to the second key reason for my decision to donate to Clemson the papers and memorabilia associated with my career of public service. President Atchley and the Board of Trustees have offered to establish on the Clemson campus a Center for Excellence in Government and Public Service, named after me, which will consist of a Strom Thurmond Institute building housing my public papers and memorabilia, a continuing education building, and a performing arts facility. This Center, and especially the Institute, with the teaching, research, and public service programs to be conducted therein, is especially appealing to me. I am excited about the prospects for this Center, and envision possibilities for substantial and lasting benefits to the public through the various programs that are planned.

Naturally, I am pleased that the Institute building will be constructed to safely preserve the physical documents and memorabilia associated with my public service career, and to make this collection accessible to all those who wish to study, research, and make use of it, with the hope that it will be helpful to present and future generations. Through this gift to Clemson, I wish to return to the people of South Carolina and the United States, what is, in the larger sense, a portion of their historical record.

It is hoped that the University will consider transferring the papers of James F. Byrnes and Edgar A. Brown to the Institute, and also encourage other outstanding public figures to place their papers there. Walter J. Brown, who served ably as Assistant Secretary of State with James F. Byrnes, and who has been active in my various campaigns (especially the 1948 Presidential campaign and the 1954 U.S. Senate write-in effort), hopefully can be induced to augment the Institute collection with his public papers. Also, in talking with Ambassador Marion H. Smoak, former Chief of Protocol, I understand that he would consider placing his papers in the Institute. This public affairs building could become a tremendous reservoir for the accumulation of papers and memorabilia of many prominent figures.

While I will not reiterate all of the various programs which are planned as a part of the Institute, I do want to make special mention of the projected Scholars program for entering college freshmen and the summer program for outstanding high school sophomores and freshmen. Throughout my career, I have been interested in education—still very much the key to meeting the challenges ahead—and in helping worthy young persons with financial need secure post high school training. That is why some years ago I set up the Strom Thurmond Foundation with honoraria received from out-of-state speaking engagements and funds from other sources. I am pleased that the Foundation currently assists between 50 and 60 students each year with grants to help cover college expenses. That is why I have established 30 scholarships at 25 institutions of higher education, including Clemson. I see these particular Institute programs as a continuation and expansion of my efforts to further the education of young persons who must assume leadership responsibilities in the days ahead.

Complementing the Institute programs will be the planned Continuing Education facility. No matter what may be our chosen career, all of us can benefit from going back to school periodically. Given the pace of change today and the rapidity with which knowledge is expanding, those who do not exercise vigilance in keeping their minds abreast of developments will find themselves unable to cope with future challenges and problems. As an institution with public service responsibilities to the people of South Carolina, Clemson University needs a continuing education center, and I am gratified with the decision to make it an integral part of this complex.

Similarly, I am pleased that the Center will include a Performing Arts facility, which will provide opportunities for Clemson students to develop various artistic skills. Such a facility will also attract to the State talented artists of national and international acclaim, for the enjoyment and benefit of students and our citizenry.

The entire format for this Center and its programs is impressive, ambitious, and exciting. More importantly, it is envisioned that these facilities will help meet the needs of Clemson students and of the citizens of South Carolina. It is a profound honor for me to have this Center bear my name and to have included in it my papers and memorabilia. I have given my life to serving the public and helping people. In that regard, I have always felt there is no better way to help a person than to assist in his or her further training and skills development. That is the mission of this Center—to broaden and enhance the educational programs offered at Clemson University for the people of South Carolina and the Nation. It is a great personal satisfaction and high honor for me to be a part of this venture, and I stand ready to help ensure its success in every way that I can.

STROM THURMOND TESTIMONIAL DINNER BENEDICTION BY THE REVEREND JAMES T. RICHARDSON, PASTOR, FORT HILL PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF CLEMSON, S.C.

Good-bye is an abbreviated form for the words, God be with you. And that is a blessing. That is a benediction.

There is an interesting story in the Holy Scripture, the Book of Numbers. For the people of Israel are beginning their journey and Moses tells Aaron to go and say to the people, "The Lord bless you and keep you; the Lord make his face to shine upon you and be gracious to you; the Lord lift up his countenance and give you peace." That is a blessing. Now let us claim it, let us pray.

Oh God, we claim your blessing for ourselves. Not simply for the sake of the blessing itself, but so that we may be blessings to each other and to other people. Not on our own merit but simply upon your grace and because of your goodness. Amen.

NATIONAL SCOUT WEEK

(Mr. WINN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WINN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the Boy Scouts of America. This week is "National Scout Week" in celebration of the 72d anniversary of the Boy Scouts—an organization which has guided and directed the young men of our country to the goal of good citizenship. There have been 64 million Boy Scouts ever since William Boyce started the program back in 1910. Boyce was intrigued with the idea of young people cheerfully helping their fellow-humans when he visited Great Britain and was helped through a thick London fog by members of the British Boy Scouts. Lord Baden Powell began Scouting in England in 1907.

When Mr. Boyce returned to this country, he initiated the Boy Scouts of America and today, 4.5 million boys are involved. Of the 435 Members of the House, 202 were Scouts—another 51 current U.S. Senators were Scouts. Every President since Teddy Roosevelt has been a part of the Scouting experience.

The Boy Scouts of America has been a positive experience for the young of our Nation and it is my hope that it continue to grow and prosper.

PRESIDENT EXPECTS CONGRESS TO SUSPEND ITS DISBELIEF AND ACT ON FAITH

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, the President must indeed be a very spiritual man, because he certainly expects Congress to suspend its disbelief and act on faith. The fiscal year 1983 budget presented today is the second phase of his master plan to shift Federal dollars from social programs to defense. Although he is proposing a reduction of $43 billion in social programs, we are told that, "Our administration has not and will not turn its back on our elderly or needy citizens."

An even greater act of faith is required by the administration's projected deficit figures. In the next 4 years, fiscal year 1982 through fiscal year 1985, the deficits will total, according to the administration, $346 billion. But, their sums are based on such optimistic economic assumptions that we have to wonder if we are expected to take them seriously. Does the President think that we have forgotten the economic assumptions and computer manipulations used last spring to sell his miracle program of supply-side tax cuts? Indeed, the Congressional Budget Office projects a total deficit for these 4 years of $667 billion, compared to a total $1 trillion deficit in the prior history of the Nation.

The last article of faith we are asked to accept blindly is that jobs for the unemployed do exist and will be created to bring down the unemployment rate. In the midst of the most serious recession since World War II can we accept administration policies of reducing employment programs, maintaining tight monetary growth, and cutting social programs that aid the needy and unemployed? The administration has not earned such faith; Congress must act now to create additional jobs.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALEXANDER) laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
February 8, 1982.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.
The Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pursuant to the permission granted in the Rules of the House of Representatives, I have the honor to transmit a sealed envelope from The White House, received in the Clerk's Office at 12:55 p.m. on Friday, February 5, 1982 and said to contain a message from the President wherein he transmits the Eighth Special Message for Fiscal Year 1982 under the Impoundment Control Act of 1974.

With kind regards, I am,

Sincerely,

EDMUND L. HENSHAW, Jr.,
Clerk, House of Representatives.

RESCISSION PROPOSALS AND DEFERRALS OF FISCAL YEAR 1982 FUNDS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 97-140)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, I herewith report 22 rescission proposals of fiscal year 1982 funds totaling $10,655 million.

In addition, I am reporting revisions to seven deferrals previously reported, which increase the amount deferred by $768 million, as well as 14 new deferrals of funds totaling $2,334 million.

The rescission proposals affect International Development Assistance programs, and programs in the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Education, Energy, Housing and Urban Development, Labor, and Transportation as well as the Institute of Museum Services.

The deferrals affect International Security Assistance programs, and programs in the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Defense, Energy, Interior, Justice, Labor, State, and Transportation as well as the District of Columbia, the Pennsylvania Avenue Development Corporation, the Small Business Administration and the United States Railway Association.

The details of each rescission proposal and deferral are contained in the attached reports.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 5, 1982.

BUDGET OF THE U.S. GOVERNMENT, FISCAL YEAR 1983—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 97-124)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

One year ago, in my first address to the country, I went before the American people to report on the condition of our economy. It was not a happy occasion.

Inflation, interest, and unemployment rates were at painfully high levels, while real growth, job creation, new investment, personal savings, and productivity gains had virtually ceased. Our economy was staggering under the burden of excessive tax rates, double-digit inflation, runaway Government spending, counterproductive regulations, and uneven money supply growth. The economy, I declared, was in the "worst mess" in half a century.

To our great good fortune, there were many in the Congress who understood the nature of our difficulties and who rose with us to meet the challenge. Fundamental and long-overdue remedies were proposed and put in place. Together, we enacted the biggest spending and tax reductions in history. Counter-productive regulations have been swept away, and the Federal Reserve has taken action to bring excessive monetary growth under control.

The first year of the 97th Congress will be remembered for its decisive action to hold down spending and cut tax rates. Today, the question before us is whether the second year of this Congress will bring forward equal determination, courage, and wisdom. Clearly, there is a great deal more to be done.

Some seek instant relief from the economic problems we face. There is no such panacea. Our program began October 1, and it cannot solve in 4 months problems that have been building for more than 4 decades. All the quick fixes tried in the past not only failed to solve but actually aggravated our economic difficulties. They simply ensured a new cycle of boom and bust, of exaggerated hopes and eventual disappointment.

We did not promise the American people a miracle. We did promise them progress, and progress they will get.

Our goal was and remains economic recovery—the return of noninflationary and sustained prosperity. We seek a larger economic pie to provide all Americans more jobs, more after-tax income, and a better life. Quick fixes won't get us there.

What will get us there is firm resolve and unwavering adherence to the four fundamentals of our economic recovery program that I outlined to the Congress 1 year ago:

—Reducing personal and business taxes to stimulate saving, investment, work effort, and productivity.

—Reducing the growth of overall Federal spending by eliminating Federal activities that overstep the proper sphere of Federal Government responsibilities.

—Reducing the Federal regulatory burden in areas where the Federal Government intrudes unnecessarily into our private lives or interferes unnecessarily with the efficient conduct of private business or of State or local government.

—Supporting a moderate and steady monetary policy, to bring inflation under control.

At the same time, I have proposed strengthening the Nation's defenses, to restore our margin of safety and counter the Soviet military buildup

Congressional response to these proposals has been positive and gratifying. While much remains to be done, we have made a good beginning.

The Nation's fiscal policy is now firmly embarked on a new, sound, and sustainable course. For the first time in 2 decades, the destructive pattern of runaway spending, rising tax rates, and expanding budgetary commitments has been slowed, and with the cooperation of the Congress this year, will finally be broken.

—Where the growth rate of spending had soared to 17.4 percent in 1980, it is now declining dramatically—to 10.4 percent this year, and under the budget I am submitting, to 4.5 percent next year.

—Where budget growth totaled $166 billion from 1979 to 1981, spending will rise by only 60 percent of that amount from 1981 to 1983, despite cost-of-living adjustments and the needed defense buildup.

—After having reached 23 percent of GNP in 1981, the Federal Government's claim on our economy will steadily recede—to 22 percent in 1983 and to below 20 percent by 1987.

—After a decade of tax-flation in which fiscal and monetary excess fueled the unrelenting rise of prices and the automatic increase of taxes, significant tax rate reductions have been enacted. A permanent safeguard against bracket creep and Government profiteering on inflation—income tax indexing—has also been created.

—Where Government had passively tolerated the swift, continuous growth of automatic entitlements and had actively short-changed the national security, a long-overdue reordering of priorities has begun, entitlement growth is being checked, and the restoration of our defenses is underway.

This dramatic progress in reordering fiscal policy has been paralleled by a similar redirection of monetary policy. The excessive, unsustainable, and eventually ruinous growth of money and credit of the past decade has been curbed. The inflation spiral has been broken. The growth of prices is slowing down. Peoples' savings are beginning to flow out of unproductive speculation, tangible assets, and other inflation hedges back into the Nation's financial arteries where they will be available to power economic recovery, more jobs, and growing incomes and opportunities.

THE BUDGET TOTALS

[In billions of dollars]

	1981 actual	1982 estimate	1983 estimate	1984 estimate	1985 estimate
Budget receipts	599.3	626.8	666.1	723.0	796.6
Budget outlays	657.2	725.3	757.6	805.9	868.5
Surplus or deficit (−)	−57.9	−98.6	−91.5	−82.9	−71.9
Budget authority	718.4	765.5	801.9	858.0	943.5

In short, we are putting the false prosperity of overspending, easy credit, depreciating money, and financial excess behind us. A solid foundation has been laid for a sound dollar, sustained real economic growth, lasting financial stability, and noninflationary prosperity for all Americans.

We are also moving to shackle the regulatory juggernaut that burdened production, consumed jobs, and diminished productivity growth. During the past year no significant new regulatory statutes were enacted and few major new regulations were imposed. Additions to the Federal Register declined by 23,000 pages. Benefit-cost analysis was made mandatory for regulations. Dozens of existing regulations were reviewed, modified, or eliminated. Without taking into account billions of dollars of savings from regulations never formally proposed because of the changed climate our program has created, quantifiable one-time cost savings of over $3 billion and recurring annual savings of nearly $2 billion have been realized. And the effort has just begun.

A YEAR OF HISTORIC ACHIEVEMENT

These remarkable achievements are the cornerstones of our national economic recovery program. They far exceed anything that the skeptics and critics ever dreamed possible just 1 year ago. They occurred because the executive and legislative branches of our Government joined together to respond to the mandate of the American people and overcome the impediments that had paralyzed Washington for a decade. Together, we have launched a process of reform and change that can transform the course of events.

The Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 is the largest, most comprehensive, and most constructive tax bill ever adopted. With the cooperation of the Congress and support of the public, it was enacted in just 5 months. It addressed and substantially remedied most of the tax system's shortcomings and disincentives that had accumulated over decades—distortions that were imposing an increasingly heavy toll on investment, economic growth, and job creation.

—The penalty tax rate on investment income has been eliminated. By dropping the top rate from 70 to 50 percent, the attractiveness of tax shelters will be reduced and the incentives for productive investment in stocks, bonds, new business ventures, and other financial assets will be increased. Our Nation's capital will again flow to the growth of business and jobs rather than to the vendors of protection from punitive taxation.

—Marginal tax rates have been significantly lowered for the first time in two decades. The 23 percent across-the-board rate reduction will mean $183 billion in lower taxes for individuals over the first 3 years. The financial reward for savings, work effort, and new production will stop diminishing and start rising once again.

—Powerful new incentives for savings have been established. Beginning this year, 50 million workers will be eligible for the first time to set aside tax-free up to $2,000 per year for Individual Retirement Accounts. The annual limit for existing Keogh and IRA investors will also be raised. By sharply altering the incentives for saving as opposed to consumption, a huge new flow of current income will be channeled toward restoring our productivity and lifting our national savings rate from last place in the industrial world.

—The taxation of phantom corporate profits has also been significantly curtailed. The new accelerated cost recovery system will shorten depreciation periods to 5 years for machinery and 15 years for structures. This will permit fuller recovery of asset costs, a more valid accounting of taxable profits, and a reasonable after-tax return on investments for the first time in years. By eliminating the drastic under-depreciation provided in previous tax law, after-tax business cash flow will be increased by $10½ billion this year and $211 billion over the next 6 years. This growing stream of funds for modernization, new machinery, new technology, new products, and new plants will revive our lagging productivity, restore our competitiveness in world markets, and spur the steady growth of jobs, production, and real incomes.

—The confiscatory taxing of estates and inheritances has been halted as well. By raising the exemption to $600,000, by lowering the rate to 50 percent, and by removing the limits on the marital deduction, 99.7 percent of all estates will eventually be exempt from estate taxation. Hard-working American farmers, small businessmen, investors, and workers can once again be confident that the sweat, sacrifices, and accumulations of a lifetime will belong to their heirs rather than their Government.

—Government profiteering on inflation has been abolished. Beginning in 1985, the individual income tax brackets, the zero-bracket amount, and the personal exemption will be corrected annually for inflation. Bracket creep will never again systematically plunder the rewards for production and effort. Government will never again use inflation to take a rising share of the peoples' income without a vote of their representatives.

The past year's achievements on spending control and the reestablishment of budgetary discipline are no less impressive than the sweeping tax changes. For the first time ever, the Congress activated its central budgetary machinery and overcame the spending impulses of its fragmented parts. The Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 was a watershed in fiscal history—a giant step toward the restoration of fiscal discipline. By the accounting of its own Congressional Budget Office, spending will be $35 billion lower this year and about $130 billion lower over the next 3 years due to just one bill passed in only 5 months after having been considered by 30 different committees, a bill that reduced, reformed or eliminated hundreds of programs. The growth of budgetary outlays is at last being brought in line with the growth of the tax base and the national income. Excess spending commitments, unnecessary programs and overlapping activities were meaningfully addressed in the Reconciliation Act for the first time in decades.

—As a result of congressional action in 1981, the growth of entitlements will be reduced by $41 billion during the next 3 years. For the first time, eligibility standards for food stamps and student loans have been tightened. Unemployment benefits have been targeted to States where they are needed. Subsidies for non-needy students have been reduced in the school lunch program. Abuses of the medicaid, nutrition, and AFDC programs have been curtailed, saving $14.4 billion over the next 3 years. Overly generous and unaffordable twice-a-year cost-of-living adjustments for Federal retirees have been eliminated. The "uncontrollables" are being brought under control, and benefits have been retargeted where they are most needed.

—Dozens of ineffective or counterproductive programs have been eliminated or reduced. The $4 billion make-work CETA public sector jobs program was abolished. Extravagant dairy subsidies have been cut substantially. The ineffective $700 million Economic Development Administration is being phased out. The Community Services Administration has been eliminated. An unnecessary $2 billion in Government subsidies for new energy supplies and technologies has been cut. The excessively-funded impact aid program was substantially scaled back. In short, a long-overdue housecleaning of excess budgetary commitments was accomplished.

—Inappropriate Federal subsidies have been withdrawn. Legislation to return Conrail to the private sector has been enacted. The National Consumer Cooperative Bank has been privatized. Subsidies to the auto industry for new technology demonstrations have been eliminated. Operating subsidies to local mass transit systems are being phased out. Subsidies to exporters have been sharply curtailed. Subsidized disaster loans to financially viable businesses have been eliminated.

—A major stride toward rationalizing the structure, reducing the cost, and increasing State and local flexibility in the Nation's $91 billion grant-in-aid system has been enacted. Fifty-seven narrow, red-tape-ridden categorical grants programs have been replaced with 9 block grants. The pages of regulation imposed on State and local governments have been reduced from over 300 to 6, while the cost to the Federal budget has been reduced.

—Total funding for nondefense discretionary programs has been reduced. After continuous growth for two decades, the budget cost of these programs will actually decline from $137 billion in 1981 to $130 billion in 1982.

—An impressive start at reducing fraud, waste, abuse, and unnecessary Government overhead was made. The President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency, established to coordinate a Government-wide attack on fraud and waste, saved $2 billion in the last 6 months of 1981 alone. A comprehensive effort to collect $33 billion in delinquent debts has been launched and will recover $1.5 billion in 1982 and $4.0 billion in 1983. These estimates include recoveries of delinquent taxes due to the Internal Revenue Service. Federal nondefense employment has been reduced by 35,000 since January 1981. The cost of Government travel, publications, and consultants has been reduced substantially.

At the same time that the Congress joined in these long-overdue efforts to pare back the size of the Federal budget and slow its momentum of growth, it has fully supported our ambitious but essential plan to rebuild our national defense. A year ago every component of military strength was flashing warning lights of neglect, under-investment, and deteriorating capability. Today, health is being restored.

—Pervasive deficiencies in readiness—including too many units not ready for combat, too many weapons systems out of commission, too few people with critical combat skills, and too few planes and ships fully capable of their missions—are being corrected. Funds for operations and maintenance, including training and aircraft flying hours, have been boosted. Backlogs of combat equipment needing repair are being eliminated. Adequate supplies of spare parts necessary to support high operating rates for training, as well as to provide war reserves, are being purchased.

—The serious inadequacy in pay and benefits that threatened the all-volunteer force, caused an exodus of skilled personnel, and sapped morale throughout the armed services has been corrected. Last year's 14.3 percent pay increase has improved recruit quality, boosted reenlistment rates, stopped the drain of critical skills, and contributed to the dramatic revival of morale in our military services. End-strength goals are now being exceeded. In addition, the percentage of recruits with higher test scores has risen in the past year.

—Critical investments in conventional and strategic force modernization are now moving rapidly forward. A new bomber for early deployment and an advanced (Stealth) bomber for the 1990's have been approved to retain our capability to penetrate Soviet air defenses. Development of a new, larger, and more accurate MX missile to preserve our land-based deterrent is proceeding. A 5-year shipbuilding program including 133 new ships and a total investment of $96 billion—double the 5-year program of the previous administration—has been launched. Rapid production of new combat systems including the M-1 Abrams tank, the AV-8B Marine Corps attack aircraft and the F/A-18 Navy tactical fighter have been approved. Improvements in our airlift and sealift forces to transport equipment and soldiers rapidly to counter military aggression anywhere in the world, are moving forward.

NO TIME TO RETREAT

These achievements of the first year truly constitute a new beginning. In every major dimension of national strength and well-being we have launched the redirection of policy that was so desperately needed and so long overdue. We are ending the destructive inflation and the financial disorder built up over a decade. We have removed the yoke of over-taxation from our workers and our business enterprises. We have begun to dismantle the regulatory straitjacket that impeded our commerce and sapped our prosperity. And we have reversed the dangerous erosion of our military capabilities.

The task before us now is a different one, but no less crucial. Our task is to persevere; to stay the course; to shun retreat; to weather the temporary dislocations and pressures that must inevitably accompany the restoration of national economic, fiscal, and military health.

The correction of previous fiscal and monetary excesses has come too late to avert an unwelcome, painful, albeit temporary business slump. In the months ahead there will be temptation to resort to pump-priming and spending stimulus programs. Such efforts have failed in the past, are not needed now, and must be resisted at every turn. Our program for permanent economic recovery is already in place. Artificial stimulants will undermine that program, not reinforce it.

Likewise, previous excesses in money and credit growth have resulted in financial strain in many regions and sectors of our national economy. The adjustment to lower inflation and a more moderate money and credit policy did not come soon enough to avoid interest rates and unemployment far higher than we would like, and that we are working to reduce. But these effects are temporary. They cannot be remedied by a return to rapid, unsustainable expansion of Federal spending and money growth, which would drive inflation and interest rates to new highs. Our hard-won gains in reducing inflation must be preserved and extended—because permanent reduction of interest rates and unemployment is impossible if the fight against inflation is abandoned, just when it is being won.

Similarly, our budget deficits will be large because of the current recession, and because it is impossible in a short period of time to correct the mistakes of decades. But our incentive-minded tax policy and our security-based defense programs are right and necessary for long-run peace and prosperity, and must not be tampered with in a vain attempt to cure deficits in the short-run. The answer to deficits is economic growth and indefatigable efforts to control spending and borrowing. These principles we dare not abandon.

THE DEFICIT PROBLEM: ITS ORIGINS

Despite the new course we have charted and the gains we have achieved, the voices of doubt, retreat, and rejection are beginning to rise. They conveniently forget that the present business slump was not caused by our program but is the result of the accumulated burdens of past policy errors, which we have taken action to redress. They fail to comprehend that our spending cuts and tax reductions were not designed to redistribute the output of a stagnant economy, but to revive the economy's growth and to increase its size—for the jobless as well as the affluent, for those who aspire to get ahead as well as those who have already arrived.

Increasingly, the larger budget deficits that we unavoidably face are offered as evidence that our entire course should be recharted. The matter of budget deficits, therefore, must be addressed squarely. We must fully comprehend why they have grown from our original projections, why they may remain with us for some time to come, what dangers they pose if not vigorously combated and what steps we can and must take to steadily reduce their size and drain on our available savings.

Our original plan called for a balanced budget in 1984. Balance is no longer achievable in 1984, but the factors that have postponed its realization are neither permanent nor cause for abandoning the goal of eventually living within our means.

In the near term, the most important setback to our budgetary timetable is the recession now underway. During 1982, receipts will decline by $31 billion and outlays rise by $8 billion due to the falloff of business activity and the increase of unemployment-related payments. This factor alone accounts for nearly all of the difference between the $45 billion 1982 deficit we projected last year and our current estimate of $98.6 billion.

While the recession will end before this fiscal year is over, its budgetary impact will spill over for many years into the future. It will take time for the unemployment rate to come down and safety net payments to diminish. The growth of receipts will recover, but not at the levels previously projected. This will add billions to deficits for 1983 and 1984.

The second major factor widening the deficit projection is interest payments on our trillion dollar debt. Here we are being penalized doubly for the misguided policies of the past.

The discredited philosophy of spend and spend, borrow and borrow, saddled us with a permanent debt burden of staggering dimensions. This year's interest payment of $83 billion exceeds the size of the entire Federal budget as recently as 1958.

In addition, past fiscal, monetary, and credit excesses have resulted in temporarily high interest rates—rates that will come down, but only as inflation abates, private and public financing practices adjust, and long-term confidence rebuilds. Since market confidence has been so badly shaken by runaway inflation and interest rates in the past 3 years, it is apparent that interest rates over the next several years will fall less rapidly than we had originally anticipated. Between the huge inherited base of national debt, the higher interest rates, and the large prospective additions to the national debt in the next several years, our total debt service costs will rise substantially.

Interest payments on the debt will exceed our original projections by $18 billion in 1982, $32 billion in 1983, and $182 billion over 1982-86 taken as a whole. The interest rate/debt service factor, then, constitutes a major source of the setback to our budget timetable. But let us be clear about its origins: it arises primarily from a legacy of past excesses, not from a shortfall in our current budget control efforts, nor from a flaw in our overall program.

The third and most important factor contributing to the growth in deficit projections is quite simply the ironic by-product of our rapid and decisive success in bringing down the rate of inflation. Our economic forecast last February projected a 9.5 percent inflation rate in calendar year 1981 and a further decline to 7.7 percent in 1982. This projection was scorned by many as too rosy just 1 year ago. Yet the actual inflation rate in 1981 turned out to be lower than our projection, and the inflation decline this year and next year almost certainly will exceed our earlier projections.

This is welcome news to every American and we have adjusted our inflation forecast accordingly. But lower rates of price increase also mean lower inflation components in wages and incomes and a reduced flow of inflation-swollen tax receipts to the Treasury.

This point is not merely academic. Over the next 5 years, our forecast projects a 9.9 percent average rate of growth in nominal GNP reflecting a steady fall of inflation to about 4½ percent by 1987. If nominal GNP growth were just 2 percent higher each year, reflecting a continuation of higher inflation, Federal receipts would be enlarged by the staggering sum of $353 billion over the 5 years. On paper, at least, the budget would be nearly balanced in 1987 rather than more than $50 billion in deficit.

But if the last decade offers any lesson, it is that we cannot inflate our way to budget balance. Indeed, every budget from 1975 forward projected a balanced budget 2 years into the future and growing surpluses in the out-years. Not one of these surpluses materialized for a very compelling reason: the monetary excesses needed to finance inflationary growth of wages and incomes are the enemy of savings, investment, real economic growth, and fundamental business confidence and financial stability. They lead to the kind of pervasive economic breakdown that we experienced during 1979-81—a breakdown that swells Government spending, interrupts the flow of receipts, and causes prospective budgetary surpluses to vanish in a flow of red ink.

Thus, we cannot and will not pursue the will-o'-the-wisp of reflation nor the phantom of future budget surpluses premised on a continuance of high inflation.

Instead, we must recognize that for a period of time, success in our unyielding battle against inflation will appear to work against our goal of a balanced budget. Thus, while our current revenues will reflect the decline of inflation today, part of our current outlays will reflect the higher rates of inflation in years past. This is especially true in the case of some $249 billion in indexed programs. Generally, the inflation rate used to adjust indexed benefits lags a year or more behind the current payment period. During 1983, for example, an inflation rate of 6.5 percent is projected, but cost-of-living adjustments to social security and other program benefits will be 8.1 percent based largely on the actual inflation experience of 1981. Much the same is true of the $96.4 billion in debt service for 1983. Some part of that will reflect the higher cost of debt securities issued in 1980-82 when inflation and interest rates will have been higher than is now projected for 1983.

Thus, the conquest of inflation will contribute to budgetary imbalance for some years to come. But these deficits will prove manageable if we understand why we have them and redouble our efforts to reduce them.

The final factor contributing to the worsening of the deficit outlook is that all of the budget savings we had planned for last year were not actually achieved. Most importantly, our plan to ensure the short- and long-run solvency of social security was discarded by the Congress. In an effort to eliminate partisanship and facilitate movement toward a constructive solution, our reform proposal has been withdrawn in favor of a bipartisan commission charged with developing a plan to rescue the social security system by next fall. I am confident that the commission will do just that, but in the meanwhile our outlay projections must be increased by $6 billion in 1983 and $18 billion for 1987.

Likewise, the Congress failed to adopt all of the reforms we proposed for medicaid, guaranteed student loans, food stamps and other entitlements. Without further action, about $4 billion would be added to the 1983 deficit in these areas alone. While major and unprecedented action was taken to curb the growth of entitlements last year, the shortfall is still substantial. Entitlement reforms not acted upon by the Congress last year will add nearly $20 billion to the deficit over the next 3 years. When this is combined with substantial added outlays for farm subsidies and for discretionary programs that were not reformed, it is clear that the task of budget control is far from complete.

THE BUDGET DEFICIT IN PERSPECTIVE

Taken together, the effects of recession, higher interest rates, declining inflation, and incomplete congressional action will mean high, continuing, and troublesome Federal budget deficits. Constant vigilance and relentless efforts to pare back future spending and borrowing will be imperative to ensure that they are not permitted to worsen and add further pressure to financial markets and interest rates.

Nevertheless, three features of these high deficit numbers must not be lost sight of even as we seek eventually to eliminate them.

First, even the 1982 deficit of $98.6 billion is not unprecedented in the context of a recession and recovery cycle. Relative to the present size of the U.S. economy, the budget deficit would have been $94 billion for 1975, followed by deficits of $139 billion, $91 billion and $97 billion in the next 3 years, respectively.

Second, these deficits reflect the excess spending commitments of past rather than new spending programs with potential to grow in the future. That means that by remaining firm in our efforts to reduce waste and excess, reform entitlements, reduce low priority spending, and gradually return domestic programs back to State and local governments, the gap between spending subject to firm fiscal discipline and revenues being lifted by steady economic expansion will gradually diminish.

Finally, the share of GNP taken in taxes will be substantially lower and the incentives for savings markedly stronger. This expansion of the total savings supply will increase our capacity to absorb deficits and give us additional time to work toward their elimination.

$239 BILLION DEFICIT REDUCTION PLAN

The prospect of high deficits during the transition to strong economic growth and low inflation contains a profound warning: any relaxation of our budget control efforts, any backsliding to spending politics as usual, any retreat to time-worn excuses about "uncontrollables"—that results in spending growth significantly above our projections, will mean a serious threat to the progress of our entire economic recovery program. There is precious little margin for shirking or diluting the task the American people have charged us with. That task is nothing less than a constant, comprehensive, ceaseless search for ways to reduce the size of Government and the future growth of its spending.

The 1983 budget I am presenting to the Congress faithfully adheres to that mandate. If all proposed measures are adopted, the prospective deficit will be reduced by $56 billion next year, $84 billion in 1984, and $99 billion in 1985. In short, the budget this year represents much more than simply a tabulation of accounts or a compilation of spending decisions, large and small. Instead, it represents a far-reaching, resourceful, and integrated blueprint for reducing the prospective deficit by $239 billion over the next 3 years. It is a bold action plan that, if faithfully implemented, can cut the prospective deficits over that period by nearly 50 percent.

Our plan for deficit reduction consists of five parts. It addresses each area of the budget where actions to reduce the gap between spending and revenues are possible and desirable.

The first area concerns nonsocial security entitlements. Despite the heartening progress we made toward reform last year, the cost of these automatic spending programs will rise to $201 billion in 1983 without further action. This figure compares to only $119 billion in 1979.

Thus, our 1983 budget proposals continue the objective set out previously: to reduce the swift growth of automatic entitlements while preserving benefits for the truly needy. If acted upon fully by the Congress, these new reform measures will save $12 billion next year and $52 billion over the next 3 years. They include new steps to tighten eligibility, reduce errors and abuse and curtail unwarranted benefits in the welfare, medical, and nutrition programs. The explosive growth of medical programs—16.7% per year since 1978—will be contained with tighter reimbursement standards for providers, modest copayment requirements for medicaid beneficiaries, and, later in the year, a comprehensive plan to reform the health care reimbursement system and provide new cost control incentives for all participants. We have also proposed measures to target guaranteed student loans better to those with financial need and to limit the cost growth of Federal military and civilian retirement programs.

Nevertheless, let me be clear on this point. Our administration has not and will not turn its back on our elderly or needy citizens. Under our new budget, funding for social insurance programs will be more than double the amount spent only 6 years ago. For example, the Federal Government will subsidize 95 million meals every day. That is one of every seven of all meals served in America. Headstart, senior nutrition programs, and child welfare programs will not be cut from the levels we proposed last year.

The second component of our deficit reduction plan covers domestic discretionary and other programs for purposes ranging from agricultural research to housing subsidies and manpower training. Our proposed savings here total $14 billion next year and $76 billion over the next 3 years.

These savings measures involve two essential principles. First, where programs are unnecessary, can be better targeted or can be significantly streamlined, we have proposed substantial reductions. Our proposals to convert the fragmented and wasteful CETA training program to a block grant, to target low-income energy assistance to the colder States where it is needed, to combine the WIC program with the child and maternal health block grant, and to further reduce subsidies to business for energy technology development and commercialization are all examples of this principle.

The other principle governing discretionary programs is that we have generally not provided inflation allowances for them. This will provide a powerful incentive to reduce overhead, waste, and low-priority activities and ensure that the money we spend for many worthwhile purposes in the areas of education, transportation, community development, and research is utilized in the most efficient and productive manner possible. Our deficit problem is simply too severe to permit business as usual to continue any longer.

The third component of the deficit reduction program involves user fees, or more appropriately, the recovery of costs borne by the taxpayers generally, but that predominantly benefit a limited group of businesses, communities or individuals. Total savings would amount to $2.5 billion in 1983 and $10 billion over the next 3 years.

While the Congress made great strides on most of our proposed budget cuts last year, the user fees proposals were a noticeable and disappointing departure from this pattern. The case for action now is even stronger than it was last year. With sacrifices required of almost every beneficiary of Federal programs, it is simply inexcusable and intolerable that yacht owners escape without paying even a small part of the Coast Guard services; or that commercial and general aviation are not paying the cost of the air traffic control system that ensures their safety; or that ship and barge operators do not pay a fair share of the costs of waterways maintained by the Federal Government. Our user fee package corrects these and similar shortcomings in current budget policy and will contribute significantly toward reducing the deficit.

The fourth part of the plan is aimed at the executive branch and the most inexcusable of all forms of spending: lax management, the toleration of fraud and abuse, the failure to recover debts owed the Government or to dispose of properties it does not need, and outdated, inefficient, procurement practices.

Our fiscal plan has always assumed that our new management would take hold, and that savings would be possible in areas we have simply never looked at before. After 1 year, our new management team has indeed taken hold, the results to date have been impressive, and our plans for future savings are bold and far-reaching. All told, these efforts will reduce the budget deficit by $20 billion next year and $68 billion over the next 3 years.

We will collect the debts we are owed and the taxes we are due. New legislation will be needed in some cases, but much of these savings will flow from tighter, more aggressive management throughout executive branch agencies.

Likewise, we will move systematically to reduce the vast Federal holdings of surplus land and real property. It is estimated that the Federal Government owns approximately 775 million acres, and 405,000 buildings, covering about 2.6 billion square feet. Some of this real property is not in use and would be of greater value to society if transferred to the private sector. During the next 3 years we will save $9 billion by shedding these unnecessary properties while fully protecting and preserving our national parks, forests, wildernesses and scenic areas.

Our management efforts will also be directed toward the more cost-effective procurement of the goods and services required by the Federal Government. The changes we seek will increase competition for the Government's business, reduce and simplify paperwork and regulations, and develop better standards for our procurement processes and personnel. Over time these efforts will yield large outyear savings not included in the budget totals.

Finally, our emphasis thus far has been on reducing excessive tax rates and shrinking the Government's take from the paychecks of workers and the profits of business. On that principle we will not waver. But that does not mean unintended loopholes should go uncorrected, that obsolete tax incentives should be continued, or that profitable business should not contribute at least some minimum fair share to the cost of financing Government. Thus, our deficit reduction plan includes $34 billion over the next 3 years in additional receipts from new initiatives in these areas.

About one-third of this total is attributable to our proposal to strengthen the minimum corporate tax, and a substantial share of the other tax revisions will also affect business. In every case, these measures involve the collection of a tax that is owed now or that was intended by the Congress, or elimination of incentives that are no longer needed due to the sweeping reform of business taxation contained in the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981.

These new proposals will have no adverse impact on our economic recovery program, are fair and equitable, and will contribute significantly to the reduction of future deficits.

CONTINUING THE RESTORATION OF NATIONAL DEFENSE

Our 1983 budget plan continues the effort begun last year to strengthen our military posture in four primary areas: strategic forces, combat readiness, force mobility, and general purpose forces.

A thorough 8-month review of U.S. strategic forces and objectives preceded my decision this past October to strengthen our strategic forces. The review found that the relative imbalance with the Soviet Union will be at its worst in the mid-1980's and hence needs to be addressed quickly. It also concluded that the multiple protective structure basing proposal for MX did not provide long-term survivability since the Soviets could counter it (at about the same cost) by simply deploying more warheads.

In addition, our review pointed to serious deficiencies in force survivability, endurance, and the capability to exercise command and control during nuclear war. Current communications and warning systems were found to be vulnerable to severe disruption from an attack of very modest scale.

The 1983 budget funds programs to correct these deficiencies. The 1983 strategic program of $23.1 billion, an increase of $6.9 billion over 1982, provides for both near-term improvements and longer-term programs. These initiatives include:

—Early deployment of cruise missiles on existing bombers and attack submarines.

—Acquisition of a new bomber (the B-1B) and development of advanced technology (Stealth) bomber for deployment in the 1990's to provide a continued capability to penetrate Soviet defenses.

—Development and procurement of a new, larger, and more accurate land-based missile, the MX.

—Continued deployment of Trident ballistic missile submarines to strengthen the sea-based leg of our strategic deterrent.

Longer term programs include: development of a survivable deployment plan for the MX missile, development of a new submarine-launched ballistic missile, continued improvements in the survivability of warning and communications systems, and improvements in strategic defenses against both bomber and missile attacks.

The 1983 budget provides $114.3 billion in operations and military personnel costs, an increase of over $13 billion from the 1982 level to improve the combat readiness of our forces.

Today a major conflict involving the United States could occur without adequate time to upgrade U.S. force readiness. Our concerns with military readiness reflect both the long lead time required to procure sophisticated equipment (both parts and finished equipment) and past failures to provide adequate peacetime support for combat units. We cannot wait for a period of rising tensions before bringing forces up to combat readiness.

My program will continue to bolster combat readiness by increasing training, operating rates, and equipment support. There will be increased aircraft flying hours and supply inventories. In addition, backlogs of combat equipment and real property awaiting maintenance will be reduced. Also, the 1983 budget will provide levels of military compensation that will improve the readiness and capability of the All Volunteer Force.

Current U.S. mobility forces cannot move the required combat or combat support units fast enough to counter effectively military aggression in Europe, Korea, or in the Southwest Asia/Persian Gulf region. For example, at present only a small light combat force could be moved rapidly to the Southwest Asia region. Major mobility shortages include wide-body military cargo aircraft; fast logistics ships; and prepositioned ships and associated support equipment. Elimination of these shortages is an essential first step toward improving U.S. military capability during the first 30 days after the beginning of a crisis.

The 1983 budget provides $4.4 billion for:

—Initial procurement of a fleet of improved C-5 cargo aircraft, and additional KC-10A tanker/cargo aircraft that will double our wide-bodied military airlift capability by the 1990's.

—Continued upgrading of existing C-5A aircraft to extend their effectiveness beyond the year 2000.

—Conversion of four additional fast logistic ships that will provide the capability to move heavy combat forces rapidly.

—Chartering a fleet of supply ships that can be stationed with equipment and supplies in Southwest Asia to reduce the time required for deployment of heavy forces.

In the last decade, the Soviet Union introduced large quantities of highly capable, new-generation tactical equipment including combat ships, tanks, and aircraft, which must be countered by modernized U.S. forces. Also, the traditional U.S. superiority in system quality has been considerably narrowed, making Soviet quantitative advantages more serious. The Soviet military force buildup has increased the risk that they may rely on military power to support their foreign policy goals. For the United States to maintain, in concert with our allies, sufficient conventional forces to deter potential aggression, our forces must be provided with adequate numbers of new, modern tactical equipment.

My 1983 budget includes $106.2 billion for general purpose forces—including both operations and investment—an $18 billion increase over 1982. A key initiative is an expanded shipbuilding program. The United States, dependent on open seas for commerce and military resupply, must have the naval capability to maintain control of vital sealanes. While our naval forces have declined from the mid-1960's, the Soviets have in existence or under construction eight new classes of submarines and eight new classes of major surface warships, including nuclear-powered cruisers and new aircraft carriers.

The budget provides an $18.6 billion shipbuilding program including full funding for two nuclear-powered aircraft carriers, to be constructed during 1983-87. Other ships included in my 1983 program are three large cruisers equipped with an advanced air defense system; two nuclear-powered attack submarines; two frigates for convoy protection and four mine countermeasure ships to improve fleet capability to operate in mined waters. My longer term objective is to increase the deployable battle force from 513 ships in 1982 to over 600 by the end of the decade.

In addition, the budget provides for increased production of ground and tactical Air Force weapons. Production rates will be increased for a variety of new systems such as the M-1 Abrams tank, light armored vehicles, and the AV-8B Marine Corps attack aircraft.

All of this will be done with a major reform of the acquisition process and vastly improved management of defense operations, which will save $51 billion by 1987. In a continuing fight against fraud, waste, and inefficiency, the Secretary of Defense has appointed an Assistant for Review and Oversight and a Council on Integrity and Management Improvement.

REVITALIZATION OF AMERICAN FEDERALISM

The Constitution provides clear distinctions between the roles of the Federal Government and of the States and localities. In their wisdom, our Founding Fathers provided for considerable flexibility so that in following centuries these responsibilities could be adapted to new conditions. But in recent years we have not adapted well to new conditions. We have created confusion as to who is responsible for what. During the past 20 years, what had been a classic division of functions between the Federal Government and the States and localities has become a confused mess. Traditional understandings about the roles of each level of government have been violated.

Governments at all levels have had and will continue to face various problems. But, as Governor of California, I learned that a problem in one part of the country does not automatically mean that we need a new Federal program in all 50 States. Yet that is what has happened.

In 1964, total Federal grants to State and local governments were $10 billion. By 1980, total Federal grants to States and localities exceeded $90 billion, meaning that 18 percent of Federal tax receipts were being passed through to States and localities for one reason or another. However, these funds were not passed through entirely benignly. Attached to them were Federal rules, mandates, and requirements. This massive Federal grant-making system has distorted State and local decisions and usurped State and local functions.

I propose that over the coming years we clean up this mess. I am proposing a major effort to restore American federalism. This transition over nearly 10 years will give States and localities the time they need to plan for themselves when and how to meet State and local needs that are now being met with Federal Government funds. My proposal will also make available to the States and localities the tax resources that would otherwise fund these programs by the Federal Government.

In coming weeks, we will have intensive discussions with local and State officials, the Congress, and many others to hammer out a proposal I will soon send to the Congress. Essentially, I believe the Federal Government should assume full responsibility for the medicaid program which assures adequate health care for the poor. In contrast, financial assistance to the poor is a legitimate responsibility of States and localities. I am proposing, therefore, that the aid to families with dependent children (AFDC) and food stamp programs be turned over to the States. This swap will clarify responsibilities substantially because these programs will become the clear responsibility of one level of government or another. That responsibility is now mixed.

In addition, I propose that more than 40 current grant-in-aid programs costing the Federal Government about $30 billion a year be turned back to the States and localities, along with the funds to pay for them. During the period 1984–87, these programs will be funded by a specially designated set of taxes to be used exclusively for financing this transition program. These taxes will be deposited in a fund that will belong to the States. Each State will be able to make its own decision on how rapidly to phase out the turnback programs. This is because each State will have two options: it may use its share of the federalism trust fund to reimburse Federal agencies for continuing to carry out turnback programs, or it may ask that the programs be terminated and then use the funds directly for whatever purposes it desires.

Beginning in 1987, the federalism trust fund will gradually be dissolved and the tax sources themselves will be made available to the States.

The key to this program is that the States and localities make the critical choices. They have the time to make them in an orderly way. A major sorting out of Federal, State and local responsibilities will occur, and the Federal presence and intervention in State and local affairs will gradually diminish.

CONCLUSION

While some administration proposals have been turned down, turned aside, or compromised by the Congress, the overall assessment of the past year's action on the budget is heartening. Cooperation, support, goodwill, and a genuine sense of national purpose have enabled us to make significant progress in setting the Federal Government's affairs in order and America on the road to economic recovery.

I urge the Congress to approach the new, or renewed, proposals in this budget in the same spirit and with the same goodwill as it did my proposals of a year ago. Much has been accomplished. This budget proposes that more be done.

The proposals set forth in this budget will not be accepted readily. They are a second challenging installment of a politically difficult, yet necessary, program. In their specifics, these proposals will undoubtedly be altered by the Congress. The general direction we must travel, however, is clear. I urge the Congress to weigh these budget proposals thoughtfully, and to join me, and my administration, in a constructive effort to curb the growth of Federal spending and to provide for the Nation's security. We must, in the end, roll up our sleeves, face our responsibilities squarely, and persevere at the unending task of setting, and keeping, the Nation's affairs in order.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON RULES TO FILE CERTAIN PRIVILEGED REPORTS

Mrs. CHISHOLM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight tonight to file certain privileged reports.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I take this reservation to inquire of the gentlewoman from New York as to the extent of this request.

Mrs. CHISHOLM. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, the Committee on Rules is not scheduled to meet on today, but we may have to meet in an emergency session in order to consider rules on certain supplemental appropriation bills.

Mr. LUNGREN. Is it my understanding that this request will be limited to those four supplemental bills that are on the schedule for action this week?

Mrs. CHISHOLM. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LUNGREN. And no others?

Mrs. CHISHOLM. And no others, just the four supplemental bills.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman from New York, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY TO FILE COMMITTEE REPORT ON H.R. 746, REGULATORY PROCEDURE ACT OF 1981

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to file its committee report on the bill (H.R. 746) to amend the Administrative Procedure Act to make regulations more cost effective, to insure review of rules, to improve regulatory planning and management, to enhance public participation in the regulatory process, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

THE NEW DEFENSE BUDGET

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. EDWARDS) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I would like to spend just a little time today talking about the defense part of the budget. A lot has already been said generally about the budget; a lot has already been said about defense. A lot of people have already been quoted ad nauseam in the newspapers and on television, and now that we officially have the budget today, I thought it might be useful to at least comment in a general way on some of the areas that are involved and some of the things that we will be confronted with.

Mr. Speaker, the budget numbers for defense are massive, and there is a natural tendency, I think, to immediately recoil and say, "Well, we can't spend that kind of money. That is too big an increase; that is too big a jump over last year and the year before." What I would like to suggest to the Members today is that we be very cautious about moving in that vein until we have a better understanding of what is involved in the defense budget and what we can expect over the year to come.

The fiscal year 1983 budget in total obligational authority calls for some $258 billion to be obligated and spend over a period of time. This is obviously something in excess of the outlays proposed. I will discuss outlays in a moment, but I need to set the stage here for these numbers.

The $258 billion is that part of the budget for total obligational authority that will be spent through the Department of Defense appropriation bills. In addition to that, there is about $5.5 billion that will be taken through the Energy Department for the nuclear part of the military effort, and then also in the budget there is about $2.3 billion in supplementals for fiscal year 1982 to pick up programs that were either not funded or where the Defense Department feels there is some urgency. In addition to that, there is some $5.4 billion coming in pay supplementals for fiscal year 1982 which we have already authorized. So we are talking in terms of some $271 billion all throughout this budget that has come to us.

Now, I should point out to the Members that of the $258 billion in TOA, $4.2 billion is what we call contingency funds, and that is basically in there to account for the fiscal year 1983 pay supplemental that we know will be coming along later. There is contingency in here for that. Also there is in there some $8.2 billion which falls under the heading of military construction and will be considered by the Military Construction Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations. That gets down to about $245.6 billion, which will be before the Defense Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, the subcommittee on which I am honored to serve. Those are the numbers that we will be basically dealing with during the coming year.

Mr. Speaker, during my remarks I will put in certain charts that will bear on what I am saying here today. At this point I will include one of those charts, one entitled "Department of Defense Budget Financial Summary." This chart shows comparative figures in then-year dollars for major program elements, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE BUDGET FINANCIAL SUMMARY [1]

[In billions of dollars]

Appropriation title	Current dollars total obligational authority—Fiscal years—
	1981	1982	1983	Change 1982–83
Military personnel	36.7	43.0	47.9	4.9
Retired pay	13.7	15.0	16.5	1.5
Operation and maintenance	55.2	63.0	70.4	7.4

Total military functions	176.1	214.2	258.0	43.7

[1] This chart shows comparative figures in then-year dollars for major program elements.

Note.—Totals may not add due to rounding.

Mr. Speaker, why such a massive defense bill? Why in this time of high budget deficits and cutbacks in domestic programs are we talking about massive increases in defense?

The quick answer to that question is that we find ourselves in a posture of having to play catchup ball. We simply have not done the things we should have done concerning readiness and concerning procurement and R. & D. over the long haul that would allow us to keep up with the progress that the Soviet Union has been making over the years.

I should point out to the Members that when we come to the House with a defense bill or with a budget from the President, this thing is laid out in the open for everybody to see. The papers, the TV, and the radio all over the country have been playing up the fact that we have this massive defense budget, and in many ways in the next week they will play up the fact of what is in that defense budget down to almost the smallest detail. So our people are caught up in this whole thing and you are either for defense or you are against it or you are concerned about where we are going, and we forget the fact that in the Soviet Union we do not see their defense budget. We do not know in fact how many rubles they are spending for defense. The average person on the street is not treated to what the Soviets have been doing over the last 10 or 15 years as they started to rebuild their war machinery.

So in effect we are dealing in a vacuum with numbers on our side that are all out there for the people to see, and in many ways they are staggering and horrifying when we think about the size of those numbers.

On the other hand, we are dealing with Soviet numbers that are invisible and with weapons systems that, as far as the American people are concerned, are invisible.

So we will be coming to the Members later this year with a defense bill based on this budget, and I wish that the Members and those who will read or hear what I have to say will ponder on this effort to try to compare what we are doing in the open and what the other side is doing so very quietly and unknown really to the average American in this country.

Well, what is the message in all of this? What can we expect to happen in this House Chamber in the months to come as far as defense is concerned? We hear our more liberal Members say that it is too high and we should cut back. Our more liberal Members all of a sudden are concerned about the budget deficits, and there is a new feeling we are all experiencing here among our liberal Members because we have not heard a whole lot from them in the past about the budget deficits; but now it is important. and that is an excuse for cutting back, we are told, on the defense part of the budget.

Strangely, we are also hearing from some of our more conservative Members who are also concerned and have been over the years about the budget deficits. They are also saying, "Well, when you are talking in terms of a $90 billion budget deficit, maybe we should also at this time look at defense."

My point here is that most assuredly, and probably more than in recent memory, every Member in this Chamber is going to be looking at this defense budget. Every Member is going to be considering whether in fact there is some place where we can cut that defense budget.

What I would like to be able to do later this year when we come to the floor with the defense bill is to try to say to the Members of this House and to the people of this country that we in fact have come to you with a bill that can be justified, a bill that you can support, and a bill that you will not feel the need to start whacking away at on the floor of the House.

How can we succeed in that? First, I feel very comfortable in the fact that the Secretary of Defense is making a clear effort internally in the Pentagon to clean up his own budget. We are told by the Secretary of Defense that in fact the budget that is before us today for defense has been scrubbed more than budgets in the past have ever been scrubbed in the Pentagon.

Mr. Speaker, at this point in the RECORD I will include two documents from the Pentagon having to do with the question of what steps the Secretary of Defense and his folks over there have taken to scrub this budget before it ever came to the Congress. Those documents are as follows:

ECONOMY AND EFFICIENCY IN THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Secretary of Defense Weinberger today announced details of actions taken to save the Department of Defense more than $51 billion by 1987. At the same time he announced that further savings would have to be identified to cut outlays by another $10 billion.

Last March savings were targeted at $31 billion through 1986. Specific actions announced today mean that Defense has already exceeded that target by $10 billion and will save another $10 billion in fiscal year 1987. The additional $10 billion targeted outlay savings will be converted to specifics during the Department's continuing and concerted drive against fraud, waste and inefficiency.

While savings include DoD's share of government-wide retired pay reform and restraints on Civil Service compensation, the Secretary's announcement emphasized the $20 billion savings already tied to specific results of major reform of the acquisition process and vastly improved management of Defense operations.

The fight against inefficiency, waste, and fraud is a concerted action. An Assistant for Review and Oversight, a Council on Integrity and Management Improvement and the Secretary's personal Performance Reviews have been added to focus efforts and ensure that they are followed up. However, cost reduction is an integral part of the Defense management process and the budgets and programs it produces. The Fiscal Year 1983 Budget and the accompanying outyear program reflect that emphasis in programs excluded or curtailed, in programs to be executed more efficiently, and in more realistic estimates of what specific programs will cost.

The following table is a summary of the savings already achieved or specifically programmed.

TOA

[In billions of dollars]

	Fiscal year 1981	Fiscal year 1982	Fiscal year 1983	Fiscal year 1984	Fiscal year 1985	Fiscal year 1986	Fiscal year subtotal	Fiscal year 1987	Fiscal year total
Pay adjustment	.1	2.1	4.0	5.1	5.9	6.5	23.7	7.1	30.8
Acquisition	.2	1.3	2.4	2.8	2.1	3.3	12.1	1.7	13.8
Operations	.3	.9	1.0	1.1	1.1	1.2	5.6	1.3	6.9
Total	.5	4.3	7.4	9.0	9.1	11.0	41.4	10.1	51.5

Compensation savings reflect: (1) a cap on Civil Service pay increases at 5.0 percent compared to the unrestrained application of comparability surveys, (2) once a year cost-of-living increases in lieu of semiannual increases, and (3) reversal of military retirement system reforms proposed by the previous Administration that would have cost more in the near-term in order to realize some economies in the long-term. The $23.7 billion through fiscal year 1986 compares to $17.1 billion projected last March.

Acquisition Initiatives: The Department currently projects specific acquisitions savings of $12.1 billion through fiscal year 1986, up $4.7 billion since last March, climbing to $13.8 billion through fiscal year 1987. These savings result primarily from the successful application of many of the 32 acquisition initiatives directed by Deputy Secretary Carlucci. Some of the initiatives that produced major savings include: (1) $1.1 billion from multiyear procurement, (2) $2.3 billion from more economical production rates, (3) about $300 million in productivity from investment in new capital equipment, (4) $1.4 billion from procurement of lower cost systems, and (5) $6 billion from marginal programs. Enclosures give additional detail. These are net savings estimates covering the period fiscal year 1981—fiscal year 1987. There is a strong possibility that the acquisition savings will be even higher when the full impact of these acquisition initiatives comes into play.

An important acquisition reform is the policy of budgeting to "most likely cost", including realistic estimates of inflation. This could reduce the cost overruns which erode cost control discipline and the nation's confidence in defense management. The fiscal year 1983 budget thus includes many increases over earlier estimates for the same programs. It is important that these be understood not as higher costs of systems but as (1) the up-front acknowledgement of costs that would otherwise appear as overruns, or (2) as added costs now to produce overall savings later. These include the full funding of economical production rates and economic order quantities associated with multiyear procurement. The latter produce large unexpended balances, and it is time to recognize those balances as the result of sound fiscal policy. They do not reflect an inability to execute programs. They add nothing to defense spending or federal borrowing. Rather they are the measure of congressional support for a stable, efficiently managed acquisition program.

Operations Initiatives: In March, the Department projected six-year savings of $5.3 billion from reductions in travel and consulting services; from contracting and from more efficient use of personnel, facilities and equipment. Current data indicate that operations savings will exceed the fiscal year 1982 target by over $600 million and by nearly $400 million in fiscal year 1983. This is the result of the strong direction being given by top managment and the new emphasis on economy and efficiency being pushed by the Military Departments themselves. Each has initiated its own Service-wide campaign to eliminate waste and reduce costs. This success may lead to a re-evaluation of the long range targets; in the meantime the Department must insure that those savings are realized so that Defense programs in the budget are not threatened.

A few examples of the types of operations savings achieved or programed are: (Amounts are FY 1981-97).

Restriction of administrative travel reduced costs by more than $500 million.

Consultant services and contract management studies have been drastically reduced, saving $1.6 billion. This area will continue to receive close scrutiny to avoid unnecessary expenditures.

Over $200 million has been saved on the purchase of equipment and audiovisual activities.

Good progress is being made in consolidating base support functions rather than have neighboring bases duplicate support organizations. Budgets and financial plans have been reduced over $200 million. The activities involved will be announced when detailed plans and impact analyses have been evaluated.

Changes in advertising and recruitment methods and other increases in productivity and efficiency measures, including better utilization of computers and other equipment will result in a savings of more than $500.

THE CAMPAIGN FOR EFFICIENCY AND INTEGRITY

Among the management improvements Secretary Weinberger initiated since taking office, the most important in terms of immediate dollar savings include: (1) a complete overhaul and streamlining of the Defense acquisition process; (2) major improvements in the Planning, Programing and Budgeting System; (3) strengthening of audit resolution and follow-up procedures; (4) establishment of a DoD Council on Integrity and Management Improvement; (5) closer monitoring of program execution through establishment of the Secretary's Performance Review Program; and (6) establishment of a new Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for Review and Oversight (ATSD/R&O) to focus efforts against fraud, waste and abuse.

Since the ATSD(R&O) was appointed in May, he has launched a multifaceted campaign to focus the efforts of auditors, inspectors and investigators on the war against fraud, waste and mismanagement. This campaign will: (1) strengthen the role of DoD and GAO auditors in their assessment of defense programs; (2) ensure that all audit recommendations are carefully considered; (3) follow up to see that agreed-upon recommendations are actually implemented; (4) establish instances of fraud and "white collar" crime as a top priority of the investigative community, and (5) establish a Hot Line to elicit the aid of the public in the battle for integrity and efficiency. Improvements in all these areas will continue to be made.

In the last year, the Department has overhauled the Planning, Programing, Budgeting, Acquisition and Auditing systems, set savings targets and established follow-up procedures to insure that targets are reached.

In addition to its own actions, the Department has examined scores of suggestions and recommendations received from the General Accounting Office, the Congressional Budget Office, the House Republican Study Committee, various Congressional Task Forces and individual members of Congress on ways to save Defense dollars. While many of those duplicate initiatives already undertaken by DoD, others have been incorporated into management initiatives and the budget.

SUMMARY

To summarize, the Department is steadily advancing against inefficiency on a broad front. There is reason to be proud of progress made up to now; more remains to be done. The Department is committed to continuing these efforts and pursuing every opportunity available to insure that the rearming of America is accomplished efficiently and economically.

□ 1245

Mr. Speaker, the documents that have just been made a part of the RECORD speak for themselves and I do not propose to go into detail on those documents at this point other than to simply say that Members should study what is in here.

One of these documents, for example, sets out some 60 programs that the Pentagon either reduced or eliminated before the budget ever came to the Congress. I think those who would tend to be critical or those who want to know as much as possible about this defense budget should study what the Pentagon has done before the budget came to us.

Point 2, it seems to me that our Subcommittee on Defense and our full Appropriations Committee, when it brings the bill to the floor, simply must, this year more than ever, bring a credible bill to this floor that we can support.

That means, Mr. Speaker, in my view, that we have to look at every item in there that we can find the time to look at. We have to make some hard decisions and we have to consider whether this weapons system or that expenditure or this R. & D. effort makes sense and can be justified as far as the taxpayers of this country are concerned.

So when we come to the floor later this year it would be my hope that we will bring a credible bill and one that will, therefore, foreclose efforts on perhaps what we might call across-the-board kinds of cuts that would be unreasoned and in many cases unjustified under the circumstances. So I will be doing all I can to see that we do, in fact, bring a credible bill to the floor.

So if we come with a clear, new effort on the part of the Pentagon to scrub this budget, and if we come with a clear effort on the part of our committee to do the best we can to weed out waste, fraud, and abuse, and duplication and all of the other things that frequently get into bills of this magnitude, then it would be my hope that we can get the President's basic defense bill through the Congress in a way that will be meaningful, in a way that will seriously provide for the defense of this country and in a way that will say to the Soviet Union and all others here interested that this country does have a strong resolve to see that we are going to defend this Nation and see to peace and freedom in the world.

Mr. Speaker, the question always is raised: Where do these cuts come from? The President has sent a good budget over here, we believe. We are asked: Where will you make cuts? How will you impact on outlays this year? If you are talking about a $90-billion-plus deficit, what could you do in the defense bill to make meaningful cuts that really impact on that budget deficit?

The truth is that the only real place in the normal defense bill, and it will be true in this case, that one can make immediate cuts that impact on outlays in fiscal 1983 are in those very areas where we desperately need to spend the money: Readiness, O. & M., military personnel, those kinds of dollars that are spent quickly and spent to keep the readiness rate of this country militarily up to the top peak. So if we cannot and should not make large cuts in those areas, then we have to start looking at other areas.

I would like at this point to put into the RECORD, by unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, a two-page paper prepared by Mr. George F. Allen, the very able minority staff member who works with us on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, which clearly sets out the areas that are impacted by outlays, the areas that would be impacted by cuts that might be proposed in one part of this bill or another. The document is as follows:

To: Mr. Edwards of Alabama.

From: George F. Allen (Minority Staff, 5–9886).

Subject: 1983 Defense Outlays as an impact on deficit.

Date: 8 February.

Clearly, efforts will be made from all sides to reduce the size of the 1983 Federal deficit. Defense, obviously, is a prime target for these efforts.

However, it should be noted that only 68 percent of the 1983 Defense budget is outlayed in 1983, and this varies by account.

For example, Military Personnel funds in 1983 spend out at a rate of 97 percent during the year. Thus, of the $47.9 billion for Mil Pers requested in 1983, $46.5 billion will be a 1983 outlay.

On the other hand, shipbuilding funds requested in 1983 ($18.6 billion) will spend at a 5 percent rate in 1983, and procurement other than shipbuilding spends at a 14 percent rate during the year.

The following is a summary by title of TOA requested and the spendout rate for 1983 of those funds:

O. & M	70.4	57.0	81
SCN	18.6	.8	5
Procurement (other than shipbuilding)	71.0	9.9	14
R.D.T. & E	24.3	14.3	59

The same is true of military construction:

[Dollars in billions]

	Requested in 1983	Outlay in 1983	Percent outlay in 1983
Mil Con	$5.4	$0.8	14
Family housing	2.8	1.7	61

In summary, if Defense is to be used as a means to reduce the 1983 deficit, the targets within Defense to accomplish an outlay reduction are obvious.

For all practical purposes, a dollar cut in Personnel or retirement is a dollar cut in the deficit. A dollar cut in O. & M. is an 80¢ cut from the deficit.

But a dollar cut in shipbuilding is only a 5¢ cut from the deficit.

Thus, the targets for cuts which will impact greatest on the deficit are, in order of impact:

	Percent
Retired pay	99
Military personnel	97
O. & M	81
Family housing	61
R.D.T. & E	59
Procurement (other than shipbuilding)	14
Mil Con	14
Shipbuilding	5

In other words, Members seeking to make a significant impact on the 1983 deficit by reducing Defense are virtually forced to look at programs affecting people (retirees, mil pers, housing) and readiness and operating accounts (O. & M.).

To look elsewhere for even modest deficit impact will require massive cuts in the request, impacting little in 1983 but with significant impact in the out years.

I would like to just quickly run down one column that appears in this paper. In military personnel, $47.9 billion has been requested. The cuts there would be 97 percent taken in 1983. So that is an easy place to get money, but it is the very wrong place and a difficult place to try to get money.

Retired pay, 99 percent of the cut would come right out of 1983. O. & M., 81 percent of the cut would come right out of outlays in 1983.

But when we come to ship construction, Navy—perhaps my colleagues will recall there are two new carriers in here and there are two new attack submarines, and I believe two Tridents are in here as well—then any dollars we cut would only impact to the extent of 5 percent in fiscal 1983.

Therefore, decisions in that regard have to be made on a more long-range basis and not on what one might save just in fiscal 1983 but whether, in fact, we need this ship or that group of ships or these planes or that group of planes.

Procurement, other than shipbuilding in 1983, the outlay impact would only be some 14 percent. R. & D. impacts at about 59 percent.

So the point I am trying to make here is that we just cannot say we are going to cut defense by $10 billion or $5 billion and have it all of a sudden impact on the deficit in fiscal 1983. If we, in fact, do that, then we are going to tend to cut right at the heart of the readiness that is so important to this country.

So what I would like to suggest is that our committee spend great time on this, more on this kind of detail than we have ever done before, and that when we come to the floor with a bill, and we propose some cuts, as I am quite certain we will do, that they are cuts that are well reasoned, that they take into consideration the need for a ready military, and that they at the same time take into consideration whether there is duplication, whether there are things that we really do not need, whether cost overruns, and there are a lot of them in the military, really should bring about the cancellation of certain items of hardware that are being proposed. These are the kinds of things that we will be working on, and I hope that all Members will withhold early judgment, will not get too much in a box on attempting to find all of the answers to the problems of the budget deficit in the military construction part of the bill and in the defense portion of the bill which comes under our subcommittee. We simply have to move forward on defense. We simply have to do those things that are necessary, and it is hurting. We are talking about a lot of dollars. But I will tell my colleagues if we do not do an adequate job the dollars we are talking about now will pale into insignificance in the years to come.

So it is important that we not get carried away and try to balance the budget or reduce the deficit to any major extent by gutting the defense budget.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding because I want to thank him for what was a very useful statement. I look forward to looking over the documentation the gentleman has provided for his statement in the RECORD because I think it does help set forth some of the items of the debate that are going to have to take place in the defense budget and the need to maintain the kind of defense readiness that this country must have to face the challenge of the Soviet Union.

The thing that strikes me about all of this discussion on the budget, particularly in the initial days here and particularly as it relates to the defense budget, is we have heard a lot of criticism from the other side but they have not shed very much light on what their alternatives might be.

I heard one of the distinguished Members from the opposition party on television this morning, and he is regarded as one of their budgetary experts, suggesting that what we ought to do is just freeze the 1983 levels at the 1982 levels for everything. The whole budget should be frozen at the 1982 level. I just wonder, given the gentleman's statement, whether or not he could comment on what that would mean to our ability to maintain defense readiness.

Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama. In round numbers and without going into specific detail, it would mean about $43 billion less for defense in areas where we desperately need to be doing some catching up. It is the meat ax, across-the-board kind of approach that my whole speech here today is aimed at trying to head off. If we can do a proper job in our committee so that we can come to the floor and say to the Members, "Do not offer across-the-board kind of cuts, we have made reasoned cuts where they can be justified," then I would think our committee has done a good day's work.

I realize that may be dreaming to a degree, but anyone who is in politics has to be something of a dreamer.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman would yield further, I thank the gentleman for his statement because I think it points out the problem with formulating budgets. When there is no alternative, and apparently the other side has no alternative, they tend to come in with this kind of thing that would be absolutely devastating to our defense readiness.

What they are talking about is really cutting the foundations out from underneath defense when they make that kind of proposal.

I think the gentleman's figures show very clearly that that is not an approach that we can afford to take, and I thank the gentleman.

Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GONZALEZ. First let me say I thank the gentleman for taking the time very early here and explaining. I think he is rendering a great service.

I have a question with relation to one aspect of our defense policy in the outlays for its conduct. It is very difficult to get precise figures and, therefore, what I have read have seemed to be almost contradictory. There is a variation of figures and it has to do with that general aspect that we call the allocation of our defense funds for the defense of Europe.

Is there any specific or concise or near precise figure or estimate that we can derive with some certainty of accuracy as to what our apportionment is for that very important part of our defense posture?

Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama. The answer is generally yes. We can give the gentleman numbers that would apply to our part in the defense of the NATO countries, of which we are one.

But it is not so easy that one can just draw a line and box it in because we have troops and we have weapons systems and other things here in this country that are available and would move at a moment's notice should war break out in the NATO countries and yet they are not sitting in Europe. So one cannot say they are not part of the defense of NATO.

So we can give the gentleman some broad outlines of what is spent there, but it would be a little hard to do it if the gentleman requires information as to what is back here that can be available there.

□ 1300

Mr. GONZALEZ. I remember some years ago I had occasion to visit our Army installations, for example, in Germany, and the then NATO headquarters, which was then in Paris, this was before France's withdrawal, in management, and there used to be a budgetary category for the direct outlay, for instance, for the support of our personnel and their dependents and all, say, in Germany,

And also at that time the West German Government was contributing a certain amount of money for the purpose of the sustenance of our personnel and all.

I understand, and I do not know and that is why I am asking the question, that that is no longer true, that there is no contribution direct or indirect from, say, such countries as Germany or the others, where we have actual personnel physically there and dedicated for the defense of that area of the world.

I really do not know because I have not seen any authoritative source saying that is no longer true or it still is, maybe in some other form, but like it was in 1964.

Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama. If the gentleman would allow, of course, they do not pay our troops, but many of the countries we are in—I think most of the countries we are in—make clear contributions in the form of bases, basing rights, and other services that they provide and so again the answer is that there is a contribution, it is not always that easy to identify, but it is always based on agreements, and I guess there must be someone in the Pentagon who can dig out the numbers. I cannot give the gentleman the numbers today.

Mr. GONZALEZ. I understand and I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia, a very able member of the Armed Services Committee and much brighter than I am when it comes to this sort of thing.

Mr. BRINKLEY. The gentleman is very generous and quite modest about his own ability.

I would like to respond briefly to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER), who impugns just a shade the majority party in support of all men of good will toward a strong healthy national Defense Establishment.

Just today, the Armed Services Committee has under review the procurement items for the Navy and for the Marine Corps, and this will continue throughout the spring, and I assure the gentleman that the majority party will do that which is in the best interests of this country.

The gentleman from Texas raises a very good point. About 3 years ago there was an excess of $50 billion in direct costs associated with NATO. This does not count the indirect costs which run much more than that.

As chairman of the military construction authorizing subcommittee, I wish to tell the gentleman that there will be important initiatives this year in housing and in the basic amenities for the men and women in our armed services, which we concede to be extremely vital toward retention and toward recruitment.

Further, there are important civil defense initiatives that are being made this year. So this we believe is a turning point toward parity with the Soviet Union, which is important to our national life. It is expensive, but it does pale into insignificance if we compare it with the cost of a war. That is exactly what we seek to avoid.

A strong defense is a strong companion to peace, and I thank the gentleman for his contribution today.

Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama. I thank the gentleman, and I think it does not need to be said, but perhaps it would be well to say, that when we think in terms of expenditures of this country in NATO, or in connection with NATO, we must remember that we are a NATO country and we have a vital interest in what goes on over there, and we are not sending our troops over there just to defend Germany or England or somebody else, we have a clear vital interest over there and the expenditures that we have to come up with in that regard, as the gentleman from Georgia suggests, pale into insignificance if one thinks in terms of comparable figures to fight a war.

And so we must maintain that strength and it is expensive but the alternative would be unacceptable.

THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. LUNGREN) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, as we have had the news of the President's 1983 budget fiscal program, I guess just about every Member has received inquiries from the press. Statements are beginning to appear as to the congressional response to that budget. I was approached by a number of members of the press and they all started out their questions, "It appears that the President's budget is being met by anger on the Hill, and do you share that anger?"

My response is that I am certainly not angry about the size of the deficits, but I am hopeful that those of us in Congress will be able to take what the President has given us, follow the general thrust of his program, and work with him to bring the deficits down.

I say that because there have been comments from any number of Members suggesting that somehow this President ought to be criticized for creating this year's deficit and for the deficits he acknowledges that we will have over the next 3 years.

At the same time, many of those same people appear to be suggesting that the President's proposed cuts are either unnecessary, unwise or too large.

So we are left in a situation where the President is criticized on the one hand for bringing us a budget which would only increase spending over the present year by 4½ percent, but at the same time being held responsible for the fact that he is not cutting enough. Then again he is being criticized for cutting to much.

It seems that we ought to keep our eye on the most essential point—a point that is constantly made by Dr. Milton Friedman. He has suggested that the real problem of the Federal Government with respect to its impact on the national economy is the total take from the private sector created by the Federal Government.

By that he means that you have to add up both the deficit side and the tax side to see what the total is. Of course, that total adds up to what the total spending of the Federal Government is. And it is the Federal Government's spending, set against the total economic worth of the private sector of the United States, that tells the tale.

For some to suggest that all we ought to do is to postpone the third year of the tax cut or increase the taxes, which is another way of saying get rid of the tax cut that we put into place, rather than work on the spending side, is wrong. I would suggest that what they are doing is prescribing for us the same medicine that we followed in the previous administration, one which led us to double-digit inflation 2 years in a row, the highest rates of inflation that we had over a 4-year period in recent history, the highest rates of inflation we had in the peacetime history of the United States, where we had double-digit inflation 2 years in a row, this for the first time in the history of the peacetime of the United States. The interest rates were the highest that we have ever had in the United States since the Civil War. So we had both of those things. We had basically the essentials of stagflation. We had a sluggish economy and we had high inflation.

If we are to return to those days, I think the onus is on those who would criticize this administration for their program to show us why, going back to what they did over the previous 4 years, the results would be any different than what we found then.

I think if this thought can be capsulized in the following way.

I am not prepared, nor could I in any real sense be prepared to guarantee the American people, or the Members of this House, that if we follow the President's programs we will have economic prosperity in this country. And I am convinced we will. I think his programs make logical sense. But I am prepared to suggest that if we follow the old business-as-usual approach of this House, and the previous administration—I can guarantee that we will have economic failure because that is what in fact we had at the end of the last administration's attempts to do that.

So as we go into the next few months, particularly the next few weeks, and we analyze the President's program, I think it behooves us to suggest not only where we think where he has fallen short, if we indeed think he has fallen short, but I think the onus is on those in the Congress who would criticize, to come up with a better plan.

If we happen to think that the spending is out of line, we ought to show where we are willing to make cuts. If we, on the other hand, think we ought to increase the revenues of the Federal Government in the short term, we ought to be willing to show where we are going to tax the American taxpayer more.

I have gone home to my district over the last several months and had town hall meetings, and one question I always ask is, "Would anybody who believes he or she is undertaxed please raise your hand." I have yet to have one person raise their hand. And I am not just talking about going into the more affluent areas of my district. I am talking about going into the blue collar areas of my district, the retirement areas of my district, the areas where we have the average working men and women of the district. They do not think that the Federal Government has undertaxed them over the last few years, nor do they think that they are being presently undertaxed. They feel very strongly that they are being overtaxed. We at least had shown them some light at the end of the tunnel by enacting a 3-year tax program that assisted individuals so that they could plan for their own lives and their families over the next few years.

It is interesting that about 6 weeks ago a number of us on this side of the aisle went over to see the President, in support of a bill authored by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) and cosponsored by any number of us, that would accelerate the tax cuts by about 6 months. This bill would move those going into effect in July of this year ahead to January. And those the following year would have been accelerated 6 months. And we suggested that this ought to be done for a number of reasons, chief of which was the fact of the unemployment problem that is facing us at this time.

And it does not matter whether you are a Keynesian economist or a supply-side economist or a traditional Republican or a new Republican economist, whether you are on the Democratic side or on the Republican side. All economists seem to feel and to conclude that the best way to get the economy moving and to create more jobs in this country is to have more tax cuts rather than less, and to, in fact, accelerate the tax cuts.

And now I am pleased somewhat, and cheered by the fact that leading Members of the other side of the aisle are now starting to talk about an acceleration of the tax cuts. I saw one of the gentlemen from the Democratic side in the other body appearing on one of the national news programs yesterday in which he said we have to do this. But he is "hooking" something on to that. He is saying we will accelerate the tax cut for this year, but in return for that we will either postpone or outright kill the third phase of the tax cut for the individual citizens of America.

I find that interesting because that is one of the problems that the President posed to use when we were in the White House 6 weeks ago. He said that he would like to have tax cuts of a greater nature than we passed in this House last year, but he was afraid if we had a bill that was seriously considered to accelerate the tax cuts, it would become a vehicle for increasing taxes in one way or another. Make no mistake about it, cutting out the tax cuts that we have in the third phase of the individual taxes is a tax increase. It is a tax increase because the net effect of inflation is to throw people into higher tax brackets (bracket creep). In addition the increases in social security tax are just being felt by our people back home.

As they look at their check this month they will see they are paying a higher rate on their bases for social security tax. As the year goes along, they will find that more of their income is exposed to the social security tax. When you take those things in combination you discover it is not until the third year of the tax cut that the average American citizen is going to save something, from what otherwise will be taken by the Federal Government.

Now we hear it is good to accelerate the tax cuts for 6 months as long as we discontinue the program we already voted for last year, and cancel the third year reduction (the only year that really gives relief to the American taxpayer).

I think that is a tragedy. Somehow we are saying, to quote the President, "that it has a different impact on the economy if we take from the people back home from their earnings, bring it here to Washington and spend it in the economy, rather than if they save it at home and spend it themselves."

Somehow we think that the best and brightest are still here. Maybe we have not learned from the Vietnam experience. They may be here but they may not make the best decisions. They may not be any more sincere than people back home. In fact, I think they are not. They have no exclusive claim to virtue in Washington, D.C. That is not to denigrate the people here. It is just to suggest we are all part of this country and many people in our constituencies can do a better job of spending and investing their own money, saving their own money, helping their own communities, and helping their neighbors when they are in need, than can we here in Washington, D.C.

As someone said recently, the whole expression "trickle down theory of economics" has been one that has been hung around our neck oftentimes—those of us who are supporters of supply-side economics—I do not think there is any greater example of the trickle down theory of economics than the thought that you can tax somebody in Hawaiian Gardens, Calif., which I happen to represent, send their money to Washington, D.C., have it filtered through our bureaucracy here, and somehow hope that some of that money is going to trickle down to their needy neighbors next door, across the street, down in the next block or even in the next community.

Someone did a study not too long ago in which they divided all of the money we spend on social programs to help the needy by the number of needy in our country. It came out that for every family of four below the poverty line, we could give them a direct grant of $32,000 from the Federal Treasury.

Now, anyone who has gone out and talked to the needy in their localities know that we are not giving $32,000 to every family of four below the poverty line. So where is that money going? It is here. It is in the bureaucracy in Washington, D.C., as we try and figure out how we can best help them with our grandiose social programs, as we have tried over the last 10 or 15 years.

The fact of the matter is that the people are beginning to learn that it makes more sense to keep that money back home and try to help their neighbors in their home community.

So I think, as we are asked by members of the media over the next few weeks, whether we are angry with the President's proposal or whether we are disappointed with the President's proposal, that we ought not just to say, "Well, yes, I am not real happy with this program." We ought to be put on the spot, we ought to discipline ourselves and say, "Well, I may not agree with that part of his program, but here is my suggestion: If we are not going to cut where he suggests we cut, I am going to cut somewhere else." Because we all know, that this is an election year. It is therefore particularly difficult for us to approach the challenge the President is giving us, which is to look at the entitlement programs of this country. These are the entitlement programs which we call the uncontrollables, about which we say, when we go back home: "Well, look, over half of the Federal budget is uncontrollable. You cannot hold us responsible for excess spending. I mean, we are just elected as Congressmen and Congresswomen, I mean we are just Senators, we have these uncontrollables."

The fact of the matter is, I think we have to do something about addressing it. I do not like addressing it any more than anyone else does, and I am sure the President does not like addressing it any more than anyone else does. But if we are going to continue to fool ourselves by saying that we cannot bring Government spending under control, then I think we might as well pack up and go home, tell our constituents that Congress and the White House are unable to deal with these problems. We should just admit that these programs have grown beyond our capacity to control them. Let us recognize that the system has a life of its own and tell people back home that we have failed in terms of representative government.

But we cannot do that if we truly care about this country.

We have got to do something in the near future about spending, about entitlement programs, about so-called uncontrollables. And we have got to do it in a way which does not confuse nor frighten the American people. That is our obligation. I think it is a very serious obligation, a heavy burden that we have. We ought to attempt to work with this administration to deal with it.

I doubt, unless you have the specter of back to back years of $100 billion deficits, one piled on another, that you are going to have the circumstances, the environment, the pressure to build on the Congress to face up to some of these issues.

In that way, I think that, as much as I do not like to talk about $100 billion deficits or $91 billion deficits, in the long run it may prove to be beneficial. It may force us to look at some issues that we would prefer to ignore and, particularly, to look at those issues in an election year.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNGREN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I would like to thank him for his statement and also express my delight at seeing the number of people from the opposition side talking about acceleration of the tax cuts for this year in order to get the economic engine chugging along again.

I think that it is interesting that they should come forward, some of them, with that proposal, because that in itself is an admission that they were wrong last year. Had Reaganomics been allowed to work, as the President originally proposed, we might not have had the recession in the first place. We would have had inflation, by January 1 of this year, a 20 percent real tax cut for the American people, and we would not be faced with beginning a year with a tremendous recession. And now we do hear people, who are recognizing that in fact a tax cut moved from July to January will begin to get us moving again, get economic growth started. It would have some real positive impact on the budget.

I share with the gentleman his concern about those deficits. Those deficits are absolutely unacceptable in the President's budget, in any budget that we pass. But I think we also have to look at where those deficits are coming from. Those deficits are coming from the fact that you have a stagnant economy, you have an economy which is not doing anything at the present time except draining down on Federal Government revenues. You have people unemployed who are drawing unemployment benefits, you have people who are not paying taxes, you have businesses that are not paying taxes. Every point of unemployment is costing the Federal Government some $26 billion.

So we have a tremendous problem that is directly related to the recession. If you can get the economy growing again and get it growing faster, you will begin to bring down the deficits very rapidly. And that is what the accelerated tax cut is all about. It is not just a case of giving back some money to the American people. It is also getting our own economic house in order here, because it would allow us to put people back to work, to make businesses profitable again, and do all of the things that will permit this economy to move forward in a way that you can bring down those huge Federal deficits.

I think that maybe there are a few people on the other side who are beginning to recognize the wisdom of that. Although I must say that I also have some problems, as the gentleman does, about the fact that they also couple that with the fact that, come next year, we will cancel that tax cut, or we will postpone that tax cut.

What that is really saying is, we are going to allow the economy to get moving a little bit this year, but when we get to next year we are going to shut it down again. You know, a herky-jerky kind of policy that we have seen for 4 years of the Carter administration and which some people on the other side would want to impose on us again.

I think it is extremely important that we move up the tax cut next year, too, so that as you get your economic recovery started, it is sustained throughout the next year and you have a real chance, as I say, of bringing down the deficits.

I think the gentleman's point about reducing the rate of growth of Government spending is also important. He pointed out the figures about how much money we spend for poor people in this country. It is absolutely correct. If you take and divide out how much money is in the budget presently being spent on poor people, it comes to $200 billion a year. By the latest Government statistics, you have 25 million poor people in this country.

That is $8,000 for every poor person that we are spending. That is $32,000 for a family of four.

If you figure out how much money they are actually getting in goods and services, you find it comes out to between $10,000 and $12,000. That means that we are spending some $20,000 or $22,000 either in delivering the money to them or delivering the services to them, or we are spending it for people who are nonpoor, in other words, people whose eligiblity for these programs is questionable.

For the President to be proposing some reforms in the system to help bring down not the $10,000 or $12,000 that we are spending on the truly needy—good heavens, they need that money—but to bring down the amount of money that is being spent in that $22,000 of delivery costs, I think is extremely responsible for the President to be proposing those kinds of spending cuts. I think it is exactly the kind of thing that we have needed for a long time, instead of just pouring money out, without any idea of how it was going to end up really helping the needy people of this country.

So I think if you would combine a program that asks that we put the country back to work again by accelerating the economy and accelerating the tax cuts, and also we begin to cut the rate of growth the Government is spending by real responsible reforms in how you deliver that money, we in fact would have the kind of an economic policy that the American people have been crying for.

I am glad to see that the President maintains those basic tenets in his budget, even though, like the gentleman, I find the problem of the deficit a very, very troubling one, and I think the deficits are entirely too high. But I also think that we need a response from the other side, the people who are being so critical, because they have no program, they are telling us day after day, as their critics go on television, as we see them talking, they have no program. Some people are talking about deferring tax cuts, some people are talking about accelerating tax cuts. Some people are talking about balancing the budget, other people do not even go along with the spending cuts that the President has proposed.

So they have no policy. I think it is high time, as critics, if they are going to be as critical as they have been of the President's program, that they develop a program of their own that could be examined by the American people and by some of us on this side. I think their program would come up very wanting, too, because, as the gentleman points out, when they had their chance for 4 years, it proved to be an economic disaster.

One more point I think needs to be added, as well. There was recently a study put out by the E. F. Hutton Co. The E. F. Hutton Co. has shown that the present recessionary problems that we are faced with are not a development that took place as a result of the policies of this administration. In fact, they are an extension of a recession that was begun in 1978 by precisely the kinds of policies that the last administration followed and which led us to the present day.

So we faced with a situation that has been growing for some years that you need to take corrective action on. I think that the President is moving toward taking those corrective steps. I hope this Congress will support him.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman's contribution. Sometimes we sound like voices in the wilderness. I hope we have attracted the attention of some of the leaders on the other side of the aisle. I suppose that is what the gentleman had in mind when he quoted E. F. Hutton, because we know what happens when E. F. Hutton speaks.

I would just say, with respect to one point, that there has been waste in the social programs, I think columnist George Will did as good a job as anybody I have seen in explaining what this President is attempting to do. He said that this President is not destroying the New Deal, rather he is trying to save the New Deal, much in the same way that the people on the other side of the aisle said for years that F. D. R. was not trying to destroy capitalism, he was trying to save it. In effect they were arguing that he was trying to save us from the excesses of some participants in the capitalist system.

And I think that is very true. The President is not talking about dismantling the New Deal. He is talking about reining in and cutting back on some of the things that we did in our excesses during the Great Society. I think that is fundamental to understanding this President. To those who would criticize this President as being more interested in the weapons of war than the poor of this country, I ask, did they consider John Kennedy to be a warmonger? Did they consider John Kennedy to be unfeeling? Did they consider John Kennedy, the great Democractic President, to somehow have his priorities askew?

Because if you go back and you look at the last budget of the Kennedy administration and compare it with the present budget, you will see that the percentages of the Federal budget going to defense versus domestic programs were in almost reverse order from what they are now. We were spending far more on defense than we were on domestic programs. And with this President's proposal, even for 1983, we will be closer to a reversal of those percentages than we would be to the priorities of the John Kennedy administration. I am not suggesting in any way that President Kennedy's administration was inappropriate for his time or that somehow he was making an effort to balance the budget on the backs of the downtrodden. But I would suggest to those who would be so quick to criticize what this President is doing that they need a little sense of history.

One of the problems we have in this institution, particularly because we run for office every 2 years, is that our frame of reference is rather short. I am not saying that in a way of criticism; I am saying that as a statement of fact. And sometimes I think we ought to sit down and take a longer look at our problems and possible solutions.

And, last, Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude—with just a brief statement on supply-side economics that is at the base of what the President is trying to do. There has been a lot of confusion, a lot of mysticism, a lot of words written about what supply-side-economics are and how they work.

I think we ought to recognize that the basis of supply-side economics is an understanding, an appreciation and an acceptance of human nature.

What do I mean by that? I mean, simply, that supply-side economics operates on the proposition that people will respond differently to incentives than they do to disincentives. According to this analysis it should not therefore surprise us that, when you tax something more, you probably are going to produce less of it, and if you subsidize something a little more, you are probably going to produce a little more of it. And in this way, we ought not to be surprised that the economy did not respond as fast as many of us wished it would and that the President suggested it would when he ran for the Presidency. This is because the economic program we were allowed to put in place was somewhat different than what he originally presented. Most importantly, the difference is found in the change of the effective dates for the tax cuts. It should not surprise us, when you set up a system whereby the real tax cuts are going to take place in this calendar year, that individuals are going to try to place as many of the deductions as possible in the previous year and as much of their income as possible into this year. Why? Because it makes sense. They save more money that way. They are not tax dodgers. They are following the system.

And from the standpoint of how we arrange for the tax cut to go into effect, it should not surprise us that we did not have a tremendous reversal in October, November, and December, when most of the tax cuts going into effect will actually be in this current year.

So, in summary, I think we should say that for those who would join us—and there are many conscientious people on the other side of the aisle who supported us in our efforts to get the tax cut program through, to accelerate the tax cut—let us get on with the business of accelerating the tax cut in order to get more jobs created in this country. I think that ought to be bipartisan. We ought to all join in that effort. And let us not confuse the issue by trying to do something in the third year of the tax cut in return for us giving taxpayers of this country a break early this year.

□ 1330

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yeild?

Mr. LUNGREN. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BRINKLEY. I say with some pride that the former President, President Carter, resides in my district in Georgia, the Third Congressional District of Georgia. I should like to inquire of the gentleman if he was aware that in the last year of his term of office that the Carter administration had the largest peacetime defense budget in the history of this Nation?

Mr. LUNGREN. We did increase the defense in the last year of the Carter administration.

Mr. BRINKLEY. As a matter of fact, it was the very largest in the history of the country of a peacetime budget.

Mr. LUNGREN. I would be happy to admit to the gentleman that the last year of the Carter budget was a significant increase, particularly over the previous several years because of the lack of spending that we had dedicated to defense in the previous 3 years of the Carter budget.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LUNGREN. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. BRINKLEY. The record of the Carter administration also is clear with reference to deficits. During the 4 years he served in office, of course, his deficit record was nothing like the $100 billion projected for fiscal year 1983.

Mr. LUNGREN. Well, I would say to the gentleman that as a percentage of gross national product, it was larger; in fact, the largest back-to-back deficits in the history of the United States we got from the Carter administration. In the last year that we just went through, of course, the gentleman recognizes that it was through a reconciliation program thrust upon us by the Reagan administration, that we cut back on some of the spending requirements that would have been imposed by the Carter budget and in that sense we would have had an even higher deficit than we just experienced.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Of course, the differential would be related to the tax bill. I would like to say to the gentleman that I do support his philosophy in that regard and the gentleman's opinion.

The fact is that if we do relieve the American people of some of the tax burden, there will be private spending in lieu of Government spending. This is something to which we do subscribe mutually.

Mr. LUNGREN. Private savings, particularly, that would allow spending in the private sector.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Exactly, and many of the representatives from my district of the country have long supported the philosophy that the Government which is closest to the people governs best. It is true because you can identify the problems more readily. You can apply the resources more specifically and, therefore, most of us do support the Reagan initiatives of returning functions to the States and to the localities.

Mr. LUNGREN. I thank the gentleman for that statement. I hope that he will be joined by many Members on his side of the aisle in a good faith effort for us to follow the leadership of the President and sort out what levels of government handle best what levels of functions and services. We have not done that in 25 years in this country. I think this President should be applauded for such an effort and should not be criticized, as he has by some, by saying that it is merely diversionary.

I thank the gentleman for his comments in support of the tax cut that we had this last year. I hope he will join us in an acceleration of tax cuts this year so that we can get on with the job of creating more jobs in this economy, creating greater wealth for the individual American citizen and bringing all citizens a better standard of living.

To quote a Democratic President, John F. Kennedy, "A rising tide lifts all boats."

We are talking about an economy in which the tide has been falling over a number of years and we have got to do everything we can to get that tide up again.

I thank the gentleman for his comments. I thank the Chair for its indulgence.

THE "NOTCH" PROBLEM UNDER SOCIAL SECURITY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. BRINKLEY) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the Chair for recognizing me at this time.

I rise to report on developments and undertakings dealing with the "notch" problem under social security. Last year, I introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 222) for consideration in the Congress, which resolution how has over 50 sponsors in the House of Representatives. The effort is to correct the disparity under the social security amendments passed in 1977.

Under that law it was anticipated that those who were born after 1917 would receive an adjustment, which was called a decoupling adjustment, which would be about 5 percent less than they otherwise would be entitled to get.

The other body, under the leadership of Senator MATTINGLY from my home State of Georgia, has also joined with me in cosponsoring a resolution which calls upon the Social Security Administrator to develop a corrective alternative for consideration by the Congress.

Although House Resolution 222 is going along fairly well it is attracting a lot of attention back home and in the Congress—it has not been passed and, therefore, there has been no activity to amount to anything by the Social Security Administration; but there is movement at the grassroots levels in support of directing Social Security to study the notch problem and to come up with something that would be fair to all social security recipients.

For example, over the recess I was given in Georgia these petitions that reads as follows:

Concerned citizens protesting against the Social Security amendment that goes into effect January 1, 1982, that lowers benefits of people born from January 1, 1917, through December 31, 1921, as much as $110 to $175 per month.

Mr. Speaker, that might not seem like much to a lot of people, but to other folks it can mean the difference between paying the rent and not paying the rent; so the effort we are making is toward restoring equity to the law and to make certain that the 5-percent projections made in 1977 do not amount to more than that.

We have 2,142 signatures from our neighboring city, Phenix City, from the Third District of Alabama.

We have 2,208 from other parts of the Third District of Georgia, and finally from the Greater Columbus area we have 9,024 signatures, all supportive of some adjustment being made in the notch problem of social security, under which the Social Security Administrator is asked to study the problem, to come back to the Congress with a remedy that would keep equity within the system as to the level of benefits. Another 145 signatures are shown on these additional sheets.

Mr. Speaker, as a fallback position to that, I am today introducing a bill which would make it mandatory upon the Social Security Administrator to see to it that a ceiling is put in place so that that disparity—based only upon the year of birth—would never exceed the 5 percent which was projected in 1977.

We hope that in the interim the Social Security Administration itself will come forward with what the facts are and what possible remedies are at hand. I think that would be preferable, because admittedly I am not an expert in this field, but I do know something about the rule of fairness and about the rule of equity.

In summary, in 1977 we projected a decoupling that would not penalize any future recipient—just because he or she was born in a different year—by more than 5 percent.

We ought to bring the results in line with that projection. That is what we were aiming for. That is what people anticipated, and only because of the high interest rates and the bad economic conditions have we experienced a differential in excess of 5 percent, amounting to $110 to $175 differential in the maximum rates.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and join in this special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

A STUDY FOR THE SHELF

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. WYDEN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, the just-released section 205 study dealing with the impact of increased waterway user fees should be quickly rushed to the shelf so it can begin to collect dust instead of credibility.

This study, which concludes that waterway user fees will have no long-term negative impact on waterborne commerce nor hurt any particular region of the country, is incomplete, inadequate and inexcusable.

Even so, I anticipate it will be trotted out by proponents of waterway user fees, including the administration, to defend policies which will cripple our Nation's waterway transportation system, cut U.S. exports, add to business and consumer costs and strangle certain regions, such as the Columbia River basin and the Great Lakes.

It is critical to discredit this study now because the administration, in its 1983 budget, is proposing more than $3 billion in new waterway user fees. And that may be just the beginning.

The study says that no matter what level of waterway user fees are imposed, the growth of waterborne transportation is irrepressible. The study does concede that at least two waterway users will suffer immediate sizable adverse impacts, perhaps for up to 5 years. Those two user groups, according to the study, are barge operators and grain interests.

Now in the Columbia basin, those are the major users of the Columbia/Snake River system. In fact, last December more than 80 percent of the tonnage moving through the Bonneville Lock—the first lock upriver from the Port of Portland on the Columbia—was either grain or fertilizer. Another 10 percent of the tonnage was fuel for farm use.

To say that for the next 5 years waterway user fees will hamstring barge traffic for grain and farm products means that use of the Columbia/Snake River system will grind to a virtual halt.

In addition to the dire consequences for barge operators and farmers, this situation also will jeopardize planning underway to construct a new lock at Bonneville Dam to replace the smallest and slowest lock of the seven-lock system on the Columbia/Snake system and to remove a bottleneck that throttles full development of the waterway.

So what the section 205 study overlooks is this catch-22 system. It predicts waterway user fees will cause short-term negative impacts for certain users, but fails to take into account that in some regions those impacted users are the keys to future growth which the study believes, beyond all hope and reason, will occur no matter what.

This is a sad commentary, especially when you realize that 55 percent of the Nation's grain exports move through the Columbia River Basin. With the advent of severe waterway user fees, much of that cargo may be diverted to other modes of transportation. But what is more likely to happen is that grain growers will become less competitive in world markets and will wind up just selling less.

That means less U.S. exports and more trade deficits. It also means more fuel for inflation and less jobs for America.

A recent article in the Wall Street Journal summed up the condition of U.S. agricultural exporters by noting that exports have fallen sharply because of world economic slumps and tensions and because of competition from other countries.

According to the newspaper:

> Apparently an era of explosive export growth, which brought about large increases in U.S. farm income and productivity, has ended. Although farm exports are likely to pick up from current levels, their average growth through the 1980's won't approach the boom levels of the 1970's, experts say.

Going on, the newspaper adds:

> Fifteen years ago, we weren't a world market. We were a domestic market. All of a sudden the farmer has to answer to world demand.

These are the new realities that must be considered when undertaking policies such as imposing waterway user fees—especially when the only apparent rationale for such fees is to raise money to reduce deficits caused by runaway military cost overruns and excessive tax cuts to huge corporations and oil conglomerates.

The section 205 study falls woefully short of dealing with these realities in rushing to its glib, if useless, judgments on waterway user fees. Its conclusions are contrived facts, not derived from facts.

I want to take this opportunity to list just some of the deficiencies I have found in this study:

The study overlooks the different impacts waterway user fees have on completed systems and on the developing systems, such as the Columbia/Snake River system.

The study fails to consider the impact on total river systems and instead deals only with inland shallow-draft waterways, ignoring that there is direct relationship between deep- and shallow-draft waterways. It also fails to evaluate the cumulative impact of user charges on deep-draft, shallow-draft and Coast Guard activities and therefore the true cost of full recovery and thus the full extent of cargo diversion and negative impact.

The study has no element that examines whether waterway user fees would increase or decrease U.S. productivity and job-creating possibilities.

The study overlooks impacts on fuel conservation by discouraging, even over the short-term, waterborne commerce.

No consideration is given to the problems of funding the improvement work which must be done on waterways to overcome capacity limitations at critical points.

The impact of user charges on the national economy is not measured. There is no effort to determine whether benefits in Federal budget savings would be exceeded by Federal revenue losses stemming from industrial and agricultural dislocations.

No attempt is made to assess alternative methods of applying charges to waterway users and beneficiaries. One alternative—a national tonnage tax—has been suggested by Senator MARK HATFIELD and I that would raise additional revenue, but not cause regional dislocations or unfairly treat any port or waterway system.

The study does not deal adequately with regional impacts of waterway user fees. It doesn't deal at all with possibility that in some regions, a short-term waterway user decline will continue to spiral downward, making that form of transportation less and less attractive and making shippers, ports, and consumers captives of railroads.

The study concludes that waterway user fees will benefit railroads, but does not give a dollar value to that benefit or comment on its equity in light of subsidies to railroads.

The study is silent on the queston of how waterway user policy affects broader questions of national water policy. For example, it ignores the fundamental issue of how to justify turning locks and waterways into virtually private leaseholdings while at the same time maintaining waterways and their use belong to all Americans.

The study, in defending the shift to maintain Federal waterway facilities to non-Federal sources, did not deal with the reasonable question of transferring management responsibilities commensurate with this new financial reality to non-Federal sources.

The study is weak on examining impact of cargo diversion caused by waterway user fees on increased capital costs of goods.

The study does not come to grips with the problem of assigning benefits to users, direct and indirect. The problems of cost allocation are not alluded to in the study, although they are critically important to the success of implementing waterway user fees.

The Corps of Engineers estimates in its National Waterways Study (the conclusions of which the section 205 study disagrees with, incidentally) that the Federal Government provides about 12 to 13 percent of the total funds invested in marine transportation in the United States. Although most industry officials say a cutoff in those funds would have a chilling effect on private investment, the study ignored it.

The study concluded that marginal barge operators may fail because of short-term economic dislocations, but failed to consider that the damage could be more widespread if high interest rates and depressed economic conditions persist. Instead, the study reviewed the impact of waterway user fees in a static economic environment, an environment virtually no economist says exists or is likely to exist for some time.

Mr. Speaker, clearly this recital of wrongs and oversights in the section 205 study should tell us that we don't know enough to impose waterway user fees, but we do know enough not to.●

AIR TRAFFIC SAFETY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, on April 2, 1980, I rose here in the well of the House and said, and I quote myself:

Today I rise because the great peril and danger of catastrophe over the Potomac is extremely grave. National Airport is a nemesis for every single pilot that has any business arriving or departing from National Airport.

Today I rise to repeat that statement categorically, and particularly and tragically after the terrible catastrophe of January 13 and because it looks as if the whole thing is going to be again glossed over and just simply neatly wrapped up by saying it was pilot error, when the truth is that that is a terrible injustice, and more vitally important to us all is the continuing pattern of daily danger, roulette, with death over the Potomac every day, every hour, because the central issue that we have tried to direct attention, as I said, as early as April 2, 1980, still goes unaddressed, even after this catastrophe, and particularly compounded since the air route traffic controllers strike, the consequent dismissal and firing by the President of the controllers and the only thing that has managed to somehow salvage from a breakdown and a repetition of these tragedies has been the 30-percent or better decrease in the pattern of air travel activities in our Nation and also at National; but I am very concerned.

I hate very much to get up and ask the same question I did on April 2, because to me it was a miracle that such a tragedy had not happened before. Everybody has forgotten in the passion and the emotion of the airline traffic controllers strike what motivated it, what was the real triggering underlying cause as well.

Nothing has been done to address those issues, other than the fact that their union was busted up. The air route traffic controllers have been thrown out; but nobody at FAA, the National Transportation Safety Board, Congress, other than what we initiated then, because as a result of that April 2 initial phase of the effort, we did finally obtain some hearings at the subcommittee level that led to at least one foreclosure of potential disaster and that was the imminence of that time of allowing the wide-bodied, or the air buses coming into National. Now, we did succeed in that, but we never did in the other and the more important continuing and very fateful lack of safeguards of basic safety features, of even the equipment, that to this day has not been provided and which was a central reason for the air traffic controllers malaise or complaints.

At this point I place into the RECORD a portion of the RECORD of April 2, 1980, entitled "Air Traffic Safety," as follows:

AIR TRAFFIC SAFETY

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, in the 18 years and 3 months or so that I have been here, I have had occasion to travel much more than 6 million air miles just between here and my district. I have made it a practice to return to my district every weekend when the House adjourns, and if it ever adjourns for any period of time or recesses, I go back to the district, so that I am very conscious of air safety. Even if I had not had this amount of mileage, I still would be conscious of air safety because of the first experience I had, newly elected in 1962, with the political decision made by the then FAA Administrator, Najeeb Halaby, to remove the air route traffic control center from San Antonio and join it to the one in Houston. It was a political maneuver mostly because my very powerful and distinguished Texas colleague, Albert Thomas, was then the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations.

The first 2 years of my service I concentrated on trying to reverse that decision and never succeeded. However, it has always been a very questionable factor as to air traffic safety in the San Antonio air corridor.

Two years ago on the occasion of the terrible catastrophe in San Diego, the collision of an airliner with a small craft, a local San Antonio newspaper, the San Antonio Light, brought to my attention the fact that San Antonio continued to have a similar pattern of danger of near-collisions or near-hits. I then raised some questions that never got satisfactory answers.

Today I rise because the great peril and danger of catastrophe over the Potomac is extremely grave. National Airport is a nemesis for every single pilot that has any business arriving or departing from National Airport. In the last 2 months I have been impressed by the fact that more than half a dozen airline pilots, every one of them experienced with far more than 10 or 15 years of experience, have gone out of their way to approach me during my flights back home to advise me that they are terribly concerned about the safety of the approach as well as the departure from National Airport. They tell me that they are compelled because of the noise-abatement pressures in the neighborhood to approach National Airport in such a way with such maneuvers that amount to tricks in the air, death-defying tricks. They must approach curving and banking and twisting and turning and rolling over the Potomac. Their fear is enhanced by the fact that wide bodies are scheduled for service to National Airport, and they know in their hearts and minds that the potential for tragedy is there every day almost every hour.

Therefore, I have drafted a letter of concern and inquiry to the Administrator of the FAA in the hope that perhaps attention could be concentrated on this very serious and grievous problem confronting us. I think that heretofore where we have raised our voices and have been ignored, the record of tragedy is too eloquent to overlook. I had raised the question, for example, of near-misses and near-hits and had elaborated on that considerably over 15 years ago and was then ignored by the then FAA, which now is under the general auspices of the National Transportation Safety Board. So I express this concern and hope this time we can get some of the powerful Members, chairmen of the committees and subcommittees that have jurisdiction, to respond.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
April 2, 1980.

Hon. LANGHORNE M. BOND,
Administrator, Federal Aviation Administration, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BOND: In my eighteen years and three months in the Congress. I have had occasion to travel for more than six million air miles, just between my District and Washington, D.C., and have been very conscious of the very wonderful performance of American commercial air service.

From the very beginning of my career, I have been particularly sensitive about air safety and the first two years in the Congress, I devoted almost exclusively my time to this subject matter, the reason being the political decision made by the then FAA Administration, Najeeb E. Halaby, to remove the Air Route Traffic Control Center from San Antonio to Houston.

It was impossible to reverse that decision, but the obvious increased hazard in the San Antonio air corridor has continued to be a source of great worry. Two years ago, on the occasion of the San Diego catastrophe, the local San Antonio newspaper, the San Antonio Light, revealed the existence of a similar problem of recurring near-collisions in the San Antonio area and then remembering my fight in 1962, brought this to my attention. I raised questions then (two years ago) but received no satisfactory answers. Today I am very much concerned about the potential for tragedy in the Washington National Airport. I have been advised by more than one-half dozen experienced pilots that due to the pressure occasioned by the noise abatement procedures, they are compelled to maneuver and perform approaches to landings over the Potomac River that are fraught with great peril and which if performed in any other air sector in the United States would be condemned and punished by the Federal Aviation Administration. They are particularly alarmed about the potential of death and tragedy when the wide-bodies are increased in number of performance at National Airport.

I would like to know exactly why this is so, and any information you can give me with respect to this, and also to the record of near-collisions reported in the San Antonio area, as quickly as possible, will be appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY B. GONZALEZ,
Member of Congress.

A TRIBUTE TO ROGER BALDWIN, CALIFORNIA HIGHWAY PATROL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. COELHO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, as President Reagan has said we do not have to turn the pages of history books to read about heroes, there are heroes among us—ordinary Americans who have given and continue to give above and beyond the call of duty. I rise today to call attention to one such hero, Officer Roger Baldwin, of the California Highway Patrol.

Officer Baldwin is being recognized on Friday, February 12, as the Outstanding Law Enforcement Officer of the Year by the Madera Exchange Club and I am pleased that I am going to have the opportunity to present this award to him. Mr. Baldwin is a symbol of the dedication, selflessness, and integrity of peace officers all over the country.

Last year he received the California Highway Patrol 10851 Award for the second time—the only officer in the history of the CHP in Madera County to do so. Officer Baldwin reflects the professionalism of our peace officers. He is trained as an emergency medical technician, a weapons instructor, and radiological monitor operator. Officer Baldwin represented the Madera CHP at the Diablo Canyon demonstrations and received a citation of commendation for his work there.

It is indeed a privilege for me to have the opportunity to recognize Roger Baldwin, who personifies the human spirit of all those Americans in the law enforcement field who put their lives on the line for their countrymen every day; for it is people like him who have helped make our country what it is today.●

SRI LANKA NATIONAL DAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a pervious order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I should like to call attention of the Members of the House to a very important national observance held last week in Sri Lanka, a nation that, despite geographical distance and ethnic difference from us, upholds and believes in a fundamental political and economic philosophy much like our own. February 4 marks the 34th anniversary of Sri Lankan independence, and it is an honor for me to draw attention to this important date.

Sri Lankans have much to cherish on this occasion. They can look back proudly at decades of parliamentary democracy under which the people of Sri Lanka have been able to voice their views and obtain representation through a multiparty system. That Sri Lankans do value this system of government is attested to by the fact that over the past 16 years voter turnout at general elections has average over 80 percent. Clearly the parliamentary system of Sri Lanka has proven its strengths over the years and the sovereignty of the people of Sri Lanka is supreme. Like our own system, Sri Lanka also maintains strict separation of powers between the legislature, the executive and the judiciary.

The Sri Lankan people can also appropriately recognize the economic and social achievements of their land. While still faced with considerable economic and social challenges, Sri Lanka can already boast near universal literacy and long life expectancy. Ambitious economic projects such as the Mahaweli development program hold out the prospect of increasing the opportunities for the people of Sri Lanka and improving their well-being and productivity. The people of the United States are associated with the people of Sri Lanka in these economic endeavors: U.S. assistance supports the Mahaweli Dam projects and the opening of new agricultural land the Mahaweli project will make possible.

In recent years, Sri Lanka has given increasing emphasis to foreign investment. Free trade zones are being developed and incentives are being promoted to attract foreign investment. Just in the past few years, foreign banks, such as four American banks, have extended their services to Sri Lanka.

It is a privilege and pleasure to watch the progress of Sri Lanka over the recent years. I wish the people and Government of Sri Lanka well on this observance of 34 years of independence.●

RETIREMENT OF A DISTINGUISHED CITIZEN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, when a man retires after a distinguished career that spanned four decades, it is a notable achievement. However, when such a career has been punctuated by a record of tireless dedication and unceasing commitment to the responsibilities of leadership positions in both the public and the private sectors, it is, Mr. Speaker, a remarkable testimony to the character and the caliber of the individual, as well as an inspiration to us all. I would like to take this opportunity to salute the career of Stephen G. Magyar, who retired on December 31, 1982, as President of the Monterey Savings & Loan Association.

Steve Magyar, born in St. Louis on August 26, 1916, attended the College of Applied Science and holds a mechanical engineering degree from the Detroit Institute of Technology. Deciding to serve his country in uniform, Steve rose quickly in the military rank and stature. Graduating Officer's Candidate School as second lieutenant, he soon left for the Pacific Theater of Operations. His first assignment was on Christmas Island, followed by Hawaii, where he was promoted to first lieutenant. His military service ended in 1945 when Steve was discharged from Fort Ord as a lieutenant colonel, after his final assignment as staff officer for Gen. B. C. Lockwood.

Following his discharge, Steve achieved an outstanding record in the private sector and community service. Steve launched a partnership with a long-time friend to form an insulating contracting company which progressed to specialization in energy conservation work. In 1966 the Monterey Savings & Loan Association offered Steve the position as vice president and branch manager. In 1978, he was elected to the company's board of directors. Under Steve's 14 years of leadership, the firm's Salinas branch grew and prospered to eventually rival the original Monterey office.

Steve's boundless energy and enthusiasm brought him numerous leadership positions in the community. The Builder's Exchange, the Central City Authority and the John Steinbeck Foundation all elected him President of their respective organizations. Additionally, Steve offered his time and imagination to serve as the president of the Monterey Babe Ruth Baseball League, president of the Monterey Kiwanis Club and president of the Monterey County Youth Guidance Council. He is also a past president of Monterey's Student Employment Council and he continues as a member of the board of the California State Automobile Association.

Even though he had planned retirement, Steve accepted the presidency of Monterey Savings & Loan in October of 1980, succeeding Robert C. Littlefield, son of the founder and president of Monterey Savings. Mr. Speaker, I join so many in Monterey who know Steve Magyar, who have been touched by him, and affected by his leading example of community spirit, in honoring his career and wishing Steve, his wife Peg, and two sons, Jeffrey and Roger, the very best in the years to come. From all of us, a very special thank you, Steve.●

CALL TO CONSCIENCE VIGIL, 1982

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BARNES) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, a year ago I made a statement on the House floor to mark the beginning of my term as chairman of the Call to Conscience Vigil, 1981. The past year has been a time of hope, of growing concern, and active participation by Members of Congress on behalf of those who are persecuted in the Soviet Union. I want to thank my colleagues for their participation. Our individual and combined efforts have made a difference. Sometimes the progress has been slow, but as we continue to work there is always progress, and liberty for our courageous friends in the Soviet Union, more imminent.

I am pleased this year to pass the torch to my colleague, Congressman LENT, chairman of the Call to Conscience Vigil, 1982. His leadership will move us forward to new successes and I hope that we, as concerned and active participants, will intensify our involvement by working for more refuseniks, by writing more letters, by making more telephone calls. We will continue to be a strong voice for the many who have been forcibly silenced. We want to let our brave friends in the Soviet Union know that we are thinking of them, that we are behind them, and that we will continue—as long as it takes—to fight for their freedom.

The challenge we face today is even greater than the challenge we faced just 1 year ago. When we look at the numbers of those who have been permitted to emigrate from the Soviet Union we find that in January 1981 only 850 Soviet Jews were permitted to leave the Soviet Union, compared to the 1980 total of 2,803. We now know that only 290 Soviet Jews were allowed to emigrate last month. This downward trend, which has been markedly evident over the past 3 years, is devastatingly low, representing the lowest Jewish emigration figures ever. The flow has slowed dramatically to a mere trickle.

But this cannot last indefinitely. Just 2 months ago, on December 24, 1981, Jews from many Soviet cities took great personal risks and staged a public demonstration outside the Lenin Library in Moscow to protest this emigration slowdown and the increase in arrest and harassment by the KGB. We know that there are many within the Soviet Union who continue to speak out, to protest, and to virtually put their lives on the line for the cause of justice and freedom. Their spirits are strong and their hearts are hopeful. They, too, will continue their vigil.

On a more personal note, I would like to take this opportunity again to share with my colleagues the sad story of Lev Blitshtein, who 7 years ago applied to emigrate from the Soviet Union. He divorced his beloved wife so that she and their children could cross the Soviet border into freedom. He celebrated his 50th birthday last May 21, in captivity. He is still in the Soviet Union. I fervently hope that we will triumph this year and that he will be reunited with his family in the free world.

Mr. Speaker, we will continue to bring these human rights violations out into the open and protest them. Particularly at this time, we raise these issues and specific cases at the U.N. Human Rights Commission meetings these next few weeks and at the Madrid Review Conference monitoring compliance to the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act. But we know that it does not stop there. We maintain our vigil in the light of day and in the dead of night. Justice and the tenacity of the human spirit are on our side and our commitment to the recognition of human rights throughout the world will continue to give the promise of freedom to our friends in the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to show my gratitude and continued support of the congressional Call to Conscience Vigil.●

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
February 8, 1982.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: This is to notify you, pursuant to the provisions of Rule L (50), paragraph 2, of the Rules of the House that Edward T. Kellaher, an employee in my office, was recently served with a subpoena to testify in a case pending in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia.

I will make the requisite determinations under Rule L (50), paragraph 3, in consultation with my General Counsel and advise you accordingly.

Sincerely,

EDMUND L. HENSHAW, Jr.,
Clerk, House of Representatives.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

2994. A letter from the Secretary of Energy, transmitting the fourth semiannual report on alternative fuels production, pursuant to title II of Public Law 96-126; to the Committee on Appropriations.

2995. A letter from the Executive Associate Director, Office of Management and Budget, Executive Office of the President, transmitting a report that the appropriation to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms for "salaries and expenses" for fiscal year 1982 has been apportioned on a basis which indicates the necessity for a supplemental estimate of appropriation, pursuant to section 3679(e)(2) of the Revised Statutes, as amended; to the Committee on Appropriations.

2996. A letter from the President of the United States, transmitting his certification that the production of lethal binary chemical munitions is essential to the national interest, pursuant to section 818(a) of Public Law 94-106 (H. Doc. No. 97-141); to the Committee on Armed Services and ordered to be printed.

2997. A letter from the Secretary of Defense, transmitting the eighth annual report on force improvements and defense cooperation within NATO, pursuant to section 302(c) of Public Law 93-365 and section 814(b) of Public Law 94-106; to the Committee on Armed Services.

2998. A letter from the general counsel of the Department of Defense, transmitting amendments to the Manual for Courts-Martial, United States, 1969 (revised edition), pursuant to 10 U.S.C. 836(b); to the Committee on Armed Services.

2999. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of Defense (manpower, reserve affairs, and logistics), transmitting a report on plans for the reuse of Craig Air Force Base, Selma, Ala., pursuant to section 610(b) of Public Law 94-431; to the Committee on Armed Services.

3000. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of Defense, (research, development, and logistics), transmitting notice of plans to study the conversion of various functions at sundry locations from in-house operation to contractor performance during fiscal year 1982, pursuant to section 502(a) of Public Law 96-342; to the Committee on Armed Services.

3001. A letter from the chief, Legislation Division, Office of Legislative Liaison, Department of the Air Force, transmitting the semiannual report covering the period July 1, 1981, through December 31, 1981, on Air Force experimental, developmental, and research contracts of $50,000 or more, by company, pursuant to 10 U.S.C. 2357; to the Committee on Armed Services.

3002. A letter from the Acting Director, Defense Security Assistance, transmitting a report on the impact on U.S. readiness of the Army's proposed sale of certain defense equipment to Saudi Arabia (Transmittal No. 82-20), pursuant to section 813 of Public Law 94-106; to the Committee on Armed Services.

3003. A letter from the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, transmitting a report on the study of the relative risks of loss under the insurance programs authorized by sections 203(b) and 213 of the National Housing Act, pursuant to section 309(a) of Public Law 96-153; to the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

3004. A letter from the Director of ACTION, transmitting proposed final regulations revising the rules and review procedures for the denial of a current grant recipient's or contractor's application for refunding, pursuant to section 420(d) of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973, as amended; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

3005. A letter from the Commissioner, Rehabilitation Services Administration, Department of Education, transmitting notice of a delay until June 1, 1982, in submission of the annual report on activities under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, required by section 13 of the act, as amended; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

3007. A letter from the Acting Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations, transmitting a copy of Presidential Determination No. 82-5, authorizing the furnishing of up to $55,000,000 in defense articles, defense services, and military education and training by the Department of Defense to El Salvador under the authority of section 506(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.
